
Are you becoming more just, more true, more considerate, more forgiving? Have you more love for humanity? Is your faith and hope and trust growing larger, and outward toward God and your fellow-man? Then Christ, the real Christ, is coming to you. Here is a man living in the narrow sphere of self, wrapped up in the shell of "I, me, my, mine." He is led somehow to trust in God as his Father, to go out of himself and to take an interest in humanity and every good cause—Christ has come to him. He has not seen any burnishing of midnight or midday skies with the "second coming"; but there is a light in his own soul. He hasn't seen any Pentecostal tongues of fire; but there is within a gift of the Spirit and inward peace. He has not seen any shining cross in the sky; but he is enabled to bear his own earthly cross. He has not seen "the books opened, and another book"; but he himself has become "the living epistle, known and read of all men."

Am I mistaken when I say the world is growing better and more Christ-like? Is not Christ coming more and more to the great business centers? More and more into the shops, and on the railroads and to the 300,000 traveling salesmen? This I do know. Christ is coming more and more to the churches, and the church is sending him more and more to the great, wide world. Jacob Riis said when he began his work of reform in New York City, and stumbled on to the first sick, homeless child, he did not know a single church or religious society to whom he might take her for care. After forty years, and behold, what hath God wrought! The famine baby in India is relieved by the tick of a telegraph instrument. A call from the perishing millions, and hands go down into pockets, and there go hundreds of missionaries with the unsearchable riches of Christ; and here and there in heathen lands are schools, orphanages, hospitals, mission stations, churches; and the "earth is being filled with the knowledge of the Lord as waters cover the seas." This is the real coming of the real Christ. "Even so come, Lord Jesus."

Awake thou wintry earth—
Fling off thy sadness;
Fair vernal flowers laugh forth
Your ancient gladness;
Christ is risen.

As Seen from the Dome

By F. D. Power

One can look upward here to great heights. There is absolutely nothing between the figure on the Dome and the limitless blue of heaven. The man with the upturned face sees the stars, and far away, from star to star, and constellation to constellation, and system to system, till the great central sun, which is the seat of the throne, gleams upon his dazzled vision. How great and good is God! It is such a comfort to take large views of things.

"Below, way down under the eaves, are some sparrows. Matthew tells us how two sparrows are sold for a farthing, and Luke how five are sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God. Five of these little birds for two farthings. It was a business transaction like one car fare, five cents; six for a quarter. When two sparrows were bought one must pay a farthing, but for two farthings he might have five. The odd sparrow was thrown in as of so little value it could be given away with the other four. And yet even for that one sparrow, not worth taking into account in the bargain, God cares. Not one of the sparrows falls to the ground without him—his thought, his knowledge, his concern. With what force comes the assurance: "Fear not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows."

There is a God, a loving God who cares; who is neither ignorant of our needs, nor indifferent to them. The very hairs of our heads are all numbered. His fatherly care reaches to the whole of human life; from the vast movements of history to the minutest details of our daily need; ordering men's ways, ordering the conditions of life, ordering all events, ordering the smallest matters, and all for our good.

How full nature is of this universal goodness! Sunshine and rain, cold and heat, are God's ministers. His thoughts are in the lightning, in the harvest, in the mountains and valleys, in the seasons, in the lilies and the grass, in sunlight and in cloud. One has only to open his eyes and look in the right way. Whether we catch the true meaning of the things we see depends upon our way of viewing them. Two farmers watch the rain. One says, "It will help the corn;" the other, "It will spoil the oats." Two people come in contact with the rosebush: One sees only the roses, the other only the thorns. Now the April shower is falling and we may watch the people scurrying to get to cover, and perhaps kicking against "the nasty weather," as the Englishman would call it. There is a world of wholesome philosophy in the lines:

"It isn't raining rain to me;
It's raining daffodils,
In every dimpled drop I see Wild flowers on the hills."

"The clouds of grey engulf the day
And overwhelm the town.
It isn't raining rain to me,
Its raining roses down."

"It isn't raining rain to me,
But fields of clover bloom,
Where any buccaneering bee
May find a bed and room."

"A health unto the happy,
A fig for him who frets.
It isn't raining rain to me,
It's raining violets."

Experience teaches the same lesson. Life is full of good things, and it is no sin to enjoy them. It is our duty to be happy. "While scientists are talking of where we came from, and theologians are discussing where we are going to, the fact remains that we are here," I can hear my friend Dr. Talmage saying in his strident tones. And it is for us to live socially and happily together while on this planet. And would this be a decent, well-ordered, God-made and God-kept universe without the Father's present care? Everywhere about us we see his providence. We are every one rich in his loving kindness and tender mercy. Every bush, every blossom is aflame with the love of God. What millionaires we all are! Here is the sense of sight. Would you part with it for a million? Would you for many millions give up the faculty by which you look down from the Dome through the long vistas of the city streets, off to the stars, into the faces of friends and the pages of books, abroad upon the blossoming spring? Here is your sense of hearing. A million will you take for it, and give up forever the carol of birds, the hum of insects, the voices of little children, the sounds from the busy world at your feet, the strains of distant music? Here are the joys of the mind, the delights of the heart, the pleasures of the imagination—millions would you take for them? Here is wife, or child, or friend. Count your blessings. Look into your experience. Think of home and loved ones. Remember how even in afflictions God has given beauty for ashes, and the oil of joy for mourning, and garments of praise for heaviness. Think how even when loved ones are laid to rest, "beneath the low green tent whose curtain never outward swings." He loves, he soothes, he makes perfect through suffering. As the odd sparrow has he not cared for you? Now sing Geneva all the day long:

"When all thy mercies, O my God,
My rising soul surveys;
Transported with the view I'm lost,
In wonder, love, and praise."

Most of all revelation confirms this truth. What is the story of Israel? of the infant church? of Abraham, Moses, Joseph, David, Paul? What is the meaning of such Scriptures as the Nightingale Psalm? "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." It is a cold world if we think only of the reign of law. There is something more than law—there is One who brought the heavens and earth into being, who creates and sustains us, whose personality touches ours and whose care is unceasing. What thought in all the universe of happy thinking like the thought that God thinketh upon us? One night at the Brooklyn bridge a little fellow tumbled down in a fit and a policeman picked him up and carried him to the waiting room. An old woman selling papers came up and the officer asked: "Who is this boy?" "His name is Maher." "Does no one care for him?" "I don't know anyone but God, and he seems to be too busy with other people to pay much attention to him." Another, jostled and driven from pillar to post, homeless and uncared for, injured on the street, was taken to the hospital, and when the Christian nurse told him he could not live long, but would go home to God, asked, "Do you think they'll have any room for a little fellow up there?"

Yes, God cares. God has a place in his heart for the least of these. God's gospel is against the iron monster of greed and covetousness and selfishness that crushes men and women and little children, the awful barbarism of war, the horrible infernity of the saloon, the monstrous sway of sin. Christ came to destroy the works of the devil. But discipline is necessary for the world's development, for the experience of the individual soul. Doctor Johnson met an old beggar woman, who, asking alms, at a lucky moment described herself as "an old struggler." Boswell says the doctor was visibly affected. "I, too," he said, "am an old struggler." It is the solution of the problem of human life. An old struggler is simply a veteran in struggling, one who has grown old in struggling and aspiring. It is the best thing in any life. If is the most magnificent thing to say of any man, not that he has attained, but is striving to attain. If now you can say, "This one thing I do," sometime you may say, "I have fought a good fight." Winter is past—a long, hard winter. It was well. The earth needed it.

So the winter of life will pass. God keeps the odd sparrow through the frost and snow; and he chirps and busies himself about his home, and calls to his mate and rejoices that the winter is over and gone. The flowers appear on the earth and the time of the singing of the birds is here. God is our keeper.

It is said that Jonathan Edwards's last words after bidding his relatives good-by, were, "Now, where is Jesus of Nazareth, my true and never-failing Friend?" And so saying he fell asleep.

What Is Left?

By Judge A. E. Wilkinson

What Jesus proposed to accomplish then, by the means which he proposed, was something so wildly improbable of accomplishment as to be fairly classed with the flatly impossible, from any human probability. Now all the chances against its success become arguments of most persuasive power as to its substantial truth and the justice of the claims of its founder, when once it has succeeded. He has foretold an almost impossible thing, a thing no one could have guessed, one no mere man in his senses would have attempted. Against all reason and common sense, he has told us calmly and confidently it would surely come to pass.

If he fails he is to be classed with other visionaries and dreamers. If he succeeds, then, by force of the very fantastic improbability of the thing itself, we are compelled to believe that the one who foreknew and foretold it was the possessor of powers greater than our own. What better evidence could he give us than this, of his claim to be for us an authoritative, moral leader and guide, whose word is to be accepted, even though our own reason can not justify it. The success of Christianity, by the means through which it has succeeded, thus becomes a present miracle, attested by history and patent to our observation, of more convincing and overwhelming power than any related in the Gospels. It is easier to believe in Christianity to-day than it could have been for the followers of Christ, who listened to his words and saw him calm the tempest and walk upon the waves of the sea. It is easier for us to believe than if we had stood beside him and seen the buried Lazarus come forth in grave clothes at his command, for we believe upon better evidence.

What mysterious power converted the trembling followers, who deserted their Master in the terrors of his trial and crucifixion, into the fearless martyrs who bore his message round the world and counted it glorious to die a shameful death in his service? How vast the gulf between the cowards who protested, cursing and swearing, that they knew him not, and the lofty serenity of soul that proclaimed in the face of torturing death, "I am now ready to be offered up, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight. I have finished the course. I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." And what shall we say of the wisdom that foresaw this marvelous transformation, relied on it, builded on it, and died committing to it, in confident trust, the fortunes of an apparently overwhelmed, ruined, and visionary scheme? Who could foretell this, the very paradox of personal faith and loyalty, which the poet pictures as cheering the dying hour of the beloved disciple, looking forward to the times when men should

"Muse upon blank heaps of stone and sand.
Idly conjectured to be Ephesus."

and when the question in their minds should be, not what witness did John bear? but,

"Was John at all? and did he say he saw?
Assure us ere we ask what he might see."
"Sigh you, It had been easier once than now.
To give you answer I am left alive.
Forsake the Christ thou sawest transfigured,
Him

Who trod the sea and brought the dead to life?
What should wring this from thee? ye laugh and ask.

What wrung it? Even a torchlight and a noise,

The sudden Roman faces, violent hands,
And fear of what the Jews might do; Just that.

And it is written, I forsook and fled.
There was my trial, and it ended thus.
Ay, but my soul had gained the truth, could grow;

Another year or two,—what little child,
What tender woman that had seen no least
Of all my sights, but barely heard them told,
Who did not clasp the cross with a light laugh,
Or wrap the burning robe round, thanking God."

It is true that the success of Christianity is, thus far, only a partial one, and we are far, as yet, from the glories predicted for the Kingdom of Heaven. But enough has been accomplished to give assurance for the future. Enough has come to pass to show that the Founder built the structure of his society upon something in the soul of man which naturalism can neither explain nor admit. Enough to show that the coming religion of the human race is to be based upon the gospel of Christ.

We have proceeded in this argument, neither upon the assumption that miracles are true, nor that they are false, but simply that they must be regarded as unproven. If they are still to remain in that category, I confess that, personally, I should be little troubled, for I regard belief or disbelief in them with some degree of indifference. If we can find good reason for believing in Christ independently of any belief in the miracles narrated of him in the Gospels, it matters little what we believe about them. But it is worth observing here, that an acceptance of Christ upon the faith of such evidence as I have outlined will radically affect our attitude towards the whole subject of the miracles related of him. For we are compelled to recognize him as a being possessed of miraculous, that is, of more than human power and claiming our allegiance by virtue of that fact.

To the power of a being such as we must believe him to be, it will then be difficult for us to assign probable limits. Things which were scarcely believable when related of any other personality become not improbable when related of him—nay, seem to fit naturally into our conception of him. And when once we have reached this mental attitude towards the subject, we will find a discussion of the sufficiency of human testimony to prove miracles takes its place among those abstract questions about which the mind may cheerfully exercise its ingenuity in search of mental discipline, because it looks upon the result, be it what it may, as something that in no way concerns faith or conduct. Why should I care whether Jesus stilled the tempest on Galilee? He has done a thing ten thousand times more marvelous, and has all history to attest it. One, when questioned about him by the rulers, said, "I know him not; but I know that whereas I was blind, now I see." Let me, too, rest content with the miracle that has been worked for me.

The question comes down to this at last. Is man a being such as Christ conceived him to be, set in a world of moral law, subject to the rule of God, not fondly deceived by any process of evolution into vain ideas of duty and obligation, of service and worship, but holding such conceptions because they correspond to the realities of existence, and, by fidelity to such ideals, capable of immortal life? If he is such, and any such promise of divine power and presence in his heart as Christ made could be kept, then the plan which he proposed for making possible the attainment of that life was most exquisitely devised, promised success, even justified his anticipations which looked upon success as a certainty. The absurdity, the fantastic nature of his schemes, vanish if they are to be applied to beings such as he conceived that we were, and by a being such as he claimed to be. If we are not such beings, then the scheme was wild, visionary, impossible. It could never have succeeded. It never deserved to succeed. If man is not immortal, no art or eloquence, no power or craft, could ever have bent him to accept as true such a religion as Christ preached. Its want of adaptation to the man of Professor Hæckel is as glaring as its adaptation to the man of Jesus Christ is exquisite and divine. It could never have succeeded if it had been false. Because it has succeeded it must surely be true.

Then be confident in Christ, brother! Dare to say, "I am saved!" Not "I hope I am saved," but "I am saved!" Not, "I hope I shall be saved," but "I am saved!" Dare to assert, "I am done with sin, for I have begun with Christ." Clothe yourself in his armor, and know yourself invincible. Do not dream of defeat; dream of him. Do not look to yourself; look at him. Do not remember the past; remember him who has become your stainless and inevitable future.

Corruption a Business

Lincoln Steffens
In McClure's Magazine for April

Every time I attempted to trace to its sources the political corruption of a city ring, the stream of pollution branched off in the most unexpected directions and spread out in a network of veins and arteries so complex that hardly any part of the body politic seemed clear of it. It flowed out of the majority party into the minority; out of politics into vice and crime; out of business into politics, and back into business; from the boss, down through the police to the prostitute, and up through the practice of law, into the courts; and big throbbing arteries ran out through the country over the State to the Nation—and back. No wonder cities can't get municipal reform! No wonder Minneapolis, having cleaned out its police ring of vice grafters, now discovers boodle in the council! No wonder Chicago, with council-reform and boodle beaten, finds itself a Minneapolis of police and administrative graft! No wonder Pittsburg, when it broke out of its local ring, fell, amazed, into a state ring! No wonder New York, with good government, votes itself back into Tammany Hall!

They are on the wrong track; we are, all of us, on the wrong track. You can't reform a city by reforming a part of it. You can't reform a city alone. You can't reform politics alone. And as for corruption and the understanding thereof, we cannot run 'round and 'round in municipal rings and understand ring corruption; it isn't a ring thing. We cannot remain in one city, or ten, and comprehend municipal corruption; it isn't a local thing. We cannot "stick to a party," and follow party corruption; it isn't a partisan thing. And I have found that I cannot confine myself to politics and grasp all the ramifications of political corruption; it isn't political corruption. It's corruption. The corruption of our American politics is our American corruption, political, but financial and industrial, too. Miss Tarbell is showing it in the trust, Mr. Baker in the labor union, and my gropings into the misgovernment of cities have drawn me everywhere, but, always, always out of politics into business; and out of the cities into the state. Business started the corruption of politics in Pittsburg; upholds it in Philadelphia; boomed with it in Chicago and withered with its reform; and in New York, business financed the return of Tammany Hall. Here, then, is our guide out of the labyrinth. Not the political ring, but big business,—that is the crux of the situation. Our political corruption is a system, a regularly established custom of the country, by which our political leaders are hired, by bribery, by the license to loot, and by quiet moral support, to conduct the government of city, state, and nation, not for the common good, but for the special interests of private business.

Not the politician, then, not the bribe-taker, but the bribe-giver, the man we are so proud of, our successful business man—he is the source and the sustenance of our bad government. The captain of industry is the man to catch. He is the trail to follow.

We have struck that trail before. Whenever we followed the successful politician, his tracks led us into it, but also they led us out of the cities—from Pittsburg to the State Legislature at Harrisburg; from Philadelphia, through Pennsylvania, to the National Legislature at Washington. To go on was to go into state and national politics, and I was after the political corruption of the city ring then. Now I know that these are all one. The trail of the political leader and the trail of the commercial leader are parallels which mark the plain, main road that leads off the dead level of the cities, up through the states into the United States, out of the political ring into the system, the living system of our actual government. The highway of corruption is the "road to success."

Almost any state would start us right, but Missouri is the most promising. Joseph W. Folk, the Circuit Attorney of St. Louis, has not only laid wide open the road out there; he knows it is the way of a system. He didn't at first. He, too, thought he was fighting political corruption, and that the whole of it was the St. Louis ring. But he got the ring. Mr. Folk has convicted the boss and members of the "boodle combine" that was selling out his city, yet the ring does not break. Why? Because back of the boodlers stand the big business men who are buying the city up. But Folk got the business men too. They are not "low-down politicians"; they are "respectable business men." Having discovered early that boodlers flew in pairs, that wherever there was a bribe-taker, there also was a bribe-giver, Folk hunted them in pairs. And in pairs he brought them down. And still the ring does not break. What is the matter?

That's what's the matter. "That man Folk" is attacking the system. If he had confined his chase to that unprotected bird, the petty boodler, all might have been well. Indeed, there was a time, just before the first trial of the boss, Col. Ed. Butler, when the ring was in a panic and everybody ran. If he had stayed his hand then, Folk could have been governor of Missouri, the leader of his party, and a very rich man. But he would not stop. These were not the things he was after. At that moment he was after Boss Butler; and he got him.

"And the conviction of Butler," he said recently, "is the point where we passed out of the ring into the system."

Butler was not only the boss of the ring; he was the tool of the system. He was the man through whom the St. Louis business man did business with the combine, and Folk hadn't caught all the business men involved. The first time I met him, early in his work, he was puzzled by the opposition or silence of officials and citizens, who, he thought, should have been on his side. The next time I saw him this mystery was clearing. One by one those people were turning up in this deal or 'way back of that one. He could not reach them; he can never reach them all; but there they were, and they, their relatives, their friends, their lawyers, their business and social associates—"nobody can realize," says Mr. Folk, "the infinite ramifications of this thing." And "that man Folk," rising out of the wrecked machinery of justice in Missouri, may lead his people to see that the corruption of their government is not merely corruption, but a revolutionary process making for a new form of government; and the people of Missouri, rising out of the wrecked machinery of the government of Missouri, may teach their politicians a lesson in liberty and honor. But that is not enough. That will reach neither the source nor the head of the evil. Some power greater than Folk, greater than that of the people of Missouri, must rise to bring home to the captain of industry the truth: That business, important as it is, is not sacred; that not everything that pays is right; that, if bribery is treason, if the corrupt politician is a traitor, then the corrupting business man is an enemy of the republic. No matter how many bonds he may float in war, or how much he may give for charity and education, if he corrupt the sources of law and of justice, his business is not a success but—treason and a people's failure.

In Stratford, lovers of Shakespeare have planted in his garden only those flowers that are mentioned in the poet's plays. There you find the egg-lantine, the rosemary, the woodbine, the modest pansy, the sweetbrier, all the humble flowers. And Christ hath his garden, and the flowers that bloom in it are the fruits of his spirit; hate is not there; envy and strife and vulgarity and covetousness are expelled, as men expel the burr, the thistle and the noxious nightshade, but love and joy and peace are there, blooming as sweetly as flowers whose roots are in heaven, but whose bloom and sweetness and perfume are the glory of our earth.—N. D. Hillis.

In a valiant suffering for others, not in a slothful making others suffer for us, did nobleness ever lie. Every noble crown is, and on earth will ever be, a crown of thorns.—Carlyle.

Mr. Carment's New Prayer*

"Geordie, dinna mak' a noise! Coorie doon when ye're passin' the parlor window!"

Geordie McCallum paused for a moment with his fingers on the sneck of the Manse gate. He could see nobody, but he knew that the command which had come to him in a loud whisper was from Rob Carment. With the instinctive loyalty only to be found among boys, he obeyed the order, and crept softly up the garden path, bending down as he passed below the parlor window so that no one might see him from within. When he reached the back-yard he found Rob waiting for him on the top of the water barrel, from which point of vantage he had been watching his progress from the burn at the angle of the turnip field up to the Manse gate.

"What's wrang wi' ye?" he asked. For Geordie had the freedom of the Manse, and had not been accustomed to skulk under the windows like a criminal.

"There's naethin' wrang. But they're at fem'ly worship, and I dinna want them to ken I'm ootbye."

"Hoo are ye no' there yersel'?" Geordie inquired in deep astonishment. To be able to escape from family worship at the Manse seemed something like a miracle to him.

"I am there. At ony rate I was there, but I slippit oot when Uncle Wullie got started wi' the prayer. He tak's a quarter o' an oor till't, and I'll be back afore he's through. But we maun'na be pittin' aff time. Hev ye gotten the mappy wi' ye?"

"Ay, here it's," and Geordie drew a little slate colored rabbit out of the leather school-bag that hung over his left shoulder.

"Eh, losh, it's bonnie!" Rob exclaimed in unrestrained admiration as he took the mappy out of his friend's hands and began to stroke its long, soft ears. "I'll gie ye my knife and a dizen o' bools for't. Will ye swap?"

"Ay, I'll swap. But ye promised me ane o' yer white anes when it's auld enough to leave its mither, forbye the knife end the bools."

Geordie never allowed friendship to interfere with business.

"Ye'll get a whitey too, if ye like. They'll be ready afore a fortnicht. Come roond and help's t' pit this ane in the box."

The boys were busy about the mappies, when Rob suddenly broke away from his friend and darted towards the back door.

"I'll hae to rin in and see where they are," he cried as he was disappearing round the end of the stable.

After an absence of about half a minute he was back at the mappies again.

"It's a' richt," he explained. "Uncle Wullie's only half through. He's at—'Have mercy on the heathen in their blindness bowin' down to stocks and stones. Enlighten the dark places o' the earth, which are still the abodes o' wull worship, supersteeion, and horrid cruelty.' It'll tak' him near six meenits t' feenish. There's plenty time."

Rob's imitation of his uncle's tones made Geordie open his eyes. He scarcely knew whether his friend's profanity ought to be admired or deplored. But there was no time to discuss things then. The six minutes would soon pass.

Rob shut the slatery into the special box he had spent a whole Saturday in making, and in about five minutes after his last excursion, he hurried back to listen at the parlor-door again.

"Shut the big kist, Geordie," he trumpeted in a whisper through his hands on his return. Time was precious now, and he could not trust himself to go farther than the kitchen door. "I'll hae t' gang in. He'll be upsides wi' the Jews in a meenit, and syne there's naethin' but the Queen and the High Court o' Perlyment."

Rob got back to the parlor in time to settle himself devoutly on his knees just as Mr. Carment was finishing the last sentence of his prayer. But the boy was a little astray in his calculations that morning. He had drawn one foot gently up again where the "Amen" should have come in, so that no time might be lost in getting back to Geordie and the mappies. But Mr. Carment did not say "Amen" in the usual place. At the prayer, which Rob had never known to be varied, he paused for a second or two and then added in a softened voice this new petition—"O Lord Jesus, be gracious to one who has trusted and loved Thee in the face of much discouragement. Hearken to her prayer and spare the life of her only son. And if we have offended one of Thy little ones, forgive us, for Thy mercy's sake, Amen."

Rob rose quietly from his knees with a new feeling of awe in his heart that he could not have explained. He stole a quick glance at the Minister's face. The thin lips trembled, and there were tears in the kind gray eyes.

"What's wrang wi' Uncle Wullie?" he whispered to Janet McCormick, when they had withdrawn from the room and were standing in the passage behind the parlor door.

"I canna tell ye, laddie," the housekeeper replied in a troubled voice. "Maister Carment maun hae somethin' on his mind. We'll hear aboot it, efter a bit, may be."

If Janet McCormick had known how the Minister spent the evening before his new prayer was spoken, she would have understood what it meant. Between seven and eight o'clock he was passing through the little village of Tomnamoan, which lay about a mile and a half to the west of the Kirk. Eppie Scott ran out to tell him that the woman who lived "through the wa'" from her was in deep trouble. Her son was ill with fever, and the doctor gave little hope of his life. Mr. Carment hesitated. He had never crossed the threshold of Ellen Fleming's cottage since this son was born, more than sixteen years before. There was no one in the Glen who had a kinder heart, or was less likely to cherish an ill-feeling against any human being. But a sense of sacred duty seemed to make it imperative

ARMY TRIALS

An Infantryman's Long Siege.

This soldier's tale of food is interesting.

During his term of service in the 17th Infantry in Cuba and Philippines, an Ohio soldier boy contracted a disease of the stomach and bowels which all army doctors who treated him pronounced incurable, but which Grape-Nuts food alone cured:

"In October, 1899, when my enlistment expired, I was discharged from the Army at Calulute, Philippines, and returned to the States on the first available steamer that left Manila. When I got home I was a total wreck physically and my doctor put me to bed saying he considered me the worst broken-down man of my age he ever saw, and after treating me 6 months he considered my case beyond medical aid.

"During the fall and winter of 1900 and '01 I was admitted to the Barnes Hospital in Washington, D. C., for treatment for chronic inflammation of the stomach and bowels, but after 5 months returned home as bad as ever.

"I continued taking medicine until February, 1902, when reading a newspaper one day I read about Grape-Nuts and was so impressed I sent out for a package right away.

"The result is quickly told for I have used Grape-Nuts continually ever since with the best results, my health is so I can do a fair day's hard work, stomach and bowels are in good condition, have gained 40 pounds in weight and I feel like a new man altogether.

"I owe my present good health to Grape-Nuts beyond all doubt for medical science was exhausted." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Had he consulted any one of several thousand physicians we know of they would have prescribed Grape-Nuts immediately.

Lood in each pkg. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

that he should let the ban of the Church lie upon this woman until she professed penitence for her sin, in the form prescribed by the usage of three centuries. The Minister's hesitation did not last for more than a moment. He could not pass the door of any human creature who was in distress.

It was a dark night, and Ellen came to the door at the Minister's knock with a candle in her hand.

"Maister Carment!" she exclaimed when she saw who her visitor was. "Is that yersel?"

"Ay, Ellen, it's me. I am sorry to hear John has taken the fever so badly. Will you let me come in and see how he's doing?"

"Come in, sir, and thank you kindly. I wasna lookin' for a veesit."

She struggled hard to keep the tears back, but her voice betrayed the feeling that was working in her heart. As she led the way "ben" where the boy was lying in a restless sleep, the Minister could see by the light of the candle that her hard, weather-beaten face was lined with suffering.

"I couldn't pass your door when you were in trouble, Ellen," Mr. Carment began. "I felt that I must come in and try to comfort you. Are ye finding it hard to bear?"

"Oh, sir," the woman cried in a great outburst of the grief that had been storing itself in her heart for years, "why did ye no' come afore? It's been a waesome, lonely time, and there's few that's gien me a kind look or a guid word, altho' I've been tryin' hard to dae what's richt. I wad hae tell't ye everything. I was only a bit lassie then, and if I did wrang, ye dinna ken hoo sairly I wes mishan'ld. But I couldna gang afore the Sayshion, I couldna dae't. Ye shouldna hae made the wy so hard, sir. The Maister wouldna hev done it Himsel'. The puir body that cam t' Him aff the streets and washed His feet wi' her tears wasna Sayshioned. And I gaed straight t' Him, Maister Carment, altho' I couldna gang t' the Kirk. He's forgi'en me lang syne, and He's helpit me wi' my burden a' th' lonesome years. The doctor says my laddie winna get better. But I canna believe 't. The Lord'll no' leave me in the warl' my lane. He kens it's been a sair enough wrastle wi' the laddie t' cheer me, and if he was ta'en—"

Ellen could bear up no longer. She fell on her knees at the bedside of her son and gave herself over to a passion of weeping.

The Minister waited until she had risen from the floor and grown somewhat calm again.

"Ellen," he said, and his voice had a thrill in it that showed how deeply his heart was touched, "I'm afraid I've been very unlike the Master to you. You'll have to speak to Him to have mercy on the Minister when ye're at your prayer to-night."

"Oh, sir, I wadna dare to blame ye. I didna mean ye t' tak' what I said that wy. Ye couldna dae but what ye thocht was richt. A'body in the Glen kens that. And maybe it was a' for the best."

"Well, well, good-night to you, Ellen. We'll have more to say about it yet. I see the laddie's sleeping more easily now. Keep to your faith. Come what will, it'll carry you through."

Mr. Carment got into the way of calling in at Ellen Fleming's cottage very frequently. He grew to reverence her as her true character got gradually clear to him. She had kept her spirit sweet and gentle in the midst of her loneliness, and the Minister knew that it must have been a hard thing to do.

After a sore struggle the boy began to recover, and in six weeks he was fairly convalescent. Mr. Carment met him one afternoon walking with his mother round the Black Knoll about a mile to the east of Tomnamoan.

"I'm glad to see you getting about again, John," he said. "You'll be able to come to the Kirk on Sabbath eight days."

"But that's the Saicrament, is it no', Maister Carment?" Ellen inquired.

"Yes, and that's why I want you to come to the Kirk. You'll both come to the table, and we'll all be the better for seeing you there."

"But what'll the Sayshion say till't?" Ellen asked, with a return of her old dread.

"The Elders are all anxious to give John and yourself the right hand of fellowship. They're seeing things in a new light now, like myself."

Ellen's eyes filled with tears. "We'll come, Maister Carment," she answered, "an' may the Lord bless ye for yer kindness. It's a new life we're livin' noo, the laddie an' me. The verra broom smells sweeter than it did."

On the communion Sabbath Ellen Fleming and her son sat in the Manse seat with Janet McCormick. When the Sacrament was about to be dispensed, and as the congregation began to lift the thirty-fifth Paraphrase to "Rockingham's" sweet and solemn strains, they crossed over to the first pew in front of the pulpit and took their places among the communicants.

Ellen's first Sacrament is spoken of in the Glen to this day. No one had ever seen Mr. Carment so deeply stirred. He made the people feel that he had been seeing some things in a new light. When he was giving out the bread and wine he departed a little from his usual custom. Instead of handing them to the Elders to take to the people he carried them himself to the end of the first pew. From the Minister's own hands Ellen Fleming and her son took their first Sacrament. A hush as of death filled the Kirk. There were few eyes that were quite dry; and the older folk felt that the Sacrament had got a deeper meaning for them that day than they had ever seen in it before.

Fare You Well, O Winter.

Fare you well, O, Winter, with all your wrath and wrong!
There's a mocking-bird a-singing, and his heart is in the song!
He's singing of the May
And the things the flowers would say,—
He's singing you away, Winter, singing you away!

Fare you well, O, Winter,—In dim and daisied dells
I hear the tinkle-tinkle of the thrush's silver bells!
With blue skies for the gray,
The music dreams of May,—
It's singing you away, Winter, singing you away!

Fare you well, O, Winter,—No more the hills you know;
We'll pelt with reddest roses the armies of the Snow!
The Spring-time bugles play
Where the world makes holiday:
Life's singing you away, Winter, singing you away!

A St. Louis Catholic priest objects to Mr. Folk's "preacher following." He wants "the people to do their own house-cleaning." If Protestants are "absolutely bereft of available saints," as the priest declares, it is a good thing that the preachers are getting to work to produce some. But then we thought that Ed. Butler and most of his "Indians" were Catholics. We would have no quarrel at all with the priestly editor if he would get just a little of the saintly character into these ringsters. There would then be much less call for preachers to enter politics.

NO PLACE

The Lazy Ones Must Stand Aside.

That dull heavy feeling from coffee may not amount to much in itself but it's a great obstacle in the way of fame and fortune for it kills ambition and makes one lazy and finally sick.

The successful men or women must first conquer themselves. The way to conquer that dull, stupid feeling 9 times out of 10 is to pay a little attention to proper food, coffee in particular will dull the senses and make one feel lazy and stupid after the first effects of the cup have worn off an hour or so after drinking it.

"I was a lover of coffee," says a New York man, "It seemed to me breakfast was nothing without it but I noticed an hour or so after breakfast a dull, stupid feeling came over me accompanied frequently by nausea.

"Thinking perhaps it was caused by coffee I wanted to make sure of it so I gave up the use of coffee and drank Postum in its place. My old trouble disappeared and I learned to look forward to my Postum with as much eagerness as I used to look to coffee and instead of being bad in its effect, Postum is very healthy and I feel 'fit as a lord' right along. Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason why Postum helps toward fame and fortune when used in place of coffee, the drug-drink.

News From Many Fields

Southern California.

Our several new preachers are becoming nicely adjusted to their respective fields. Thus A. B. Markle is leading the fight in Anaheim for a closed Sunday and a dry town; J. I. Myers is commanding attention at Downey, where our oldest church in these parts, for years at a standstill, is moving forward with banners flying; C. R. Moore is bringing unity out of strife and order from chaos at Santa Paula; the San Jacinto church, pastorless from the death of the sainted Stewart, eight months since, has resumed its place of dominant influence under the efficient ministry of J. S. Beckner; D. W. Misener is already secure in the confidence and love of the brethren at Orange, where he ministers to the people; and W. B. Taylor has the lines well in hand for a vigorous work at Santa Ana.

The past eight weeks have brought great inspiration and life to many of our congregations. When Crabtree and McKnight held the best meeting in the history of the San Diego church, they set the pace for our "winter's work" in this southern coast. The best proof that our churches continue to be evangelical is that they are intensely evangelistic. Especially fruitful in results, both direct and indirect, were the labors of Newcomer and Wilhite at Glendora, C. R. Moore and Miss Grace Stewart at Santa Paula, Utter and Dowling at Covina, Hay and Shepherd at Hollywood, Shie and McHatten at San Bernardino.

H. E. Wilhite, who has done such heroic work at Oknard, has accepted a call to the church at San Bernardino and begins work April 15.

The church at Long Beach has completely outgrown its old quarters, and is building a new house of worship. They broke ground for this new edifice on March 29 and expect to complete it by Aug. 1.

R. P. Shepherd has accepted the pastorate of the church at Ramona. He began his ministry with a series of special meetings, which have been greatly blessed of the Lord. This splendid church has bright prospects for the future and great things will be expected of her.

Cards are out announcing the dedication of the new church at Covina on April 10. F. M. Dowling will assist the pastor, J. W. Utter, and the church in the special labors of this great day for them. All the saints rejoice and congratulate this prosperous church and pastor who like to stick to each other so well.

J. M. Philput and wife are expected this week from Phoenix. He is ready for service again, and will preach in this section for a time.

Nebraska.

W. B. Harter preached at Ord on the 3rd.

Frank West has been called to the work at Craiga, and has already entered upon his service.

E. C. Davis has accepted the work at Red Cloud. It is confidently expected that this is the beginning of a new era for this work.

W. T. Hacker has spent two Lord's days in Iowa recently.

W. H. Newby, of Guthrie, O. T., preached at Geneva on the 3rd. He is at Friend for a short time on business.

A. W. Henry, the veteran preacher at Nelson, has been quite sick recently. He held a meeting with his home church and added 10 thereto.

O. A. Adams has received a call to serve the church at Valparaiso indefinitely. He reports the Putman-Egbert meeting as having greatly benefited the church.

C. V. Allison was called to Greeley Center by some brethren living there. He found about 20, and added five more by baptism, and has organized them into a congregation. Bro. Allison preaches half time at Palmer.

The secretary supplied at Ansley on the 3rd. He will supply there again on the 17th, and on the 24th dedicate the new church house at Kingston, on Clear Creek. This building is nearly finished, and the brethren are getting anxious to get the Bible-school and church work moving again.

It is reported to me that Eddyville church will soon be ready to dedicate their new house.

Ulysses is raising funds preparatory to moving their church house onto the new site in the center of town, and add to it. They will have a fine plant when finished. Brother Maxwell is hard at work.

The secretary spent the last Lord's day in March at York. The state work was given the right of way in the morning, and the pastor, Bro. E. B. Widger, preached in the evening. I find the work in good shape here under Brother Widger's care.

The campus at Cotner University and the state convention camp grounds are being supplied with some additional trees. This is the beginning of a movement for the beautifying and improvement of these grounds. The good-hearted nursery man, Brother Galbraith, at Fairbury, has donated about 100 trees for the purpose. On Arbor Day, the 22nd inst., a program befitting the occasion will be given at the University.

There was one young man baptized at the First Church in Lincoln on the evening of the 3rd.

District conventions have been arranged as follows: No. 1 will convene at Falls City, April 11-13. A full attendance is desired. District No. 2 will meet at Firth, May 4-6. This has been placed late in the week in order that the C. E.'s, who have the last evening, may be present in force.

District No. 7 will meet at Hastings, April 26-28. This is the first time the district convention has met there for many years. Let the district send in a splendid delegation. The railroads run to Hastings from all parts of the district.

District No. 6 will meet at David City, June 14-16. This place, too, is easy of access to all parts of the district.

District No. 3 will meet at Valparaiso. District No. 4 will meet at Wakefield early in June.

F. L. White will close his work at Arapahoe on the 10th, and Bro. J. W. Walker will close at Wakefield about the same time.

The Pulpit Supply Committee will meet in Lincoln on the morning of April 21, and the State Board of the N. C. M. S. in the afternoon.

W. A. BALDWIN.

Lincoln.

Canton Notes.

At J. V. Coomb's meeting there were seven additions by confession and one by letter. Brother Coombs has won the esteem of all during his short stay in our city, and has been called to hold another meeting next year.

There will be nearly twenty in the graduating classes of the University in June, and in the near future there will be about ten to receive ordination. A number of the preachers who finished the six and seven years' work are being called to preach in various states of the Union, and it is expected that two or more of our volunteer mission band will go into the home or foreign mission work.

Brother Rains filled our appointment recently at Hunnewell and received two additions by letter; and on last Lord's day two others were added, so the work continues to grow.

Prof. Ingall's father died at his home between Wyaconda and Luray, Mo. Dr. Dungan conducted the funeral at Luray. Eleven children survive, five of whom have been connected with Christian University, either as teachers or students.

D. Dunkleberger is holding a meeting in Illinois at present, with good results.

The church at Myre, Ill., which has been without preaching for several years, is progressing nicely under charge of Brother Ha-gis, one of our student boy-preachers.

F. B. Lively, one of our best students, will leave in June for Oklahoma.

The new University building is now receiving the finishing work on the inside and will be ready for occupancy in the near future.

Most of our preachers have meetings to hold during vacation, hence there is no vacation for the theological students, as they realize that they must be about the Master's work.

Greater New York.

Bro. Benjamin L. Smith has received the following appeal:

In any conflict, both wit and wisdom say strike where each blow will count the most.

Greater New York is the world under one municipality—not in miniature, but a mighty conglomerate of faith and no faith, an immense factor in the destiny of nations, and the key to the future of America.

As I view the situation, there are three apparent specific reasons why the Disciples of Christ should besiege the strongholds of this metropolis:

1. The heathen from every clime are here in large colonies—virtually cities within a city. For example, Italy has a population making a district second in size to any Italian city in the world—300,000 of them, an increase of 200 per cent since 1898. Of our 3,500,000 population, less than half attend churches of any kind, and the fact that each church is matched against (and I fear sometimes with them) 20 saloons, makes the menace more grave. We have more Jews than has modern Jerusalem, and our whole population is alarmingly heterogeneous, and Christianity is the only sufficient assimilator.

2. Believers who have caught a vision of Christian union are found here in many fellowships. There never was a time or place in all the achievements of the past when the preaching of the gospel promised better results. What is known as "our plea" should be abundant in proclamation and rich in fruitage for such a time as this.

3. Disciples from all over the world emigrate to New York. They are scattered all over this "city of magnificent distances." If we would save them to the cause, we must make it possible for them to be at work. They must be gathered together in companies, making each group a nucleus for a church. We appreciate what has already been done by the Home Board for this city.

Speak to the entire brotherhood, that we all go forward, that we may take and hold for our God "The Eastern Gateway" to our American commonwealth.

M. E. HARLAN.

Washington State News.

Washington churches have quite generally and, it is hoped, generously given to foreign missions this year. Now while enjoying the privilege of giving, let all plan large gifts for the May offering for home missions.

Tacoma First Church made the largest offering in her history toward the one-fourth million asked for by the F. C. M. S., and has already "set the stakes" for the most liberal gifts through the A. C. M. S. that this church has ever made.

The program for the state convention is about ready for publication. It has, besides many of our state workers, the names of W. F. Richardson, F. M. Rains, E. C. Sanderson and others from beyond our state lines. The convention will be held in North Yakima, June 13-17. Royal welcome awaits the representatives of the churches as they shall come to "Yakima the Beautiful." The writer remembers with pleasure the willing hospitality of that church when he was pastor there some ten years ago.

J. W. Allen, of Spokane (Dean Ave. Church), reports many accessions and the work in most flourishing condition.

So many of "our people" coming west are lost to the cause. Cannot those pastors who know of members of the church who contemplate moving to the coast send a letter or card giving name and address of such members to the minister in that part where they intend to locate? If you do not know the name of the minister there, write to me and I shall see that he or some other member of the church gets into communication with them.

Tacoma people had the privilege of first seeing a considerable section of the St. Louis Fair when the ship load of Filipino natives landed here. Poor fellows, many of them were sorry looking specimens of American citizens. They learn very fast, however, and make really remarkable progress in a very short time. A young Filipino who came to this country with returning troops has passed through the 8th grade of the public schools in this city with honors, and his oratory in the graduating exercises was equaled by very few of the white youths who had part in the program.

The gospel for all lands should be our constant theme. It is the great civilizing as well as saving power of God.

MORTON L. ROSE.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Button campaign in this state is opening with much interest, and the first reports are good for marked increase in attendance and offering. If your school has not enjoyed the stimulus coming from this little device, then open the campaign immediately. Circulars and other information free.

M. J. Nicoson reports their campaign drawing to a close, with genuine enthusiasm in all the departments of the school, and the offerings fine.

Rolla is not in the condition it was when R. B. Havener was with them, and needs some active, devoted young man, giving time and thought to the work, mixing and intermixing with the people, knowing and winning the young men in the School of Mines, and otherwise "lending a hand"; the work will never amount to much until the brethren have it so. Only one of the resident men present the Sunday I was with them, while three young men from the School of Mines were at work in the Bible-school, worthy and capable boys from Plattsburg and Maryville, a credit to their parents and of good service to the Master. W. F. Criswell bears the burden in the school, but seems determined in it, while some faithful women were anxious for the cause in Rolla. I promised them that T. J. Head should help put the work in order soon. We cannot afford to let Rolla suffer, at any sacrifice.

W. A. Moore was arranging to canvass Worth county with J. A. McKenzie when such a plea came from Wellsville, one of our best friends, that we could not ignore it without doing wrong, so he is now there putting everything in order, and hopes to locate a good man before leaving them, after which he must do Bible-school work until the convention. Brethren, you put him in the northwest district for this purpose; now let him do it, and in the summer and fall give himself to other lines of the service; but Bible-school work must be done now and until the Carrollton convention.

T. J. Head was much hindered at Coldwater, but did good work with good results, reorganizing the school and shaping up the congregation, and is now at Mine LaMotte, where the cause drags badly by removals and death.

Some of the schools are very helpful in sending in their apportionments, so that the men are paid for March, but others must respond right away if we keep them in the work desired and so very much needed until the convention. The fields, especially where Brethren Head and Havener work, are not remunerative, even the better schools and congregations doing but little, and the greater part of them absolutely nothing, so that their support must come from those more liber-

All Humors

Are impure matters which the skin, liver, kidneys and other organs can not take care of without help, there is such an accumulation of them.

They litter the whole system.

Pimples, boils, eczema and other eruptions, loss of appetite, that tired feeling, bilious turns, fits of indigestion, dull headaches and many other troubles are due to them.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills

Remove all humors, overcome all their effects, strengthen, tone and invigorate the whole system.

"I had salt rheum on my hands so that I could not work. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla and it drove out the humor. I continued its use till the sores disappeared." Mrs. IRA O. BROWN, Rumford Falls, Me.

Hood's Sarsaparilla promises to cure and keeps the promise.

ally inclined or better taught in supporting those working for humanity and Christ.

At Corinth, Webster county, R. B. Havener had a fine meeting with 22 additions, the Bible-school organized, the congregation put in order and the brethren greatly encouraged. And yet not a school in Webster, save Seymour, has thus far helped our work, only as some help was given Brother Havener. Only two schools in the county ever help, Marshfield and Seymour, and these will both help this year, as in the past; but we need help now, and it should be given us now. Every school in the southwest district should help Havener, and every school in the southeast district should help Head. But will they?

Why Help Home Missions?

1. Because the nearest duty is the first duty, and our home land needs the gospel. Negroes, Jews, Indians and foreigners by the millions are among us, and the Disciples are doing nothing for them.

2. Because there remaineth yet very much land for us to possess. In the central states we are strong, but north and south, east and west, we are almost unknown. Among 26,000,000 persons on the North Atlantic seaboard, we number but 21,000, or but one member in 1,238 persons. In this territory is a city of 265,000 in which we have no church; ten miles distant another of 160,000 in the same condition; in the same state two other cities of above 100,000, each of which we confess the same thing, and a score of others with from 20,000 to 75,000 people, among whom we do not know of even scattered Disciples.

3. Because the people are ready for the gospel as we preach it. We hold the greatest evangelistic meetings in all portions of our country. So many preachers from various denominations come to us that we scarce record their coming, and thousands of their members come without mention from our preachers. A year ago a whole congregation of Methodists in Lansdowne, Md., came to us; more recently a congregation of Baptists in Michigan. Last June our score of members in Gloversville, N. Y., met in a third floor hall and were poor, obscure, disheartened and divided. Help from our missionary societies put them in a nice chapel, all paid for, on a splendid corner lot, gave Christian Endeavor of 45, Sunday-school of 150, and church of 111, to which there are almost weekly additions. Help to reap this ripe field.

4. Because our society has a good record. It employed 339 persons last year at an average cost of about $160. These workers added above 14,000 members to our congregations and organized 121 new churches. It has baptized 116,000 persons and has been instrumental in organizing about 3,000 of our congregations. Have fellowship in this great work!

5. Because we need money as never before. Calls are more loud and numerous than ever. We need every dollar of the $200,000 asked. Indeed it could all be wisely used on the Atlantic seaboard. Make the largest personal contribution you ever made, this year, and see that your congregation's offering is a record breaker.

WM. J. WRIGHT.

Washington, D. C.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

At the last [state] convention, the girls of Wm. Woods College pledged $25 on our special money, to be applied on Miss Burgess' support. It is on its way to headquarters. Let all pledges and apportionments for the special work be sent as promptly as these dear girls' gift. Pres. J. B. Jones guides them to be prompt and missionary in spirit.

We hope that much friendly rivalry among the auxiliaries will mark the campaign for Tidings during May. Missouri ought to have at least fifty auxiliaries on the "Tidings Honor Roll." Have you noted this "roll"?

A Junior Society of twenty-seven members is organized at Malden by Mrs. J. M. Witting, who is also president of the auxiliary there.

Mrs. M. A. Fowler, of Nevada, writes: "Our Junior superintendent and her Juniors rendered the 'Fairies' last Sunday to a full house and took up an offering of about $10." How many Juniors did as well? Each one can make an effort. Don't you know how much the boys and girls at Monterey need a school, and the orphan boys in Porto Rico need a home? They must wait until American Christian boys and girls send the money for the buildings. Will you not help them?

Is America Worth Saving?

No casual answer of "yes" or "no" will suffice. It is a momentous fact whichever way the truth demands reply. We cannot answer "no" and be indifferent in our action to what that means. We cannot seriously answer "yes" and fail to be moved with the power of a passion for her redemption.

What are the facts? 50,000,000 unchurched people are involved. We call ours a Christian nation, yet five out of every eight have no affiliation with any church. Thirty million Christians are called to evangelize fifty million and more unconverted.

How are we succeeding? To-day the church's increase in communicants is virtually the same as the nation's increase in population, while fifty million are remaining a permanently unsaved residuum. As a brotherhood, we gave last year eight cents a piece to evangelize America outside our own communities. Shall we say that our individual interest in America's redemption is to be represented by eight copper cents? It is so recorded for last year. Our secretaries do not make the facts. We have ourselves done that and asked them to record them. If America is worth the saving, let not one who so believes delay the Kingdom's advance or do himself the violence consequent upon an indifference to our Lord's positive command to "go."

End of the Galilean Ministry.

The third period of the Galilean ministry embraced the events during the sojourn in the far north (including Peter's confession and the transfiguration) and certain important episodes and discourses after the return to Galilee. It is to be remembered that He is now teaching His disciples—the Twelve, and perhaps also a somewhat larger group of less intimate associates—and not primarily making a popular appeal. This fact is reflected in several passages. For example, after the healing of the demoniac boy in the north country, Jesus came back to Galilee, "and He would not that any man should know it." The discourses of this period are not popular addresses, but are given to the disciples. In this class are the discourse on humility (Mark 9:33-37), the discourse on tolerance and charity (Mark 9:38-42), the discourse on influence and forgiveness (Matt. 18:6-35).

At the Feast of Tabernacles.

John's Gospel gives us information of a visit which Jesus made to Jerusalem probably about this time to attend the Feast of Tabernacles (John 7:1-52). He went secretly, not for fear of the priests and Pharisees, but because, He said, "My time is not yet fulfilled." He was unwilling to bring upon Himself the fate which He knew would be His, until He had so prepared His disciples that they would be competent bearers of His message. But when He reached Jerusalem He taught openly. Perhaps He was overcome by the impulse which is felt by every true lover of men who has a burning message and finds himself in the midst of those who need it. So now He uttered some discourses, not to the disciples, but to the public, even to the hostile and critical public. Some of these sayings might almost be called intentional riddles: "Yet a little while I am with you, and I go unto Him that sent me," "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me and drink." Others were among the sublimes of all His utterances, such as the discourse on the Light of the World (John 8:12-30), and the one on freedom through truth (John 8:31-59). This whole episode, not recorded in the Synoptic Gospels, is motivated and illumined at every step by a consciousness of His impending death and a willingness to suffer for the world's redemption. Nowhere does Jesus appear more divine or more fully the Savior of the world than in the discourses and incidents connected with this visit to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles—a visit begun in secrecy but ended in publicity.

The Perea Ministry.

After this visit to Jerusalem, Jesus returned to Galilee; for how long a time, we do not know. Probably this last sojourn was of some duration, for just before His last visit to Jerusalem He had said, "My time is not yet come," and now when He is again leaving Galilee it is said (Luke 9:51) that "the days were well-nigh come that He should be received up." Then He bids His last farewell to Galilee—the land of His early life, of His longest ministry and of His best friends, the land where He could teach freely when it was no longer safe for Him to go to Judea—and turns His face toward Jerusalem. Most of the time from the departure from Galilee until the final arrival at Jerusalem was spent in the region east of Jordan, a vaguely defined region known as Perea. The final crisis, the tragic end of His earthly life, is now almost constantly before His mind. He is telling His disciples about it. He is preparing them for the continuation of His work and giving them practice in the ministry which they must carry on. He is sorrowing for the rejection of Himself by so many of those whom He would save. But He is never shrinking from the fate which He knows is about to overtake Him.

The Sending of the Seventy.

On an earlier occasion the Twelve had been sent out two and two for a preaching and healing tour. Now a larger group is instructed and sent out to visit especially those towns through which Jesus would pass on His journey. Their duty was to be "to heal the sick and say, The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." They were to go without equipment of money or food, so that one test of the success of their work would be their ability to make such a favorable impression as would secure for them the means of subsistence. This is the economic test to which all Christian institutions are submitted. Ability to get the means of living must always be considered as one test of fitness to live.

But the seventy were not to go as beggars. They were not to go from house to house seeking a lodging place. They were to preserve their dignity and be in no sense mendicants. The church has not always heeded this part of the Master's instructions as carefully as it has cherished the sentiment that "the laborer is worthy of his hire."

Lesson Thoughts.

The harvest is plenteous. Jesus viewed the world as a field of good grain. There are tares in it, but it is not essentially a field of tares. Jesus believed in humanity.

Pray, ye, therefore, etc. (v. 2). Aside from the petitions in the Lord's Prayer, the only thing which Jesus explicitly told His disciples to pray for was a more ample supply of reapers for this harvest. The church should devote more of its prayers and more of its energies to the work of supplying and training laborers for the Lord's harvest field.

Salute no man (v. 4). The social relationships of life are not to be permitted to become entanglements. Neither by precept nor by example did Jesus enjoin upon His disciples separation from the world. But all social relations, as all domestic relations, are to be subordinated to the main purpose of life, which is the advancement of the kingdom of God.

Your peace . . . shall return to you (v. 6). Christ's Gospel brings peace, but only to those who freely receive it. The most unpeaceful life is that which rejects Christ.

He that heareth you, heareth Me (v. 16). Christ's representatives in the world are not perfect, and the church has its faults. But one cannot reject and ignore them on the ground of their real or supposed imperfections, and still be true to Christ. The duty of those who believe in Christ and the principles which He taught, must be found in alliance with the forces and organizations which represent the forces of righteousness.

A MILLION FROM A MILLION LEAVES A MILLION MORE.

That is to say, a million dollars from a million disciples for Home Missions would not impoverish, but enrich. Every heart would be rich toward God. Every contributor would be confident of treasure laid up in heaven. The cause of Christ would be set forward a decade. We ought to average one dollar a member for Home Missions.

We are asking for only $200,000 this year to answer the appeals which already amount to double our spendable income of last year.

THE EXTENSION OF THE KINGDOM.—

Matt. 6:10.

"Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth." It is instructive to notice how important a place the kingdom of God holds in the teaching of Jesus. The first beatitude is "Blessed are the pure in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of God." The first formal petition in the prayer Jesus taught His disciples to say is, "Thy kingdom come"; and when He answered the question of all the ages, What is the supreme duty of man? He said: "Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all things shall be added unto you."

What is the kingdom of God? It is the divine sway which God exercises over the hearts and lives of men through the teaching, life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. It is a power within, purifying the heart and regulating the life, resulting objectively in the church as an organization of believers for the spread of the kingdom, and in molding the laws, customs and institutions of men. It is not meat nor drink, but "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit." It is not of this world, but is from God; yet it is in the world in order to bring it into subjection to the will of God.

Importance of extending it. The supreme purpose of the church is the spread of the kingdom of God among men. This work will not be completed until the will of God is done on earth as it is in heaven. There can be no real progress in civilization, in the welfare and happiness of the human race, except in and through the progress of the kingdom of God. It overshadows all other interests. No individual Christian, and no local church, is fulfilling his or its mission without seeking to promote the kingdom of God.

Methods of extending the kingdom. It has pleased God by the simplicity of preaching to save them that believe. That Christ relied very largely upon the preaching of His gospel, is indicated by His last command to His disciples. Paul's catechism on this subject is still timely: "How, then, shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach except they be sent?" (Romans 10:14, 15.) Men cannot pray to God unless they believe on Him; they cannot believe on Him until they have heard of Him; and they cannot hear of Him satisfactorily until the gospel is preached to them; and men cannot carry this gospel to all the world or unto those who need it most, without being sent.

This brings us to a very pressing and practical method of extending the kingdom: we may give liberally of our means for the sending out and support of qualified men to preach the gospel. This is what our churches are called upon to do the first Lord's day in May. Their offerings will go for the support of evangelists in our great country and its possessions, and the building up of churches. By our lives and characters, by our prayers, by our acts in relation to the home, society and the state, we may help or hinder the extension of God's kingdom in the world. By voting as we pray, by practicing what we preach, and by giving the kingdom of God the first place in our hearts, we may assist in its extension. In a word, by opposing everything that is contrary to God's will, and by aiding, to the extent of our ability, every interest that is carrying out God's will on earth, we shall help to bring about the fulfillment of the petition: "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

Prayer: Our Father who art in heaven, may Thy kingdom come more fully in our own hearts and lives, to the end that we may all work together more earnestly for the extension of Thy kingdom throughout all the earth, until Thy will shall be done here as it is done in heaven. In Christ's name. Amen.

Christian Endeavor.By H. A. Denton,
April 24.WHAT CHRIST CAN DO FOR DARKEST AFRICA.—Isa. 45:11-19.For the Leader.

We come this evening to study the possibilities of the religion of our blessed Lord toward Darkest Africa. Not that we doubt His ability to save there just as bountifully as in any other part of the earth, for we never question His power or ability, that is, if we accept Him at what the four evangelists declare Him to be to us, but for the good that the investigation will do us, let us look into it. A larger hope comes into our lives as we consider the wonderful possibilities of the way of our Lord among men. Because there is a periodical agitation of the negro question should not carry with it any hesitancy upon our part in approaching the discussion. It is not from the viewpoint of the partisan that we as Christians come to this investigation.

For the Members.

1. The ability of the people of Africa to live up to Christianity is not to come up for serious discussion at this day of the world. There was a time when some of high repute dared to say it was no use to make any efforts for certain peoples of low rank in the scale of the races. That time is gone with those who look into the matter from the standpoint of learning. Darwin doubted the ability of certain pagan people to receive the gospel of Christ, but, to his credit, long before many of smaller ability, he gave it up when the missionaries demonstrated the ability of the native to grasp the gospel, and the power of the gospel to save the native. He was for some time a contributor to the mission funds of the societies doing work among these peoples.

2. Those of us who have made such a frequent use of the case recorded in the Acts of Philip and the Ethiopian can find little ground to stand upon if we line up against the great work that should be undertaken in behalf of the black man both here and in Africa. That man heard the gospel and was anxious to obey it. He was given the opportunity by the faithful evangelist, and, having done so, he went on his way rejoicing as a new trophy of the gospel of the Lord in the land of the shadows of vice and sin and unmentionable crimes. The light was carried there by this Ethiopian, and long did it shine. But in the course of time the shadow of the blight of Mohammedanism was cast over the land. The followers of the Savior forgot, it would seem, the continent where it was so soon planted.

3. Robert Moffat and David Livingstone were the pioneers of the more heroic efforts that were made nearly a century ago for the salvation of the people of Africa. And speaking of Livingstone reminds us of the two faithful converts and attendants of Livingstone, Susi and Chuma. They were with him when he died, and they knew, simple children of this dark land as they were, that his journals and personal effects should be sent to his native land. But how was this to be done? It was fifteen hundred miles to the nearest coast from which the body could be sent. They prepared the body. But now that it was ready, how were they to get past all the superstitious tribes that filled the country on the way to the coast at Zanzibar? They braved the dangers, and in due time set sail for England. When they arrived in England, the people were slow to believe that these black men had brought the body of Livingstone from Africa. The body, however, was identified by a scar from a lion's maw, received long before upon the field of duty. As the funeral procession of Livingstone moved down Westminster Abbey, these two faithful men were placed at the head of the procession. The place of honor was given to them. That is what Christ can do for darkest Africa.

4. Let us not forget our own missionaries in Africa. Their names are as follows: E.

NATURE'S GREATEST CURE

An interesting letter to our readers from Hon. H. L. Dunham, Ex-Mayor of Dover, N. J.

Dover, N. J., Nov. 12th, 1902.

I had both kidney and liver trouble for over three years. I tried the best physicians in Washington, D. C., Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and Chicago, and regret to say that I received very little benefit until I commenced taking the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root. After taking the first bottle I noticed quite a change, which satisfied me that at last I had found the right medicine. I continued on until I had taken four bottles; by this time I noticed such a marked improvement in my health, in every way, that I felt satisfied I was cured. But, to be positive beyond a question or doubt, I was in Chicago during July, 1902, and went to the Columbus Medical Laboratory, No. 103 State St., and had them make a thorough and complete microscopical examination which showed my kidneys and liver to be perfectly well and healthy. I have their written report in my possession, signed by the doctors of the above Medical Laboratory, which is recognized as one of the best in the country.

Very truly yours,

Ex-Mayor of Dover, N. J.

The mild and prompt effect of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. Recommended and taken by physicians, used in hospitals and endorsed by people of prominence everywhere. To prove what Swamp-Root will do for you, a sample bottle will be sent absolutely free, by mail, also a book telling all about Swamp-Root and its wonderful cures. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and be sure to mention reading this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Swamp-Root, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y., on every bottle.

E. Faris, Mrs. E. E. Faris, Dr. Royal J. Dye, Mrs. Royal J. Dye, Dr. Edwin A. Layton, Mrs. Edwin A. Layton (now at home and destined for the China field), R. Ray Eldred, Mrs. R. Ray Eldred and two native helpers, all located at Bolengi, Africa. In our prayers let us bear them up to the throne of the Father.

Quiet Hour Thought.

O Lord, help Thy people to see their neglect of thy fallen children in darkest Africa.

Our Budget

—Offering for Home Missions, May 1.

—Let us see how much we can reduce the number of non-contributing churches in this great evangelistic movement for the evangelization of America.

—Winter is doing rather too much tarrying in the lap of spring to suit most of us, but rest assured his stay is brief.

—The Missouri Christian Lectureship is in session this week at Fulton. We shall report the same in our next issue.

—David Livingstone's daughter is endowing a hospital in his memory at Zamba, Africa.

—It is time for the church to believe that God can save a man in the spring or summer.

—We rejoice with Bro. W. C. Hull in the ingathering of souls and the removal of the debt.

—Walter D. Trumble's congregation at New Castle, Pa., have decided to build a new church.

—The Methodist year book for 1904 reports a gain of nearly one thousand churches during the year.

—A. B. Philputt, of Indianapolis, is to deliver the baccalaureate sermon at Kentucky University on June 5.

—S. D. Dutcher is going to leave Oklahoma City to enter upon the pastorate of the First Church at Omaha, Neb., May 1.

—Wren J. Grinstead and wife are coming to America by the steamship Sonoma, and are due at San Francisco on July 18.

—A memorial tablet to Toplady, author of "Rock of Ages," has just been set up in the parish church near which he was born.

—A. M. Harvuot began his ninth year on April 3 at Central Church, Cincinnati, with very large audiences and 24 additions.

—The thirtieth annual convention of the Southern Kentucky Christian Missionary and Sunday-school Association will be held at Corydon, May 23-26.

—There is at present no organic connection between many of the Protestant states' churches of Germany. A federation of forty-eight of these is now contemplated.

—A. R. Adams has been selected to deliver the memorial address at Fairfield, Iowa, this year. He will also be the orator for the Odd Fellows' anniversary to be held in that city April 16.

—B. B. Tyler is to begin a series of meetings in the Central Christian Church in Dallas, Texas, on April 17. He expects to be there until May 8, and can be reached in care of M. M. Davis.

—Chas. E. Robinson, a student of Missouri Bible College, has been employed one-fourth time for the rest of the year by the Barkersville congregation near Wainwright. He preaches also at Mountjoy and Cedar City.

—L. A. Chapman, of Grand Valley, Ont., has received a call from the church at Mechanicsburg, Ill., at a higher salary than he is now receiving, but has decided to remain where he is, at the importunity of the brethren.

—A disgruntled brother writes that after a year and six months spent with the Disciples he leaves them, "a wiser and better man." That is good, but it seems a pity to sever relations which make one "wiser and better." Judging from the tenor and tone of the letter, there is plenty of room yet for improvement in both the respects mentioned.

—B. B. Tyler, concluding some observations on his Palestine trip, says: "My interest in the Bible, and in all that pertains to the lands of the Bible, has been greatly increased by this journey. My faith in the Bible has been strengthened. I am more certain than ever before that the Bible is a supernatural book. I am sure that I am a better preacher and teacher as a result of this trip. I only regret that it was not made years ago. I cannot express fully my gratitude to God that he permitted me to make it."

—W. H. Harding, of Harristown, Ill., is to address the ministerial association of Decatur, April 25, on "Twentieth Century Problems for the Preacher." He will deliver the same address for the Sangamon county association in Springfield, May 9th.

—There is to be a grand rally for the benefit of the "Kimmel Memorial Hall," Whitney Ave., Washington, D. C., at an early date. W. L. Harris, minister, announces prominent speakers. The hall, now under construction, will seat 600.

—R. P. McPherson has gone to Dunkirk, N. Y., at the invitation of the state board, to take up the mission work organized by S. J. Corey last September. There is a Sunday-school, numbering 47, and a few faithful followers who keep up one service a day.

—The total receipts of the Foreign Missionary Society from March 3 to April 6 have amounted to $43,844.89. The total receipts from the churches for the same time have been $36,703.42. As compared with the same period last year, this is a gain of about $4,000.

—Some men think and act as if the fewer opportunities you gave men to give, the larger would be their gifts, and the stronger their interest would become in things in general. Such a policy only works one way, and that is to the death of the cause thus neglected.

—Luther A. Lowery has just been ordained to the ministry of the gospel. Bro. Ellis B. Harris, of Moscow, Idaho, under whose ministry this ordination has taken place, reports Brother Lowery as an estimable young man who will do much for the promulgation of the gospel.

—The picture on our front cover represents a characteristic piece of the broken southwestern scenery. New Mexico is one of the districts upon which the eye of the home board is now fixed. It has lately opened up work at Albuquerque, a growing and substantial town.

—We have received an invitation card to the dedicatory service of the West Side Church of Christ, Williams Street, near Second, Dayton, Ohio, of which G. B. Stewart is the pastor. The dedication was last Sunday, Pres. T. E. Cramblett, of Bethany College, being the chief speaker.

—J. S. Pierce, pastor of the church at Rutherford, Cal., is willing to correspond with anyone who desires to locate or purchase land in the neighborhood of Rutherford. It is always well to know somebody on the ground. Those seeking a western home might with profit correspond with Brother Pierce.

—The church building at Clintonville, Bourbon County, Ky., was dedicated last Lord's day, with Hugh McClellan, of Richmond, Ky., in charge. Bro. E. J. Fenstermacher, who had to resign at Charleston, S. C., owing to his wife's health, has taken up the work. C. E. Smith, of Pine Flats, Pa., succeeds at Charleston.

—We are in receipt of a letter from F. E. Udell, of this city, dated Havana, Cuba, April 6, in which he says he and his wife have had a "delightful tour of pleasure and rest, and have enjoyed good health." They have been down in the Barbado Islands, and expect to return via New Orleans, reaching this city about April 25.

—"Library Day," April 8, was made the occasion of raising a fund of several hundred dollars for the purchase of books for the beautiful new Bona Thompson Memorial Library of Butler College. A new portrait of Bona Thompson was shown for the first time on this occasion. Speeches by alumni and friends of the college were made, and the new president was among those present.

—Chas. M. Fillmore is preaching a series of popular Sunday night addresses in three divisions. Under the heading of Christ and the Individual he discusses Christ's attitude to the reason, imagination, affections, will and conscience. The second division is that of Christ and National Problems—the race problem, the labor problem and the liquor problem. Christ and Universal Questions discusses, first, Christ or Cæsar; second, Christ or Croesus; third, Christ or Epicurus.

—For forty-seven years the church building at Plymouth, Pa., has given excellent service, but the demands for larger space require that it shall be torn down and rebuilt. The farewell service to the old building was on Easter Sunday.

—D. G. Dungan, son of the honored and esteemed D. R. Dungan, entered upon his new pastorate at Braddyville on Easter Sunday. The occasion was a very joyful one, and the program in every way a success. The church at Blanchard will co-operate with Braddyville, both having extended a unanimous call to Brother Dungan.

—Last week the Foreign Christian Missionary Society received two gifts on the annuity plan, one of $1,000 from a friend in Ohio and one of $500 from the estate of the late J. F. Woodrow, Emporia, Kan., who provides in his will that $500 should be placed with the foreign society on the annuity plan in favor of his widow, Mary E. Woodrow.

—The Colorado Christian Herald, a live little monthly news sheet of what our churches are accomplishing in the silver state, has just completed its first year of publication. We have forty-two churches in Colorado, though all are not housed. For instance, there are thirty-eight members recently organized at Meeker, and the nearest sister church is 60 miles distant.

—The Christian churches of Indianapolis held a union service Lord's day before last at Tomlinson Hall. The large hall, in which it will be remembered our national convention was held a few years since, was packed. It is said to have been a great meeting with magnificent music and good speeches. Such union services do great good, and should be oftener held in our cities.

—We are not under law, but under grace. The old dispensation of law is past. We live in the new—the gospel dispensation. The old ceremonial law contained a bill of particulars, intended to regulate the conduct of the people in every detail. It was necessary that God should govern his people by rules then, but God does not govern his people that way now. He gives them principles, not rules.—The Word and Way.

It seems to us that we have read somewhere about Baptists, "once upon a time" making it a little warm for a preacher then in their fellowship, for preaching a gospel like that. But tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis.

—"89 confessions in conservative New England," So reports Bro. Teagarden of his church work. We agree with him that more men are needed in the East. Bro. Harlan is calling for help for New York City and Bro. Bowman makes a strong appeal for Chicago. Many of the big cities are in need of help. The Home Society can send the men when they get the money to help support the work until it has a chance to become self-supporting.

—The cyclones that we have been experiencing in this part of the world have done some damage to churches. The brethren at Willow Springs, Mo., are pleading for a small amount to repair the church at Pomona, which was partly destroyed on March 25. Only about $150 is needed. The Disciples there are a little band of struggling brethren who need some assistance in this special effort. Money may be sent to W. E. Gray, Willow Springs, Mo.

—Writing from Chu Cheo, Anhwei Province, China, our own missionary, William Remfry Hunt, says, "Once again the far East is in the furnace of war! Missions are prosecuting their work, at this writing, with the usual discretion and consecration. From all over the immense empire come rumors of rebellious risings. It is the popular conviction that the partition of the empire is imminent. The Chinese care little who is their emperor, or whether or not he be a Manchu or a Teuton. There is, however, among the better informed, the expressed prayer for progress, and in this lies the last hope of a deceived and yet awakening people, who can no longer lean for support on their arms, their gods, their rulers or their sovereign."

—Bro. F. F. Grim, who is and has for some time been, associated with the Christian Century in Chicago, is just about to open up a work at Metropolitan Hall, corner 44th Avenue and Harrison Street, Chicago, with the hope of establishing a "West End Church of Christ." Bro. Grim is one of the most consecrated young men we have ever met. He has intellectual attainments and his heart is thoroughly in the work. We trust he may be greatly blessed in the difficult undertaking to which he has set himself.

—R. A. Hopper, a minister well known in Kentucky, Tennessee and in the west, and who is now laboring at La Habra, Cal., will celebrate his 70th anniversary next Lord's day, April 17. His friends should remember this occasion and make it memorable by their tokens of love and appreciation. Brother Hopper has been, and is yet, a faithful and efficient servant of the Lord, combining the grace of saving common sense and a Christian spirit. We tender our congratulations to him, and wish him many happy returns.

—The Woman's Home Companion for April contains a two-page illustrated article by S. T. Willis, of New York City, on "The Disciples of Christ and Their Good Works." In addition to a brief historical sketch of the movement and statement of their position, there are cuts of Hiram College, Kentucky University, some missionary buildings in India and China, the Christian Orphans' Home in St. Louis, the Old People's Home at Jacksonville, and the old church at Hiram where Garfield preached. In addition to the cuts of colleges, there is reference to all our other institutions of learning, and our Bible chair work as well.

—Bro. McLean, at our request, gives the following brief expression of opinion: "In no previous year has so much interest been shown in the offering. More churches and more preachers manifested a determination to reach the full amount of their apportionment. Some gave twice as much as they were asked to give, and some gave five times as much. There can be no doubt that the missionary spirit is extending itself in ever widening and ever deepening circles. About twelve new churches have undertaken, to support a missionary each. We feel sure that more churches will respond this year than ever before, and that the offerings will average more."

—One of the first missionaries sent out by the F. C. M. S. was Bro. Holck, of Copenhagen. For many years Bro. Holck found his most efficient helper was the press. He published a paper that not only made him independent of financial support from the Society but increased his opportunities for reaching the people of Denmark with the gospel. Our mission in Mexico is putting out an admirable little paper every week, only a portion of which is printed in English. In the last number to hand we find right to the forefront an article on "Alexander Campbell, Reformador." May the reform that great man inaugurated take deep root in this land where Aztec priest and Spanish Jesuit so long held sway.

—Are we to have another ecclesiastical blizzard along with the other changeable spring weather? A cloud in the region of Cincinnati looks ominous. The question as to the periodicity of these elemental disturbances from that center, would be an interesting study. The weather prophets might look into this matter and see if the conjunction of planets is in any way responsible for these terrestrial phenomena.

—We are still a free people in spite of superficial appearances. Our churches elect their own pastors, retain them as long as they desire, dismiss them when they wish to, and select others without consulting the venerable prelate on the Tiber, or any Protestant rival. If our preachers go wrong, most of our congregations think they have sense enough to know what to do about it, and are independent enough to claim that they have the authority to deal with the situation.

—Some fine day a long-suffering brotherhood will demand to know by what right, any one man, because he happens to have access through the press to a large number of members, presumes to interfere with the rights of local congregations, missionary societies, and of chartered institutions of learning, and to disturb the peace and orderly progress of our whole movement by these periodical outcries of "unsoundness," which create suspicion, widen the lines of cleavage, and sow broadcast the seeds of discord. They will find "a more excellent way" of dealing with such aberrations from the faith as may from time to time occur.

—"We took the March offering at all points where we preach, but sickness and bad weather was against us, however we feel that whatever we may have lacked in money, Mrs. Blunt made up in a 'March offering' son, born March 28. We hope to give him to the service of the Lord. Mother and son are both doing well. We had just gotten moved into the new parsonage that the church had bought for him to come to. We have been reinforced of late in these parts, by George T. Smith, who comes from Winfield, Kan., and has bought a fruit farm four miles from this town, and will preach at different points along this railroad.

"J. R. BLUNT."

Richland, Mo.

—The local monthly meeting of the Bethany Baptist Church at Denver, Colo., announces thus a lecture by Dr. Tyler: "The 'Grand Old Man,' whose hair is the whitest and whose heart is the youngest that can be found among Denver's ministers, will tell us of his trip to the Holy Land. He has preached at Bethany and has expounded the Sunday-school lesson, and we know him as a thorough and enthusiastic Bible student, a speaker whose mingled earnestness and humor hold the absorbed attention. The whole country knows him as a member of the International Lesson Committee and president of the International Sunday-school Association. To hear such a man describe what he saw in Bible lands will be a great treat."

—No kind of business has made such rapid development as that which concerns itself with publicity. There was a time when men could not see the value of advertising, but nowadays it is a principle with many of the most successful business men that when they have a good article they must make the people know that they have it. The firm of N. W. Ayer & Son, of Philadelphia, is now the largest advertising agency in the United States. It has just celebrated its 35th anniversary. It was started by a father and son in a room only twenty feet square and with a capital of $250. "Father was the head, I was the office boy, and we were equal partners," said the present head of the firm in referring to the early days. Their first year's business amounted to $15,000, since which they have furnished to the newspapers of the United States a total of more than thirty-five million dollars of advertising. To-day they are dealing with more than eighteen thousand publications and are spending over three and a half millions a year. Their motto has been the well known Philadelphia one: "Keeping everlastingly at it brings success."

—At a general meeting of the board of the Mt. Cabanne and Central Christian churches of St. Louis, which have recently united, and whose property is now legally under the control of the Union Avenue Christian church, it was decided to take immediate steps to fill the pulpit. Frank G. Tyrrell has resigned his pastorate and desires to be released June 1, when he will enter upon lecture engagements. Howard T. Cree having gone to Atlanta, the pulpit of the Central church is now being temporarily supplied. Instead of having a lengthy interval it has been thought best to extend a call to Bro. J. M. Philpott, who has recently been at Phoenix, Ariz., but has just gone to California, with a view to accepting the permanent pastorate of the combined churches. It is hoped that arrangements will be made to have Mr. Philpott come to St. Louis as soon as possible and alternate between Central and Mt. Cabanne churches until the new edifice is ready for occupancy. Bro. Philpott is well known to the brotherhood. He was pastor in New York for seventeen years. St. Louis will give him a very cordial welcome, we are sure, should he see his way clear to come.

HEATHEN MISSIONS

First Sunday in June, 1904.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society furnishes supplies, free of charge, to Sunday-schools observing the day for Heathen Missions. Order at once. State number in school.

Address F. M. RAINS, Cor. Sec., Cincinnati, O.

—J. H. Smart, of Waukegan, Ill., goes to Danville, Ill., May 1, to take charge of the work there.

—Just as we go to press comes a telegram from J. T. Boone, announcing eighty additions to date in Bro. James Small's meeting at Jacksonville, Fla.

—Two men who have lived in Nebraska for half a century, and are perhaps the most prominent living exponents of tree planting in the west, will take part in the Arbor Day ceremony at Cotner University on April 22, when the Disciples of Nebraska will assemble in force at Bethany; for it is announced that Dr. George L. Miller and former Gov. Robt. W. Furnas will be the principal speakers. Special music will be provided and a general good time is in contemplation. The exercises will be under the direction of the Christian Citizens' Council, a newly organized missionary body composed of business and professional men. Those who intend to be present should notify Chancellor W. P. Aylsworth, that entertainment may be provided.

—It is always an unpleasant thing when church quarrels are so violent that they become the subject of newspaper notice. We regret that a factional fight seems to have broken out in a church called Christian at Huntsville, Ala., and according to the newspaper report, two elders and three members have been placed under arrest charged with wilfully defacing and injuring the church building. Among them was one who writes a good deal for one of our papers that has not been too kindly disposed towards any of the brethren who happen to occupy a different mental attitude from it. It is bad enough to have differences of opinion that lead to unpleasant words; it is utterly unpardonable for brethren worshipping together to undertake to settle these differences by injuring the poor church building.

The Growth of the Disciples of Christ.

Bro. M. L. Buckley, of Harrison, Ohio, has been compiling the number of additions reported in our religious journals for the last six months. His reports indicate that there have been 48,877 baptisms, 13,779 added by letter and 2,930 from the denominations uniting with our churches. As those coming by letter simply indicate changes from one congregation to another, we leave those out of consideration. Adding those turning to the Lord and those coming from the denominations we have 51,807 as the gross gain from Oct. 1 to April 1. To this must be added at least ten per cent of unreported persons coming into our churches. This would make 56,988. This is a most wonderful result. We are only limited in our accessions by the number of our ministers. There are thousands more ready to come into our churches if we had the ministers to present the gospel to them and care for them after they come. Brethren, do all in your power to help young men discover that they are called to preach the gospel of Christ, and by your liberal offering for home missions, on the first Lord's day in May, aid the American Christian Missionary Society to send out a larger number of laborers into the field.

Correspondence

Our Western Letter.

Did you ever hear this story? When Henry Ward Beecher was preaching in Indianapolis, Alexander Campbell visited the place and preached. Mr. Beecher called on him. Mr. Campbell presented to the brilliant and rising young preacher his conception of the Christian religion, especially his convictions on the union of Christians. The interview was full, frank, free. Mr. Beecher listened attentively and with a keen interest. After considering the subject he is reported to have said: "Mr. Campbell, you are right; but you are a hundred years ahead of the times. I cannot afford to throw away my life." Did you ever hear this story?

I have always regarded the story as apocryphal. I do not tell it now as an accurate statement of facts. Nevertheless, it may be an absolutely correct narrative. There may have been an interview between Henry Ward Beecher and Alexander Campbell, Mr. Beecher may have told Mr. Campbell that his positions were correct, that his teachings were sound, that he was a hundred years ahead of his time. It is certainly true that Alexander Campbell, on the problem of union among Christians, was far in advance of his generation. Of this I have no doubt. The world is now coming up to where Mr. Campbell was, in thought, when, in 1823, he began the publication of the Christian Baptist.

Amory A. Bradford has been for thirty years pastor of the First Congregational church in Montclair, New Jersey. He has been associated with Lyman Abbott as editor of The Outlook. He edited the Magazine of Christian Literature. After the death of Doctor Deems he became President of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy. A few years ago he visited Japan as a representative of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions to inspect the mission work carried on in the Sunrise Kingdom by this board. When he was President of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy he edited a volume of addresses delivered at the old Jamestown Chautauqua under his leadership by various persons of more or less distinction on the problem of Christian union. This book is published, I believe, by the Fleming H. Revell Company, New York, Chicago, Toronto. Doctor Bradford is now Moderator of the National Council of the Congregational Church.

In The Independent, New York, for February 4, 1904, he published an article entitled: "A Proposition for Christian Union." The first paragraph expresses the purpose of the paper—the current of his thoughts. I therefore quote the following:

"In many efforts for the unification of Christendom the mistake has been made of trying to unite those who are farthest apart, instead of those who are nearest together. There is more hope of success where there is least resistance. Therefore, union between Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Baptists, seems to me comparatively easy of realization. The object of this article is to point out a few facts in support of this statement."

Upon the foregoing permit me to remark:

1. The idea that believers who are most alike in their faith, concerning those things that are not essential to the integrity of the gospel, will first come together, is a common sense view. My division would be different from that of Doctor Bradford. I would say, let all who teach and practice the baptism of penitent believers, and of those only, and who believe that the form of baptism is immersion, come together. Let the great and growing Baptist family come together in unity and union. Let all Methodists ground their arms and unite in worship and work. It was the father and founder of Methodism who said: "I would to God that all party names and unscriptural phrases and forms which have divided the Christian world were forgotten, and that we might all agree to sit down together as humble, loving disciples at the feet of our common Master, to learn his word, to imbibe his spirit, and to transcribe his life in our own." Let those of the Presbyterian family join hands. This would be a beginning. Other steps will almost certainly be taken later in the direction of the unity and union for which our Lord prayed.

2. In my thought there is a difference between unity and union. Jesus prayed for both. His disciples now ought to pray and labor for both the inward unity and the visible oneness of Christian believers. Unity must precede union. Union will come as a result of unity. There is also a difference between Christian unity and church union. The heading of Doctor Bradford's paper in The Independent is "A Proposition for Christian Union." He then writes, and writes well, on church union. The New Testament writers have much to say on unity and union among those who believe on the Christ, nothing on church union. To you this may be a matter of no great importance. Agreed!

The April number of Everybody's Magazine contains an intensely interesting paper from the pen of Newell Dwight Hillis, D. D., entitled: "Consolidating the Churches." Dr. Hillis, as you know, is pastor of Plymouth church, Brooklyn, and is the author of a long list of books. He is one of our foremost thinkers, speakers, writers. You must read what he says on the union of Christians. I can give you only a hint of what he says in this remarkable paper.

The time in which we live is variously characterized as "the age of machinery," "the age of commerce," "the era of pedagogy," "the era of the diffusion of the beautiful," "the age of organization and efficiency." The characterization depends on the temperament, occupation and point of view of the person who speaks. Dr. Hillis says that "the outstanding words to-day are organization, co-operation, unity, efficiency." He gives a number of examples of organization leading to efficiency and economy of administration.

Instead of a thousand wells in a city, we have a reservoir supplying ten thousand homes with pure water. Instead of a thousand lamps there is one central electrical plant. Instead of a multitude of small shops, we have the department store. "In the intellectual realm the city long ago left behind the score of little schools with small classes, and organized one great high school." The idea of organization, co-operation, unity and increased efficiency is taking hold of those who are interested in the extension of the kingdom of God. Dr. Hillis says, "The men who have simplified business, reorganized the banks under one management, reorganized the factory and the store and the shops, are the men who are now in the pews. Having learned how to save the wastes on Saturday, they are irritated by the ecclesiastical wastes on Sunday." True. So Dr. Hillis says "the epoch of church unity has fully come." The following paragraph I must quote:

"In the beginning, we are told, the Christian Church was 'all with one accord in one place,' but if Peter and Paul were to come to New York, or to New Orleans, or to San Francisco, or to Boston, they would find the members of this one church in 169 different places, with a practical man named James leading one group of Disciples; an emotional Peter leading another group; the æsthetic John leading still another; and the philosophic Paul, and each guiding his own band. The cross of Christ stands in the center, but each regiment, with back toward the cross, marches away from his fellows, while his denominational leader beats time. Yet unity, co-operation, could combine these scattered regiments into a solid army marching to victory."

Dr. Hillis proposes unity, union, co-operation on what he calls "the great simplicities of Jesus Christ." He says, "Surely church unity, on the basis of the great simplicities of Christianity, is not only possible, but practical and easy of achievement."

Much more I wish to say, but limited space will not permit. Christian union is in the air. This I want you to see, feel, realize. Christian union is coming. This is certain. We are in the midst of a tremendous revolution. Some of us do not see the currents. I am anxious that you shall know the times and appreciate the great things that are going on. Hence this letter.

Health the Greatest of Blessings.

Vitaopathy, the new method of healing disease, places within the reach of every man that most desirable of all things—health. Disease in all its forms yields before it like magic; pain disappears, and in its stead comes health and happiness. This new system of healing is the marvel of the century, and none of its exponents are meeting with greater success than Prof. J. H. Allen, of Luystown, Mo. If you are in poor health, write to him, and he will tell you how to get well, and keep well. Full particulars free. Address PROF. J. H. ALLEN, Luystown, Mo.

Missouri Mission Notes.

It has been several weeks since these notes appeared, the longest period in fact during the last nine years in which my own hand has not written something concerning Missouri missions. I have been close to the borderland, but, in the providence of God, I have been spared. May it be to his praise and the extension of his kingdom. I am sure the four weeks' rest has been a greater blessing than I thought it could be. Now for the work again. I come, as ever, to plead for a renewal of interest in the work of planting and strengthening our cause in Missouri.

First, however, let me say to the many, very many, brethren and sisters throughout the state, who wrote such kind, tender messages of interest and sympathy, that beyond my power to tell do I appreciate every word you have written. It is nine years this month since I began to serve you as corresponding secretary. In all that time I have tried to make it my chief aim and ambition to serve you well. I have tried to subordinate my own personal interests and make those of our cause in Missouri supreme. If there has come success, however, it has not been by this alone, but by the splendid loyalty of the brotherhood and the blessing of Him without whose aid all our efforts are failures.

Another thing I must say, that to the members of the state board, to Brother Richardson especially, and to our faithful office secretary, Sister Virgie Campbell, I owe an especial vote of thanks. But for them, the much needed rest could not have been taken at all.

Do you realize that the convention is but two months away? The one fact that strikes me hard as I take up the work again, is how short is the time and how much is to be done. I have just come into the office, so I do not know just the condition of things, but I do know this, that there needs to be such a rally for state missions during the next two months as there has never been before. If any church has not taken an offering for this work since last September, one is now due. We have banked on this being done. If you put off till next fall to take the offering, you leave us in the lurch; we work a whole year without your co-operation. This I am sure you will not intentionally do. Now then for an immediate, earnest, enthusiastic push all over the state for state missions.

T. A. ABBOTT.

Mrs. Princess Long.

Mrs. Princess C. Long has recently returned from Ohio and Indiana, where she has been assisting some of our pastors in meetings. They were very successful, and the pastors and churches are enthusiastic over her, not only as a singer, but as a devoted worker and a loyal Christian woman. This estimable sister is now known throughout our brotherhood as our most effective singer of Gospel music. For several years past she has been giving what time she could be from home, chiefly to singing in protracted meetings, interspersed with convention and chautauqua work, and many hundreds of souls have been won to Christ through her songs and her personal influence in social circles. There is a thrilling quality in her beautiful voice that, together with the womanly strength of her personality, gives her a power that few singers possess. But the work in protracted meetings in which she is so eminently useful, and in which she takes great delight, separates her so much from her husband and children that she feels constrained on that account to discontinue it for the present. As the next most useful way to employ her musical talent, and in response to a number of invitations, she proposes to spend a portion of her time in giving concerts for the benefit of schools, colleges, lecture associations, Endeavor societies, Missionary and Aid societies, etc. From the time this notice will appear in print she will be open to calls for concerts, and she will endeavor to respond to them in the order in which they are received. For about six months she has been a resident of this city, but is about to return to her former home in Paris, Ky., where she may be addressed. Mr. Long sometimes assists in these concerts, and together they give some of the old plantation melodies of the south. I need scarcely say that Sister Long has been thoroughly trained in music. No one could sing as she does without it. In former years she sang successfully in opera, for which she was educated. When she began gospel work she renounced the opera, and has given herself to the singing of sacred and the more elevating secular music. In classical, patriotic, sentimental and humorous songs, as in her Gospel solos, she never fails to carry her hearers with her by the force of her own magnetism, and because she sings from her heart, and thus reaches hearts. It is because of the elevating and ennobling character of the music which she presents to the public that I desire to publish this notice of her work, and to advise such organizations as I have mentioned above, to secure her services for musical entertainments. In California, where she has lived for several years, the announcement of one of her concerts was uniformly greeted by a large and delighted audience. I attended one of these at Santa Monica two years ago, and was an eye witness of the enthusiasm with which she was greeted by the immense audience. No organization that can secure her services need have any fear of disappointment.

The Christian-Evangelist.

The Editors of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST certainly have many reasons to congratulate themselves for the hearty endorsements they are receiving for the great paper they are producing. Many words of commendation and hearty approval are received at this office continually, such as the following:

"You are certainly giving us an ably edited and interesting paper."

MADISON A. HART.

"I want to congratulate you on the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is a steady, forceful, and artistic exposition of the truth of the Reformation."

T. B. LEHMAN,

Southern Christian Institute.

"To my mind the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST stands at the top of Christian journalism. It comes to me weekly filled with good things which fill my heart with smiles, happy thoughts and good cheer."

LIZZIE W. WALLACE.

"The CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST is a very welcome visitor to myself and family. I only wish it had come thirty years ago."

H. B. LAMMERT.

These could be multiplied many times to show the hearty appreciation of the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Now we wish to ask the friends of the paper everywhere to aid us in introducing it into 10,000 new homes. Do not fail to read the advertisement of the splendid set of dishes we offer to our friends free. You will be proud of this splendid gift when you receive it, and you will do one of the best things in your life if you can place the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST into ten new homes.

Very truly yours,

Now it is a Step-Ladder.

A most interesting letter has come to me, asking me to invest in the step-ladder business. Flattering prospects. It is from a brother preacher. One man made $1,500 in one month. Brother Editor, I would like to make my answer public. It will save postage.

Dear Brother Gooseneck, yours at hand and contents noted. In reply I wish to say, I am—or have been—slightly up on step-ladders. I should have italicized "slightly;" for I was no sooner up than I was down again. The article chosen is too suggestive of "ups" and "downs." Have me excused, please.

I should like to keep up with the times, but one must draw the line somewhere; I do it on step-ladders. The old-fashioned, dead-level, non-winding-stair step-ladder has always been able to throw me quick enough, high enough and land me hard enough to fully satisfy my desire of big profits on small investments. The aforesaid profits have always gone into the other fellow's—the doctor's—pockets. I do not wish to offend or discourage, but I speak from experience and out of the fullness of my heart, as well as the largeness and multiplicity of my bruises.

You say that you have a "unique way of putting the ladders on the market." That is what I am afraid of. If that "unique way" is to get preachers to use their influence in sending you men, men whom you do not know and never could get until you worked you way into their confidence, men who are to become "lambs for the shearing" on the condition that I get half of the fleece, if this is what you want, I still beg have me excused.

The card you sent me says: "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush" has frightened more young men into clinging desperately to a position with no outcome to it than any other sentiment. But if the birds in the bush are turkeys, and the bird in the hand is a sparrow, there is considerable foolishness in holding on."

True! Brother, true! But! If he lets go, and catches on, and the birds in the bush prove to be turkey-buzzards, what then? Will there not be considerable rottenness in catching on? You answer, while I get my breath!

I prefer to hold on to the bird "that hath found an house . . . even thine altars, O Jehovah of hosts," to running the risk of defiling myself with the carrion's stench for the sake of catching something big.

Again begging to be excused, I am

Most fraternally yours,

FILANDER FUSOME.

THE CASCADES AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

When you have found the focal point of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, you will have no difficulty in locating the Disciples of Christ pavilion. This focal point is a composition made up of three big cascades, the largest in the world; the colonnade of states, an ornamental screen of Ionic columns forming a background for 14 statues, each symbolical of one of the states or territories in the purchase; three highly ornate buildings, including Festival Hall in the center and two ornate restaurant pavilions at either end. No decorative feature of the Exposition has attracted so much attention throughout the world as the Cascade Gardens, nor does any other portion of the Fair approach it in grandeur. The dome of the Festival Hall, in the center of the peristyle, is much larger than that of St. Peter's at Rome.

The statues which will ornament the approaches to the cascades will represent famous characters in American history. The side cascades symbolize the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

On the center fountain at the head of the main cascade, in front of Festival Hall, will appear a gigantic statue of Liberty raising the veil of Ignorance and protecting Truth and Justice. The entire stretch of the gardens will be 1,900 feet wide by 1,100 feet in depth as they recede from the edge of the Grand Basin.

Festival Hall, at the head of the center cascade, will be the largest auditorium on the Exposition grounds. It will seat 3,500 persons and contain the largest organ on earth. Just behind the colonnade on your left hand as you face this great composition, is the Disciples' pavilion, which is rapidly approaching completion.

Helps to Faith.

May I tell you some of the things I like in Bro. J. H. Garrison's new book, "Helps to Faith?" Not that my likes or dislikes stamp matter reviewed as true or false, but that where experiences coincide there is larger probability of truth, provided the common premises are not vitiated by an error.

If I rightly understand his contention, human nature is built first to assume the existence of God, and second to successfully defend this assumption. In other words, it is foolish to attempt the proof of an axiom, but it is pre-eminently wise to assume an axiom, and then, if need be, defend it from attack. Such a position, it seems to me, is impregnable. Especially is this true when one is wise enough to refuse to be lost or led into the hopeless philosophical quest to discover how man has come into possession of the God-idea. While it would be very interesting to know how man comes into possession of this idea, he is not bound to know. Our right to the idea is doubly established by our ability to defend it and by the service it renders. The value of this position is enhanced, also, by care in defining the idea. It is very easy to affirm too much concerning what God is before we see him as Jesus presents him.

I like his position that in Christ we have the supreme revelation of God. In him we have the supreme fact of history—a fact against which agnosticism cannot apply. A fact above all others for which you cannot account without the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

How happy is his chapter heading, "Given Christ, Christianity follows." A thought which may with profit be applied in the reverse order, "Given Christianity as we know it, the resurrection of Jesus follows as its only explanation."

In the ninth chapter I am glad to find emphasized this great truth,—Jesus is more than a divine teacher, he is the Regenerator, the power to lift us up to the realization of our ideal in himself. Hence the Christian is not compelled, like the Jew or Mohametan or the pagan philosopher, to lower his moral standard. For him it is set equal to divine perfection, and power is given through Christ to at last measure up to it. And this power is in the life or eternal life given through the new birth.

I am delighted with his presentation of "The meaning of Christ's death." Whoever put the meaning of the cross more clearly and truly than in these words, "It was at once the highest revelation of God's love for a sinful world, and of the awful nature of sin?" This much is certainly true, and, as the author indicates, more may be true in its relation to past sins. And just as certainly the cross is not to appease an angry God. It speaks of love drawing mankind to itself.

In the eleventh chapter the causal relation between faith and salvation is forcibly presented. Faith is a character builder and a destiny maker. This truth is not sufficiently emphasized among us as a people. I am glad of the emphasis laid upon it by this book.

These are not all the good things in this stimulating volume, but they are enough to justify me in urging my friends to possess the work. It contains not quite 250 pages, but every page is full of interest.

There are parts of the book in which, if I fully grasp the author's position, I would dispute his conclusions. Of these I may write at a later time. But here and now I want to confess that what challenges my own conclusions has often proven itself more helpful to me than the parts with which I agree. It is so in this case. No part of Brother Garrison's book has failed to do me good.

sure. Three additions since our last report. Every service of the church is improving in interest. Quite a number of our brethren from the north have worshiped with us during the winter, and have given us much encouragement by their presence. Some are with us still. Brother Tisdale, of the law firm of Tisdale and Gray, of Covington, Ky., is at all of our services, and his talks and prayers are helpful to us all. The writer presided at six different services Easter Sunday.—T. HENRY BLENUS.

KANSAS.

Sutphen, April 5.—Seven confessions in meeting thus far and more to follow, I believe.—THOS. J. EASTERWOOD.

Chanute, April 6.—Am here trying to put new life into this congregation. The church has been laboring under great difficulties for some months. Have had two confessions and much interest is being manifested. The cause here will prosper in the future.—G. F. BRADFORD.

Iola, April 6.—The Omer-Sprague meeting here closed with 100 additions. It commenced March 6, in the new $9,000 church which was dedicated that day by Bro. W. S. Lowe, state superintendent of Kansas missions. The pastor, E. N. Phillips, had labored tirelessly and incessantly both in the erection of the church and his regular pastoral duties. Too much cannot be said in praise of Brother Omer and his work. March 27 was the crowning day. The Grand Opera House was secured for the occasion. Fully 1,000 women heard his address in the afternoon, and in the evening hundreds were turned away. This widespread knowledge of our plea means much for the future of the Church of Christ in Iola. Bro. L. D. Sprague is truly a "sweet singer in Israel." We thank God for such evangelists as these.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Tishomingo, April 4.—Three added by letter yesterday.—E. S. ALLHANDS.

ILLINOIS.

Pleasant Hill, April 4.—Work progressing nicely. Offerings for foreign missions, Pleasant Hill, $17, Nebo, $20, White Hall, $13, total, $50. Pleasant Hill took the Easter offering; $7.10 in money, a case of eggs sent to the Orphans' Home. Four additions by letter at White Hall last week.—O. C. BOLMAN.

Cerro Gordo, April 6.—Our Bible-school rendered "The Little Philanthropist" last Lord's day night. The exercises were a pronounced success; the contribution to the National Benevolent Association was $6.75.—S. H. GIVLER.

Harvey, April 7.—One more addition at our prayer-meeting last night is of great interest to us. It was my own sister who came forward. This makes two sisters who have taken their stand for Christ since we began our work here. Ten in all have been added to the church. We are going forward.—JOHN J. HIGGS.

Granite City, April 8.—Two weeks ago we baptized a father, mother and daughter. Last Lord's day a lady whose father is a Lutheran preacher and who had been brought up in that faith made the good confession and expressed her desire to follow Christ in a more perfect obedience. Our Bible-school is on the upgrade since spring has come. The aid society, besides paying $100 to current expenses, has about $100 in the bank for the building fund. They will probably raise not less than $300 during the pastoral year ending Aug. 1.—M. MCFARLAND, missionary pastor.

INDIANA.

Bloomington, April 6.—One hundred and three additions in seventeen days, seventy-five by confession and baptism. The meeting continues with enthusiasm. Many students from the Indiana University are attending.—T. J. CLARK, pastor. R. W. ABERLEY, of Minneapolis, pastor-evangelist.

Indianapolis, April 5.—During my last visit with the Whitewater Church, a C. E. society was organized including twenty-two active and seven associate members. One added to the church by statement.—WILLIS M. CUNNINGHAM.

Angola, April 2.—I closed a splendid meeting with C. J. Sharp at Hammond, Ind., last night. Forty-two added in three weeks. Bro. Sharp is greatly beloved by his people, and is doing a great work.—W. F. SHEARER, evangelist.

New Albany, April 4.—Ten confessions at regular services at the Central Church yesterday morning. At the song service at night people were turned away for want of room. This is a good people and they "have a mind to work." Every department of the work has had a wonderful growth in the last three months.—B. F. CATO.

Kewana, April 1.—One baptism here yesterday and two at Culver, where there is no church of the New Testament type.—I. A. SEAB.

Bloomington, April 9.—The third week of our meeting with the Kirkwood Avenue congregation closed last night with 43 accessions for the week; 21 by primary obedience. This makes 124 for the meetings. We will continue the meetings till the middle of next week when Brother R. W. Abberley will be obliged to return to his home work. His work has been a great blessing to us here.—T. J. CLARK.

Indianapolis, April 3.—On April 3d I began my third year with the North Park Church. There were 151 additions to the church during the two years, all but 39 at the regular Sunday services.—A. HENTON.

Needham, April 7.—Meeting begun here with a deep interest manifested, the business houses all closing during meeting hours, including the saloon. Evangelists Clarke and Stevens are succeeding in pointing the erring ones to the Great Physician. These brethren ren can be secured for a few weeks' meeting.

Shelbyville, April 4.—Our Sunday-school made an offering of $30 for the Orphans' and Old People's work—the first offering ever made by this church for this work. Our March offering was more than five times as much as last year. Five additions since last report—two baptisms, three letters. This makes a total of 50 added to the church since we became pastor, Jan. 1.—H. O. PRITCHARD.

Butler, April 7.—One by letter last Lord's day, making three since last report. We are now arranging to re-carpet the church, and expect to have it done before the May offering. We hope to meet our apportionment.—D. F. HARRIS.

Marion, April 7.—Our work at Lake Charles, La., closed March 27, and after a long and delayed trip, we arrived here in time to take charge of the work at the Tabernacle Church on Easter Sunday. Five additions was the visible result of the day's work. Brother Frazier has left everything in fine shape, and eternity alone can tell the good he has done here during his stay.—W. S. BUCHANAN.

IOWA.

Oskaloosa, April 4.—I am supplying the pulpit. Four additions. All departments of church work are in good condition.—M. L. ANTHONY.

Red Oak, April 5.—Five additions not recently reported—three by letter March 27, and two baptisms March 31.—HERBERT W. CIES.

Corning, April 7.—Fourteen additions in Evangelist Samuel Gregg's meeting. The church has been without a pastor for nearly a year, making the field very difficult for a meeting. We still continue.—CHAS. E. McVAY, singer.

Villisca, April 8.—Visited the Fort Dodge Church last Lord's day in company with State Secretary B. S. Denny. Had nine accessions, eight of whom were confessions of young people. Brother Denny lectured at the Y. M. C. A. of the city in the afternoon, to the delight of all.—S. M. PERKINS.

Centerville, April 5.—Chas. Reign Scoville, of the Metropolitan Church of Christ, Chicago, was with us twenty-two days. It was a time of refreshing for both church and pastor. We did not expect a large ingathering. We desired to teach and strengthen the membership. There had been more than 200 added within the past nine months to the Central Church of Christ, and the ground was well swept. Our expectations were more than realized. The church was much strengthened in spiritual things, and 121 were added to the membership. It was one of Brother Scoville's greatest meetings, considering the conditions. He is my ideal for an evangelist. He preaches the truth with a fiery enthusiasm, but always with the warmth of love. The church presented Brother Scoville with 121 beautiful carnations—one for each convert during the meeting—and also with the History of the Church of Christ, recently published. With more than 300 additions during the past year we are encouraged to press forward to greater conquests.—F. L. MOFFETT.

OHIO.

Carthage, April 8.—Our county missionary closed a meeting for me recently with 24 confessions and eight otherwise. Outlook bright.—CHAS. M. FILLMORE.

Dayton, April 4.—Eleven confessions yesterday at the Central Church.—I. J. CAHILL.

Cuyaboga Falls, April 8.—Closed a 27 days' meeting at Moundsville, W. Va., recently, with 62 accessions—30 confessions; also a 15 days' meeting at Diamond, Ohio, with 11 accessions—10 confessions.—PERCY H. WILSON, State Evangelist.

Akron, April 6.—Easter Sunday at the First Church was fixed as Decision Day in the Bible-school, and Brother Slayter and the teachers combined their efforts to bring as many as possible to a decision on that day: 29 came forward, all but four for baptism. Eight have been added since the meetings in January, making 89 in all since Jan. 1.—B. C. CAYWOOD.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Blackburn, April 4.—Two young ladies were baptized at Skedee yesterday.—M. F. INGRAM.

Cherokee, April 4.—Have just formed a church of twenty members at Byrow, Okla. All were members elsewhere except one or two. They will proceed to build as soon as possible.—M. B. INGLE.

Edmond, April 9.—The Minton-Stanley meeting is progressing finely. Many there turned away Sunday night. Bro. Minton is a great preacher. Talmage Stanley has few equals in leading a chorus. We expect a great meeting.—W. M. HUNT.

MANITOBA.

Winnipeg, April 2.—I held a four days' meeting at Lidstone, Man., recently, and immediately afterward 12 days at Swan River. Four additions at Swan River. The church there has very favorable prospects. This great new country is a ripe harvest field for our plea.—ALEX. McMILLAN.

MICHIGAN.

Grand Rapids, April 8.—On Easter Sunday the full capacity of the building was needed at both services. Eleven were added, making a total of 24 since Jan. 1. A pipe organ was dedicated also, and we have reason to expect a prosperous growth.—F. P. ARTHUR.

MISSOURI.

Lees Summit, April 5.—Success in every department. One admitted by statement and three by baptism last Lord's day. We have one of the best Sunday-schools and superintendents in the state.—JAMES SHARRATT.

Butler, April 5.—Our work is opening up here very encouragingly. April 3 was a good day with us. At the invitation, 13 came forward with letters to take membership. Two confessions last Sunday in March.—H. JAS. CROCKETT.

New Haven, April 4.—Just closed a three weeks' meeting. Had four additions before our evangelist, Joseph Gaylor, of Springfield, came, and five after, all confessions and baptisms, but one by letter. Brother Gaylor is a strong gospel preacher. I close my work here on May 15, after a stay of seventeen months, to prepare to enter school at Christian University at Canton, Mo. Bro. E. M. Romine, of Kolla, Mo., has been given the call.—A. B. JETT.

Lamar, April 4.—One added yesterday, eight since last report. Went beyond our apportionment for foreign missions. All church work goes on without the least friction.—S. W. CRUTCHER.

Mt. Grove, April 5.—Closed a good meeting at Brushy Knob schoolhouse in Texas county, with 32 additions: 12 by confession, five from Baptists, six from Dunkards, and nine reinstated. Organized a congregation. Ground has been secured and a new house of worship will be built. Other small congregations will unite and make a strong church. We need more earnest gospel preachers in southwest Missouri.—E. W. YOCUM.

Kirksville, April 4.—Last Sunday witnessed the largest attendance in our Sunday-school that we have ever known. The record showed there were 380 present. G. L. Wharton presented the cause of "Our College in India" on Wednesday and Thursday of last week, resulting in pledges to the amount of $57. We hope to raise it to $100. Brother Wharton is a blessing wherever he goes, and is one of the sweetest Christian characters we have ever known.—G. W. THOMPSON.

Warrensburg, April 4.—One confession at Dover yesterday.—KING STARK.

Joplin, April 7.—I recently preached two sermons for J. W. Baker in the South Joplin church, and there were two confessions.—SIMPSON ELY.

Sedalia, April 7.—Our meeting has been in progress two weeks and a half. There are 41 additions to date.—H. A. NORTHCUTT, evangelist; J. M. RUDY, pastor.

NEBRASKA.

NEW YORK.

Buffalo, April 4.—Yesterday was a day of great joy at Jefferson Street church. Two confessions at morning service. A splendid musical program carried out at night. The east affords rare opportunities for usefulness to western men. Come east, come east, brethren, and grow up with the—Disciples of Christ.—B. S. TERRALL.

North Tonawanda, April 7.—We have just closed a two and a half weeks' meeting with F. O. Fannon as evangelist. It has been a season of great spiritual uplift to the entire church and the winning of thirty souls to Christ. Bro. Fannon's strong points are his great faith in God and the power of prayer, his tender sympathy, and his impassioned and eloquent delivery. He proceeds on the assumption that the greatest need of the church is the deepening of its own spiritual life. The result of such work is that when the evangelist has left, the church rallies round the pastor with greater zeal than ever. The last night of the meeting was one of great rejoicing over the raising of a $5,000 debt which has been an obstacle for fifteen years.—W. C. HULL.

PENNSYLVANIA..

Sandy Lake, April 4.—We have closed our meeting at Milledgeville. Contended with much mud and many sick. One addition by baptism. We started a Sunday-school revival yesterday. Will start revival here next Sunday. We are preparing for a great summer campaign in this field.—THOMAS MARTIN.

New Castle.—Our rally yesterday was the greatest day in the history of the church. A summary of reports: Number in Bible school, 452; in C. E., 63; number of additions to church, 61; number of pastoral calls, 1,542; amount in building fund, $2,005.77; total amount of money handled, $5,812.80. We voted to build a new building this summer and raised $600 in five minutes to give it a start.—WALTER D. TRUMBULL.

TEXAS.

Fort Worth, April 4.—There were four confessions in the Easter morning service at the Tabernacle Church here. We are arranging for the McLean-Wharton missionary rally in Ft. Worth, May 5.—JAMES S. MYERS.

Austin, April 4.—I recently held a meeting for the San Antonio church, resulting in 43 additions—33 by baptism, two from other religious bodies who had been baptized, and eight by relation. The church, under Homer T. Wilson, has not only built a magnificent church edifice, but a large, influential church membership also, and the San Antonio church now ranks among our best.—B. B. SANDERS.

Corsicana, April 3.—We had a glorious Easter service of the right kind at First Christian to day. Four made the good confession and eight were baptized after evening sermon.—J. F. QUISENBERRY.

WASHINGTON.

Rosalie.—The work at this place is taking on new life. Congregation growing. Three additions March 27, four April 3 and four others in February, which have not yet been reported. H. G. Munyon, of Memphis, Mo., has taken the work at Lind, Wash.—A. J. ADAMS.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Parkersburg, April 4.—A man made the good confession yesterday, making 17 additions during last month at regular services. The ladies of the church cleared $130, Saturday, April 2nd, by serving meals. The

This Testimony

Will surely interest many readers of this paper.

James G. Gray, Gibson, Mo., writes about Drake's Palmetto Wine as follows: I live in the Missouri Swamps in Dunklin County and have been sick with Malarial fever and for fifteen months a walking skeleton. One bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine has done me more good than all the medicine I have taken in that fifteen months. I am buying two more bottles to stay cured. Drake's Palmetto Wine is the best medicine and tonic for Malaria, Kidney and Liver ailments I ever used or heard of. I feel well now after using one bottle.

A. A. Felding, Knoxville, Tenn., writes: I had a bad case of sour Stomach and Indigestion. I could eat so little that I was "falling to bones" and could not sleep nor attend to my business. I used the trial bottle and two large seventy-five cent bottles and can truthfully say I am entirely cured. I have advised many to write for a free trial bottle.

J. W. Moore, Monticello, Minn., makes the following statement about himself and a neighbor. He says: Four bottles of Drake's Palmetto Wine has cured me of catarrh of Bladder and Kidney trouble. I suffered ten years and spent hundreds of dollars with best doctors and specialists without benefit. Drake's Palmetto Wine has made me a well man. A young woman here was given up to die by a Minneapolis specialist and he and our local doctor said they could do no more for her. She has been taking Drake's Palmetto Wine one week and is rapidly recovering.

The Drake Formula Company, Drake Bldg., Chicago, Ill., will send a trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine free and prepaid to any reader of this paper. A letter or postal card is your only expense to get this free bottle.

The True Story of The Invention of Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums
Told by Geo. H. Wilson, the Inventor.

I was deaf from infancy. Eminent doctors, surgeons and ear specialists treated me at great expense and yet did me no good. I tried all the artificial appliances that claimed to restore hearing, but they failed to benefit me in the least. I even went to the best specialists in the world, but their efforts were unavailing.

My case was pronounced incurable!

I grew desperate; my deafness tormented me. Daily I was becoming more of a recluse, avoiding the companionship of people because of the annoyance my deafness and sensitiveness caused me. Finally I began to experiment on myself, and after patient years of study, labor, and personal expense, I perfected something that I found took the place of the natural ear drums, and I called it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, which I now wear day and night with perfect comfort, and do not even have to remove them when washing. No one can tell I am wearing them, as they do not show, and as they give no discomfort whatever, I scarcely know it myself.

With these drums I can now hear a whisper. I join in the general conversation and hear everything going on around me. I can hear a sermon or lecture from any part of a large church or hall. My general health is improved because of the great change my Ear Drums have made in my life. My spirits are bright and cheerful. I am a cured, changed man.

Since my fortunate discovery it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube, or any other such old-fashioned makeshift. My Common Sense Ear Drum is built on the strictest scientific principles, contains no metal, wires, or strings of any kind, and is entirely new and up to date in all respects. It is so small that no one can see it when in position, yet it collects all the sound waves and focuses them against the drum head, causing you to hear naturally and perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, male or female, and aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the least irritation, and can be used with comfort day and night without removal for any cause.

With my device I can cure deafness in any person, no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gatherings in the ear, shocks from artillery, or through accidents. My invention not only cures, but at once stops the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises. The greatest aural surgeons in the world recommend it, as well as physicians of all schools. It will do for you what no medicine or medical skill on earth can do.

I want to place my 190-page book on deafness in the hands of every deaf person in the world. I will gladly send it free to anyone whose name and address I can get. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains bona fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India, and the remotest islands. I have letters from people in every station of life—ministers, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from my wonderful little device. You will find the names of people in your own town and state, many whose names you know, and I am sure that all this will convince you that the cure of deafness has at last been solved by my invention.

Don't delay; write for the free book today and address my firm—The Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1787 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky., U. S. A.

BLACK.

Mr. A. G. Black, born May 12, 1850, departed this life April 4, 1904. He was a good man in his home, a splendid neighbor, a good friend. The funeral services were held in the Christian church at this place, the body was interred in the Isadora Cemetery.

J. A. MCKENZIE.

DARLAND.

On March 28 1904, the writer was called to Oskaloosa to preach the funeral service of Bro. W. L. Darland. Brother Darland was born in Indiana May 12, 1830. He came to Iowa in 1861, and was one of the former preachers who rode from ten to twenty miles on the Lord's day preaching the gospel in rural districts. Two years were spent in Kansas where he established several churches. His latest work was done at Tulsa, Indian Ter. Surely we may say of this good man that his works do follow him. Brother Darland had 4 sons and 6 daughters, 8 of whom are living, and all members of the Christian church. This good man was laid to rest in the country cemetery, by the side of his companion who preceded him only a few months. In him we lay to rest one of those who helped to lay the foundation of our splendid church work in Iowa.

Bloomfield, Iowa, April 4, '04.

LAIR.

James M. Lair died at the Soldiers' Home, Quincy, Ill., and was buried from Blooming Grove church near Carlinville, Ill., on March 30, 1904. Bro. Lair was 81 years, 7 months and 27 days old at the time of his death. He became a Christian at the age of 16, and served as elder for many years in the Blooming Grove church. He served in the Civil War from '61 to '65 with Grant and Sherman, and won honorable distinction. He was all the time a consistent follower of Christ. The writer conducted the funeral service. A brave soldier finds rest.

MUSICK.

Fielden Allen Musick was born in Logan county, Ill., July 31, 1836. He passed into the great beyond March 25, 1904. Sitting in his chair he went to his reward as one simply translated. He was married to Hannah Simpson, Dec. 28, 1856. Eleven children were born to them, seven of whom, with the wife, survive him. He became a Christian at the age of 22 years, and with the exception of a few years, has been an officer in the church since that time. For 17 years he has cared for the communion table at Eureka. He was always at the post of duty, a sincere, industrious, open-hearted man; he leaves a heritage of honor to his children and friends.

NEWMAN.

Magdalena Miller Newman, born Aug. 11, 1823, in Pennsylvania, died at Doud, Iowa, Feb. 24, 1904, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. D. Z. T. Huiett, with whom she has resided most of the time since the death of her husband, David Newman, in 1872. In 1853 they together obeyed Christ and lived devout Christians to the end. Four sons, two daughters, and a host of warm friends were left to mourn her departure as she peacefully fell asleep in Jesus. Good-bye, dear mother, till we meet in heaven.

MRS. SAMUEL STEWART.

New Philadelphia, Ill.

PICKERILL.

Mrs. Rachel Pickerill passed to a well-earned reward on March 31, '04. She had been a resident of Eureka vicinity for 53 years. Her husband preceded her 7 years. She was a faithful Christian and an unselfish mother.

"More Preachers Needed." Who Stands in the Way?

The recent article by Bro. L. M. Sniff on "More Preachers Needed," is sensible and timely. The question is supremely vital. Certainly more men, better men, and better prepared men are needed to preach the word. Who is calling them? We say the "divine call" is through providential endowment and the voice of the church. But what if God bountifully endow our sons, and then the voice of the Church never calls? How many of our leading members think to suggest, even to the brightest and best of our young men, this highest of callings? Do our preachers always deem it worth while? A church ought to be as proud to discover and call a young man to the ministry as to become a living link. In a strong old church which has given but one man to the ministry in fifty years, the pastor recently invited conferences with the young people about their life work. Eight out of some fifteen who responded were thinking of Christian service, either at home or abroad. Two others had shortly before chosen the ministry. Had God endowed but one other in this church for his ministry in half a century?

The New Evangelism.

We often hear of a new evangelism. The term may stand for various phases of active gospel service.

According to my theory and practice, it is the reaching all imperfections in saint and sinner by the safest, surest and simplest method that will be blessed by the Master and satisfying to the recipient of the new reform and also a joy to him who brooded over the condition until able to do and say the proper things in the proper way.

For example: A Disciple minister and a class leader in the M. E. Church were engaged in prayer and Scripture reading, with questions and answers freely considered, at a late hour one night after the evening meeting. The 10th chapter of Romans was under consideration and especial attention was directed to the 16th verse, "But they have not all obeyed the gospel." With mutual assurances of sympathy, the Disciple approached the subject of humbly and fully doing whatever the Lord asks us to do; and that, in the way he would have it done, and at the time he would have it done, as we may gather from the example given in the book of Acts. After a short pause the Methodist brother stated that "he never was fully satisfied with his sprinkling." After due pause the Disciple stated his manner of settling such matters of soul interest by attending to them at once, and warningly said, "Brother John, we may not live till morning." The talking ceased, but evidently the thinking went on while both retired for the night, slept, awoke in the morning to the new day duties and separation for two weeks, without reference to the subject discussed the night before. Cordiality and kindness characterized the actions of both, and this, doubtless, helped to strengthen the resolution of "Brother John." Before two weeks rolled around he went down to the river, nearby, with his pastor and was immersed. In a few weeks his brother, whose wife and daughter were members of the Methodist Church, requested immersion (of the M. E. minister), and wife and daughter were soon to follow, quietly leaving sprinkling for immersion, in obedience to the plain teaching but obscured meaning of the Scriptures. And the Disciple rejoiced with them. Is there any new evangelism here? Are we not in too much of a hurry, and too eager for gain, glory and (worse yet) "going for the sects"? We think them safe only with us, when often the state of our standing with Jesus Christ (locally) is questionable. Try it, brother. It may help to deepen, widen and exalt your conceptions of present day possibilities.

Wood-Sick.

By Harriet Whitney Durbin.

I'm weary for the woods; I want to hear
The lusty rushing of the early spring,
Wind-winged, among the sycamores; the clear
Slow sound of reedy waters whispering.

I'm famishing for scents of forest birth—
Of reaching root and dawning mist of grass;
The smell of wet green lichen and of earth—
Of haw and willow-bud and sassafras.

I pine to see the dogwood's creamy barge,
Clear-cut, against the sunset's orange stain,
Or bent and shaken by a sudden charge
Of silver-pointed bayonets of rain.

My heart is wood-sick—thirsty for the things
That only one who loves the forest knows—
The gracious grandeur of the strong old kings,
The golden fires that cuckoo-buds disclose.

My day-dreams lead me in the dappled ways
Where sunlight spatters down in yellow spots,

And set me revelling in phantom sprays
Of hyacinths and blue forget-me-nots.

Neighborly Sympathy.

By Mary R. Baldwin.

The command to withdraw the feet from the neighbor's house, was surely not a bit of advice thrown in, as part of the padding, among the wise sayings of the ancient proverb-maker, but suggested, no doubt, through his observation of the results of indiscriminate neighborhood visiting, and recognized by him as an all-time policy for home-keepers.

In our time, the woman's vocations, avocations and pursuits generally, make it impossible to restrict her intercourse to the narrow definition of "neighborhood," and her field in this respect seems to be broadening with each year; but with all this enlargement for her activities she does, sometimes, take a narrow view of her duty towards her neighborhood.

One should expect of our advanced woman a truer, wiser and more benevolent conception of neighborly obligations and exchange of courtesies, but there are, alas! examples of failures on the part of the progressive woman to meet even the requirements of kindness towards the immediate neighborhood.

The crude habit that still clings in some places, of indulgence in the over-the-fence talk, and the frequent and often ill-timed runnings-in for "just a word," have been frowned down by the woman who has espoused wider interests. And this is what she should have done, for time, strength, and moral healthfulness have been sacrificed to the small talk, beginning in littleness and ending in nothing.

There have been instances where this freedom in morning visiting has drawn in those who, having no desire for its indulgence, could not see exactly the way to refuse to become a party to the habit, and have been sacrificed to the so-called neighborliness of thoughtless women. If this woman had failed to seem interested in the speech of the gossip who rolled the sweet morsel of the latest news persistently, she would have been considered unfriendly. Many gentle, timid ones have been victims of these morning-callers for the simple reason that they could not find the courage to offer a rebuff; but the strong-minded woman who is abreast of the times has taken a decided stand, and as far as she is concerned, the hindrance of little talk is a thing of the past.

But in bringing about this necessary reformation in her neighborhood, is she quite sure that she is not making a mistake that may perhaps prove more serious than that which she has escaped? If, in shutting off a petty form of intercourse, she has placed herself above the reach of the need of those in her vicinity, she has been guilty of neglect, which will in time make her poorer in experience and contract her ability to cultivate sympathy. With the so-called larger outlook presented to her in literary and social circles, the temptation to set aside the near-at-hand service is very strong, and the woman who enlists her thought and energy in public ways is often caught in the snare that is always lying in wait, catching her with the persuasion that it is her duty to widen her influence.

Sometimes this appeal is made in the name of Christ. A missionary zealot wrote recently to a friend: "I wish I had a few hundred dollars to give to a school in India; I am distressed that I cannot send the money on at once!"

The one to whom she confided her yearning desire knew that this same woman had a sister struggling with poverty, and that she was fighting against reverses for the sake of her young family. Now it was well that the woman, fired with a desire to help the heathen, should long to send them something, but it was a shameful neglect of her own, when she really was known to have the means to help them and also to send a little to the needy ones in India. Overlooking the needs of those near her, she pulled her purse strings tightly against all forms of relief.

This neighborhood question can never be mathematically settled. We cannot mark off, in a cool, unsympathetic way, our exact line of duty toward those whom we meet in our daily goings and comings. Our purpose must be rooted in the great principle of love, and our impulses must be like springs rising from the fountain head, flowing out naturally, broadly, and sweetly, brightening and beautifying all things along its course. A word, a look, a pressure of the hand, where there is true sympathy, tells so much! The help that we give to a poor, distressed neighbor, the moments taken perhaps from our club, from society, or from even church work, to ease or brighten another's life, are they lost?

"Such ever was love's way—to rise, it stoops." —The Interior.

What Three Farmer Boys Have Done.

Three Missouri boys earned last summer $4,154.52 by cultivating a patch of corn. They also earned the distinction of having a sample of their products selected as one of the features of the Missouri exhibit at the World's Fair. The boys are John, George and Joseph Christian, aged eighteen, sixteen and twelve years. They live at Tarkio, Mo. The work that earned the money for the boys was done between May 1st and November 1st. They cultivated five hundred and forty acres of ground and received twelve cents for every bushel of corn they raised.

The Filipino Boy at School.

You must imagine fifty thousand little boys and girls, with wonderful brown eyes, flat little noses, and black hair, packing their books and slates to school each morning under the blue skies and tropic sun of Filipinia. And even in the islands where the towns are far apart the smallest village would be very much ashamed if it did not have some kind of a school for ninos. It is very quiet in these islands, and the days seem to pass by like dreams. Only the distant clang of convent bells, the liquid bird-notes, or the sleepy challenge of a cock disturbs the peaceful silence of the southern isles. The little villages are all alike—a big cathedral and a rambling convent looking out upon the sparkling sea, the carabaos and ponies grazing on the plaza, and a few pigs running wild among the bamboo houses under the banana trees. In some such town, ten thousand miles away from everybody, you would be surprised some morning if you were to hear the small, clear voices of the children singing one of your own songs: "My Country 'Tis of Thee," or "The Star-spangled Banner."

Maybe you would like to know first, something about the Spanish schools established by the friars, which the little people of the Philippines attended in the days before the battle of Manila Bay. In many places Spanish schools are still kept up. It is a common sight to see along the narrow stone streets of Manila a procession of small Filipino boys in blue suits, baggy trousers and black derby hats, taking their daily walk, conducted by the padres in white robes. In these colegios the little fellows study Spanish grammar, elementary arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and the religion of the Catholic faith. The college graduate smokes cigarettes and dresses very daintily. He is effusively polite, and has a fine contempt for anything like work. He is about original enough to be a good clerk, or escribiente, in a country where unnecessary hurry never spoils the labored neatness of his work.

Some of my friends would have a rather bad opinion of the small boys of Manila if they were to see the little rascals of Calle Real or the Escollta struggling with cigars almost as big as a banana, or engaged in pitching pennies Sunday morning on the street. The public schools, however, keep the small boy out of mischief for a good part of the day. The city schools are a great credit to America. The buildings, which were used in Spanish times, are large and cool. Built in the shape of hollow squares, the inside windows look out on the shady court-yard, where the pupils play at recess under the green palms. When school is over, small investments of centavos and pesetas may be made in mangoes or bananas, sugared biscuits, or a stick of boiled rice in a palm-leaf coil at one of the small Chino shops on the real. ## Dangers of Irresponsible Employment Agency.

One of the chief agencies of immoral traffic as well as of financial fraud on poor people in the city of New York is the intelligence office. There are unquestionably many perfectly reputable persons in the business, engaged in a legitimate and highly beneficial work, but the mask of the employment agent is one of the favorite disguises of the sharper and the procurer, who has practical immunity in his operations under the present extremely lax law. Competent authorities who have made a detailed study of the situation, visiting all the intelligence offices in the city, estimate that not less than 10,000 immigrant and green country girls are annually sent into prostitution by the direct efforts of these agencies. Investigators found fifty offices of questionable character, and thirty of these admitted they furnished girls for immoral purposes. This, of course, is the intolerable evil of the present system. Lesser, but by no means unimportant, evils are the frauds practiced on both employers and employees.—From the New York Tribune.

The Green Witch.

CHAPTER VII.

The following Sunday brought the same disappointments and heartaches which George Clayton had felt a week before. He was ignored by his old companions. His sensitiveness prevented him from seeking former friends after the Sunday-school had been dismissed, and no one came to him. Perhaps the slight was not intentional; perhaps it was. The uncertainty did not rob his bitterness of its smart. In the afternoon nobody came to his room-door to call him from his studies. When, at a late hour, he strolled out into the yard, it was deserted. He was sure Mrs. Stoner had forbidden her daughter to associate with him. He recalled the pleasant time he had spent with her a week ago—such an innocent afternoon! devoted to memories of his mother and to reading from a good book. There would be no more confidences. The thought made him restive. His oppressive feeling of loneliness prompted him to seek some one with whom he could converse. There was Bill Klupertack, but George found himself shrinking from the thought of intimacy with the hack-driver. They could have nothing in common, since all their interests in life were opposed to each other. There was Spot Stoner, but George felt sure an intimate association with him would mean a wandering into doubtful paths. The recollection of his mother's counsels withheld him for the time. Yet Spot's handsome and refined face rose before him and seemed to smile a welcome. It invited him, and his heart thrilled with longing. Could he not accompany Flora's brother upon his expeditions, on his nights of pleasure, without sharing in the dangers of Spot's heedless career? He thought of Linnie Greer and of her friends, who, before he became a "delivery-boy," were his friends. He could go to them, visit them and make himself sure that they had discarded him, or learn that their apparent coolness had not been intended. But his pride stood between him and such a course. So, for the present, at least, he was doomed to solitary longings.

He entered the summer house. The old rustic bench was gone, and in its place stood a beautiful seat of polished wicker-work. Feeling that he had no right there, he strolled away, and presently seated himself under the low cedar tree with his back to the house. A soft footstep sent his heart bounding, and he turned, thinking it must be Flora Stoner; but it was her grandfather, Mr. Halway.

"Isn't it delightful out here?" said the old gentleman, cautiously seating himself upon the grass, in the way that gave least offense to his joints. George soon forgot his disappointment in not finding Flora. The hearty voice, the kindly smile, the snowy hair and beard, robbed him of his feeling of loneliness. "How happy we should be," he continued, "when nature paints such pictures for our delight!"

George's eyes strayed over the landscape, but they did not give back a happy light.

"My dear young friend," said Mr. Halway, "I may call you so? I believe I understand something of your trouble. It is for that I have come to talk with you. I have guessed some things, and my granddaughter has told me more. She asked me to do this. She has such a high opinion of my ability to impart help, that you must excuse me if I intrude myself in your affairs."

"I am glad you have come," said George gratefully, "and it was good of Flora to send you." Suddenly the landscape took on a brighter smile for him. "I have been moping, and that's always unpleasant, you know. Yet it seemed that I'd rather do that than anything else."

"Flora tells me," said the old man gently, "that you were very sorry not to be invited to a party given by one of your old friends, and because your former acquaintances do not pay you, perhaps, so much attention as when you and your father lived together."

"I need lecturing," said the youth with a troubled smile, "for I am foolish to mind it; yet I do mind it very much. I can't help minding it." He sighed. "You see I used to be 'in everything,' as the boys say, and to be left out of everything gives a curious vacuum-sort of feeling. Maybe you don't know what I mean."

"I know exactly," returned the other, "and that is why Flora asked me to talk to you. You do not expect to drive a delivery wagon all your life; you have set your heart one day upon being a physician. You entertain lofty aspirations; you have invited high ideals into your heart—you commune with them; you feel yourself to be a companion of the great. But you must remember that when the world looks at you, it cannot see these distinguished guests seated in the parlor of your dreams; it sees only your overalls, your work-day hat, the green umbrella of your delivery wagon. It classes you at once with all those who dress and work as you. Take a Demosthenes and set him cross-legged, needle and thread in hand, and though he speak with a tongue of fire, he is naught to the world but a tailor. So a Madame de Stael, if fortune proves unkind and she hires out at two dollars a week—what does society know of the romances undeveloped in her brain? She is but a servant-girl."

"All this is true," said George, "though I had not thought of it till we lost our property."

"There are many truths we should never see," observed the other, "if they did not at some time stand between us and our desires."

"It seems very hard," said George. "The world is rather cruel, don't you think so, Mr. Halway?"

"The world thinks as little of you as you let it, George. But reflect how many thousands of tailors and of servant girls have lived and died without evolving a Demosthenes or a Madame de Stael. When you see a hod-carrier or a coal-heaver or a blacksmith, or, on the other hand, a minister or lawyer, you instinctively place him with the rest of his class. He may be better or worse, he may be only for the time in that employment; you think nothing of this. While the one carries bricks, he is a hod-carrier; while the other preaches, he is a minister. It is natural, it is necessary. The fact that there are white crows does not lessen the force of the old simile, 'Black as a crow.'"

George said mournfully, "There isn't much encouragement, then, for a fellow to try to rise above his situation."

"That is very true; and as soon as you recognize the fact, half of your disappointments will vanish. The world doesn't want people to rise above their situations, because it unsettles classes and necessarily displaces some who are already high. If you would succeed, you must seek encouragement from your own purpose. Your will, not other people's, is the source of your strength. Are you resolute to make a man of yourself, George?"

"I am!" cried the other, his eyes flashing.

"Then grit the teeth of your mind," cried the old gentleman, "and look to yourself for help. Call God into your councils, and do not play your part for the applause of spectators. Whatever work you must do, do thoroughly; but always be more than that for which you are hired."

"How glad I am you came!" cried George. "Flora knew what she was about. It makes me brave to hear an old soldier describe the campaign." And he smiled affectionately at Flora's grandfather.

"Life is a campaign," said the other, answering the smile. "No hour-dawns that does not bring victory to some, and defeat to others. Almost every good thing in life seems shut up in a fortress, defended by the envy and the greed of the enemy. It must be taken by force. Between you and success lie so many stations of failures and disappointments, that there is danger of the train reaching its destination too late. You can recall great men who embarked for fame, but who were stopped at so many points of misery, that when the car rolled in, amidst the shouts of the world, it bore the dead body of the victor. But there is one good thing not far away, not barred by iron gates. There is one good thing free to the rich and poor, the great and the unknown, and it is better than all other good things combined. You know what I mean?"

"I do," George answered, his eyes suddenly filling with tears.

"So if you do not reach your goal," continued Mr. Halway, his voice trembling a little, "do not count your efforts loss. And do not pine for the wreath of victory which the world is so ready to pluck away, and so slow to bestow. Rather crown your life with the glory of God's love, and if other good things fail to come to you, still it is enough."

"I shall not complain after this," said George, "nor long for the friendships that have fallen away."

"In that case, you will be strong to fight your way to friendships. Make the world respect you, and you can have back all your friends."

"They are not worth much to me now," said George, laughing without bitterness. "But I should like your advice about making friends with people who are not just—I mean, for instance, Bill Klupertack, who drives the 'bus.'"

"Of course," said Mr. Halway, "if you form ties with people of the class into which chance has thrown you, it will only confirm the public's opinion that you belong where you have fallen."

"But the opinion of the public doesn't make a person, after all," George declared.

"That is true," responded Mr. Halway; "but it very often unmakes person! If this Bill Klupertack is a congenial young man, with aspirations such as you have, I would not let the fact that he drives a 'bus interfere with intimacy, any more than I would seek the companionship of a young man because his father is rich."

"Oh! Bill is just a good-hearted, thick-headed fellow," said George. "He means well, but of course he doesn't care for education, or things that I care for. But it's pretty lonesome, not having anybody for a friend."

"Yes; but as soon as any one determines to rise above his situation, he

Business Notes.

Song Books are always in demand, but the run on Popular Hymns No. 2, Living Praise, Silver and Gold continues, while Gospel Call, Nos. 1 and 2, is always acceptable to the people. $2.00 per dozen, limp.

The devotional books of J. H. Garrison do not need much advertising, for such is their contents that they are always in demand, selling at the uniform price of 75 cents each, and daily go to appreciative readers.

The address of J. H. Garrison on "Church Federation" is in demand and should be in the hands of all who wish to know his position and from which, when understood, but few will dissent. The price, 15 cents.

The Testaments offered at less than half price are the English revision with the American preferences on last pages and are selling right along at 7 cents, limp, 15 cents, cloth, and 35 cents for Long Primer, silk cloth.

Your school will not lose its interest with one of our first-class libraries in it and we will make inducements that you may try it for yourselves, selling you forty volumes of splendid literature for all grades, at $6.00, express prepaid. Former price, $12.00, not prepaid.

The Lesson Commentary "sticks to the gospel." It gives us the best blackboard illustrations, it contains the colored maps needed in the study and teaching of the word, it contains the Authorized and American revision side by side, and it is offered to you for inspection at 60 cents, postpaid.

The Pocket Record by G. A. Hoffmann continues in demand, being just the thing for our preachers, handy, compact and pointed. At the price it is a genuine bargain, being exactly half price as compared with other similar records, and is much better, both mechanically and in contents. It sells at 50 cents.

Among the "rapid growers," count OUR YOUNG FOLKS. Its list is increasing remarkably. The offer of the World's Fair Portfolio for one new name and 75 cents is a compliment of the editor to the army of OUR YOUNG FOLKS' friends who will be here this summer and will want to post themselves before coming.

One of our lady friends writes that the "Be Faithful Series of Award cards" are very successful in holding and increasing the attendance of the younger pupils of the Sunday-schools. The series has three packs, Nos. 50, 51 and 52, and the series has 100 cards in first, 25 in second, 10 in third, and sells for 90 cents the series, running one year.

"Altar Stairs," is one of the best works of religious fiction and can be commended in high terms to those seeking in attractive form, the results of a determined effort on the part of infidelity to wreck and ruin a home and the family circle. Judge Scofield never wrote anything better nor more to the point, and it is doing much good. $1.50.

In ordering the Lesson Commentary, a friend says, "They are preserved, so that gradually I am accumulating one of the best libraries for an ordinary man that can be had." Good idea that, and we are offering the back numbers at remarkable figures, 40 cents, and this year's at 60 cents postpaid. But the brother is right. Buy each year as it comes and keep it.

R. M. Giddens pays a very high compliment to Half Hour Studies at the Cross. He masters some one of its many chapters during the week so that he may have something new for the brethren next Lord's day when presiding at the table. What a multitude there are that should do likewise, so that we may be edified and established in the faith. 75 cents.

The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century is without doubt one of the best books ever issued by this Company for its purpose, giving the rise and progress of the Reformation inaugurated by the Campbells, and ought to be in the hands of all desiring to be thoroughly up on the growth and development of the Reformation. 500 pages, well bound in good substantial cloth, $2.00.

When the newspapers will print a column about a book it must have something of interest in it. That is the way they are receiving Dr. W. T. Moore's new book, which contains many novel views, $2.00.

"Man Preparing for Other Worlds," by W. T. Moore, is much more than an eschatological speculation. It is a strong presentation covering such points as man's creation, degeneration, his new birth, character, influence, ethical standard, his rest in the Rest-giver, his training in the church and other phases of his life before he is prepared for the other worlds that are being prepared for him. It is one of the handsomest volumes ever published in the west. Price, $2.00.

HERE are Indians, Chinese and Negroes; ignorant and vicious populations; groups of foreigners; the frontiers of civilization and the centers of cities; the prairies and the slums; the jails, asylums, and workhouses. Here is book and Bible work, evangelistic work, reformatory work, educational work, missionary work, and many other forms of gospel benevolence, with abundance of machinery for all the exigencies of service. Places are ready for the men and women, and societies exist to commission and direct them, and to collect and administer the necessary funds.

Organization is, indeed, one of the characteristics of the church of to-day. The idea of organization was in the first church ever formed. Where two or more believers are, there is a call for fellowship, for association, and for co-operation. The church of the present is but working out more fully the central idea of Christian fellowship. This fellowship is now understood to be for mutual helpfulness and for service. We are saved to serve, and we can serve best if we serve according to some system. Hence we organize.

Current Events

An actor, speaking from an Episcopal pulpit last week in the interest of the Actors' Church Alliance—which is an excellent institution in many respects—took occasion to protest against what he called the prejudice of the church against all things pertaining to the stage, and asserted that the theater ought to be recognized as standing side by side with the church as a co-ordinate institution for the moral, intellectual and spiritual education of the race. This is not particularly new doctrine, but is worth noting in this case especially because this speech happened to contain the antidote for its own poison. If one pleases to say that the drama ought to be a moral and spiritual force, we will not stop to argue the point with him. It was that in the days of Sophocles. But if one claims recognition for the drama of to-day as a spiritual and moral institution, we are compelled to judge it by what it is. It is a condition and not a theory which confronts us. But few people, even in the church, assert that the drama is wrong in principle, that it always was and of necessity always must be evil and demoralizing. The "prejudice" to which the actor-speaker referred expresses itself not in denunciation of the theory of drama, but in criticism of the practice of it as we have it in this day and age. The answer to his own argument for recognition of the theater as a moral force co-ordinate with the church, is found in his own words: "The meretricious play of the modern playwright cannot be laid at the door of the actor who speaks the lines. The evil originates in the box-office. The personal preference of the actor is in the opposite direction; but the actor is rarely free to follow his own inclinations. The American theatrical manager is a business man, investing his money in the commodity which sells best. It is unfair to condemn the people of the stage for a condition of affairs for which the public is to blame." This reveals the fundamental weakness of the stage as a moral agency and its fundamental unlikeness to the church. The stage is an institution which rests upon popular fancy and gives the public what it will most willingly pay for. The church is an institution which rests upon the revelation of God and gives the people what they ought to have. The modern stage, by the very definition of its representative, can exist only by getting down to the popular level. Such an institution cannot be a force for righteousness in an age when the popular demand in that direction is for the meretricious.

There are many Reubenites in the modern world. "By the water courses of Reuben there were great resolves of heart." And that was all. There were great debates and great searchings of heart. But Reuben continued among the sheep folds to listen to the pipings for the flocks; he never took action. Many a young American is taking this kind of ease. He has something of the sentimentalist about him. He can discourse rationally upon the subject of politics, or religion or social science. He is sympathetic towards any movement that means the betterment of the national life, but his sympathy is merely expressed in fruitless palaver. It never seeks by quiet, persistent effort constructive good. But there are young men in America whom America is justly honoring because they are men whose interest in the struggle between right and wrong does not end with information, discussion, and opinion. Such men are Folk of Missouri, Jerome of New York, and Steffens of McClure's. Mr. Jerome has just won another victory in the face of great opposition. He has at last secured legislation at Albany which will give him power to prosecute and convict gamblers who have had so strong a "pull" that they have hitherto been able to defy him.

Fireworks for the Japs and spasms for the Russians has been the course of the far eastern war. Indefinite rumor chases rumor until the censor on the favored side has a great victory to report—and then we know that something has happened. Port Arthur is still the center of interest, for there again the Russians have suffered a great loss. They were inveigled into making a sortie with some of their best ships and in the return to the harbor the Petropavlovsk, one of the finest of the great fighting machines, struck a mine that had been laid by the Japanese, and, almost without a moment's warning, sank beneath the waves, with nearly all on board, including Admiral Makaroff, in command of the czar's navy, and Verestchagin, the famous painter of war pictures. In a running fight prior to this catastrophe, the Japs sank a Russian torpedo boat. There seems to be a large contingent of Japanese troops somewhere at sea, but as one day we hear that the Russians have attacked and wiped them out as they landed, and the next that they are impatiently awaiting their landing, we get little satisfaction out of their hide-and-seek game. The funniest report of all is that Russia is going to postpone the war for a season. That is enough to make the fierce face of Japan's war-god wear a smile. The happiest sign of the week is the interest King Edward of England is taking in the possibility of bringing about an honorable peace.

The fact that our system of government leaves in the hands of the several states legislation upon some matters of general concern, has been a fruitful source of abuses and embarrassments. We have corporation laws lax in one state and strict in another, yet the company incorporated in the state of lax laws can do business in the state of strict laws. We have divorce laws strict in one state, and in another as facile, prompt and indiscriminating in operation as a slot-machine, yet it has been the custom to recognize as valid in every state a divorce granted in any state. Even South Carolina, which has no law at all on the subject of divorce, and consequently cannot grant one for any cause, recognizes divorces obtained in South Dakota where almost any excuse is accepted. The practical result has been that the loosest state law has been practically the law for the country. The present status of divorce in this country, so far as it is traceable to legislation on the subject, is due to the lax laws of a few states, against which the comparatively strict laws of other states are no serious barrier. A recent decision by the Supreme Court of Iowa marks a departure from the practice of recognizing without question divorces granted in other states. The decision is said to have the effect of invalidating many divorces which have been obtained by Iowans who had established temporary residence in North or South Dakota for that purpose. The confusion which may easily follow from the general application of this decision, may readily be imagined. If there is no certainty that a divorce will be held valid in any state except that which issued it, then we have the domestic arrangements of thousands of people at once thrown into chaos. It may be quite true that their immoral course deprives them of any strong claim for consideration, but it may be that such uncertainty would tend to discourage persons from securing cheap divorces in the easy states. But this is no proper solution of the divorce question and it harmonizes ill with our theory of the relations which should subsist among the states. The remedy, both in this case and in the similar abuse of the lax corporation laws of New Jersey and some other laws, is to secure uniformity by making both divorce and incorporation subjects for federal legislation.

Mr. Carnegie has the honor of having invented a new form of benevolence, an achievement even more rare and notable than the ability and willingness to give large sums of money. Wearied, perhaps, of the dull daily routine of building libraries, with only the donation of an occasional church organ to mitigate the intolerable monotony, he has sought and found a new object of endowment—and a good one. A fund of $5,000,000 has been put into the hands of competent trustees, the interest of which is to be used in relieving the needs of the dependents left destitute by persons who lose their lives in performing acts of conspicuous heroism, and in pensioning the heroes themselves in case they survive with permanent injuries. It is to be known as the Hero Fund. If the intention or the probable effect of this endowment were to put heroism upon a commercial basis and set a market price upon unselfish and heroic endeavor, it would be the sign that the last light of chivalry and idealism had died out from a dull and sordid world. But we do not take it so. A military pension list, when properly guarded against abuse, is a roll of honor. The dollars are not the price of the heroic blood that has been shed, but are an acknowledgment of the gratitude of the public to one who has served the common good at the sacrifice of his private interests. The government can properly take care of military pensions. Many acts of civil heroism are performed under conditions which place some corporation under moral if not legal obligation to provide for the injured or bereaved. But there are still many cases where the heroic deed is essentially a public service. In such cases the victims and their dependents may well be cared for out of a quasi-public fund such as this which Mr. Carnegie has established.

Russia is afraid of the wireless telegraph. Recognizing or anticipating the sympathy of the technically neutral powers with Japan, and seeing in wireless telegraphy an exceptionally convenient instrument by which spies might send valuable information from the scene of war, Russia has issued an order stating that newspaper correspondents using wireless telegraphy on neutral vessels in the zone of operations of the Russian fleet will be treated as spies if caught, and the vessels carrying the equipment will be considered prizes of war. Just at present, fortunately, the "zone of operations of the Russian fleet" is of very limited extent, so the restriction is not a serious one. But for a government to issue such an order, arbitrarily and without consultation, denying to correspondents who are subjects of neutral powers, or neutral ships in neutral waters, the right to use a piece of scientific apparatus which their business demands, is an unwarrantable invasion of the rights of neutrals. It would be as justifiable to forbid them to use fountain-pens or to carry field-glasses. Both might conceivably be useful in conveying war news to the enemy, but the mere possession of them or of instruments for wireless telegraphy is not prima facie evidence that the possessor is a Japanese spy. Russia will find herself involved in a new set of troubles if she attempts to invade the established rights of neutrals at the present time.

On Monday New York state instructed its delegation to the National Convention to vote for the nomination of Judge Parker vs. Roosevelt. Parker as the Democratic presidential candidate. There was finally a compromise with Tammany, that organization being allowed to name the delegate and elector at large. This somewhat clears the political atmosphere. The nomination of Mr. Roosevelt by the Republicans may be taken for granted, unless the very much unexpected happens before the meeting of the convention. Many of the petty complaints that have been lodged against him, such as his use of a United States vessel as a private yacht, are known to be unjust and nothing but party claptrap. When real issues are at stake, the Republicans will line up for Mr. Roosevelt as their champion against the Democratic nominee. Who this will be depends on whether private interests or the public good shall prevail with the leaders of the party. A program is lacking as yet, and on paper there are several candidates, though in reality only two—Judge Parker and Mr. Hearst. The journalist is working for all he is worth and he is favored by Mr. Bryan, who is opposed to Judge Parker. But the better element of the Democratic party are arraying themselves against Mr. Hearst, and he has just received a seemingly hard knock in Iowa, where his agents had been very busy in his interests. The millionaire newspaper man has spent a great deal of money and has quite a following, but there is a feeling that he is making this race with a view to a future candidacy and without much hope of winning the nomination this year. Much will depend on Mr. Bryan. He can easily split his party. Should his influence be sufficiently powerful to prevent Judge Parker being the nominee we are inclined to the opinion that Missouri will furnish a compromise candidate. If Judge Parker be selected we can probably take the New York platform as the substance of the issues for which the national convention will raise the Democratic standard. After renewing fidelity to the principles of Jefferson, the platform presented on Monday in the New York convention demanded revision of the tariff; pledged opposition to trusts and the regulation of corporations; condemned the unsteady national policies which engender alarms and check commercial growth, and declared for honesty in the public service, guaranteeing firmness in the punishment of corruption. No mention of the silver issue was made.

Brevities.

The application of Mrs. Bennett, of New Haven, for the removal of W. J. Bryan as executor of her husband's estate, has been dismissed.

Senator Burton, of Kansas, will neither occupy his seat in the senate nor resign from that body until his appeal has been passed upon by the higher court.

Senator Dietrich, of Nebraska, has been cleared of the charge of using his senatorial influence for pecuniary profit in connection with certain post offices of his state.

Emperor William has sent to the St. Louis World's Fair a unique exhibit consisting of $150,000 worth of silverware which he and the empress received as wedding presents at the time of their marriage in 1881.

An eastern paper thinks it absurd for Chicago to attempt municipal ownership of street cars when the city "cannot keep its saloons decent or its streets clean." When did anybody or any city ever keep a saloon decent? Conundrum: When is a saloon not a saloon? When is it decent.

The end is not yet, but political observers now express no doubt of Mr. Folk's nomination. County after county is declaring for him by overwhelming majorities. But Mr. Folk himself has not lost sight of the fact that he must secure a majority of the 610 delegates to the state convention, and, true to his character, he is working with all his might to make effective the campaign against boodles.

Missouri Christian Lectureship.

The annual session of the Missouri Christian Lectureship was held at Fulton, capital of the kingdom of Callaway, last week. The attendance was not so large as usual, but in all other respects the present session was worthy of the best traditions of the lectureship. This institution is to Missouri Disciples what the Congress is to the Disciples at large—a sort of clearing house for theological, critical and practical problems. They are very useful as a safety valve for the free expression of opinions, and also as a help to an all round view of these questions. They are very interesting, too, except to those who are disturbed by new ideas and who dislike exceedingly to have their mental furniture disarranged by the introduction of a new thought. Those who feel keenly the need of a clearer and larger view of truth, and who are willing to give up all the error they may have cherished for one truth, enjoy these opportunities of comparing views and looking upon all sides of every living question.

The lectureship opened on Monday evening with a strong address by W. T. Moore, of Columbia, on "Preachers' Problems." The large auditorium of the Christian church was filled with an interested audience. We shall attempt no outline even of these lectures, as our space forbids doing them justice. Brother Moore discussed in his vigorous way the problems relating to the preacher's call to the ministry, his preparation, his environment or location, pastoral visiting and some of the literary and scientific problems with which the preacher is concerned. The discussion of this paper next morning dealt mainly with the question of pastoral work. There was a general consensus of opinion that no preacher could serve his congregation effectively from the pulpit who did not visit the members in their homes and understand their condition and needs by personal observation and conversation. Dr. Moore explained that he had discouraged only social calling by the pastor and not truly pastoral work among the people.

By far the most interesting and animated discussion during the Lectureship was "The Doctrine of the Atonement," presented in a very able paper by Dean W. J. Lhamon, of Columbia, and reviewed in a very strong and incisive paper by J. J. Morgan, of Kansas City. The first paper defined the atonement as meaning at-one-ment, and included everything in it in the life of Christ that served to bring men into union with God. The striking feature of the address was its emphasis upon the atoning value of the whole life of Christ—His miracles, His parables, His teaching, as well as His death, the latter being, as the author stated, "only an incident in the life of our Saviour." This word "incident" was subsequently changed by him after the discussion for the word "step," meaning that it was an essential part, but not the whole of the atonement. He rejected the vicarious and substitutionary theories of the atonement, but during the discussion in his final reply, drew the distinction between vicarious suffering, which he freely admitted, and vicarious penalty. This distinction, together with the removal of the word "incident," did much to narrow the differences, and yet there was a feeling with many that the word atonement was used in too large and diffusive a sense to harmonize with the New Testament idea, or what the term in the original signifies. The paper of Brother Morgan, without defending the extremes of certain outgrown theories of the atonement, insisted that they contained an important element of truth, and he laid impressive emphasis upon the value of Christ's death, of the shedding of His blood, of the cross. Instead of the idea of the atonement being determined by our conception of God, as was stated in the first paper, he insisted that the reverse was true, and that our conception of God was determined by the revelation of God through the atonement or the death of Christ. The discussion was very generally participated in, and we believe was very profitable, each of the papers bringing out phases of the truth that must enter into an all-round scriptural theory of the subject.

On the subject of the authorship of the Hebrews, Prof. D. R. Dungan, of Christian University, had pretty much his own way, making a strong argument for the Pauline authorship. His paper was concerned chiefly in reviewing the arguments of Canon Farrar against the Pauline authorship, and pointing out the internal evidence in the book itself that it is the work of the apostle to the Gentiles. There was no general discussion of the topic, not perhaps that everyone agreed with the conclusion of the paper, but rather because the question lacked the practical interest which others had, and for lack of time.

Tuesday evening was occupied with a strong lecture by E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., on the topic, "Was the Ideal of the Fathers in the Current Reformation Practicable?" and the supplementary address by J. H. Garrison. Brother Powell was the guest of the Lectureship, and his address, delivered in his usual fervid style, awakened deep interest. As we print it elsewhere we need not refer to its contents, but invite attention to it. The discussion of this subject the next morning was exceedingly interesting and helpful, closing with remarkable unanimity of sentiment, as is not infrequently the case in these discussions.

Levi Marshall, of Hannibal, discussed the subject of the "New Psychology" in a very interesting and suggestive paper, which was reviewed in an equally happy manner by Prof. C. M. Sharpe of the Missouri Bible College, who was appointed to that task after it was known that Bro. J. M. Rudy, of Sedalia, would not be present. As these brethren developed no lines of heresy, and avoided dogmatic positions, there was no discussion, though there was light shed upon what the new psychology is and what it is trying to accomplish.

Dr. Clarke's "Outline of Christian Theology," as one of the ablest works in modern times, was reviewed in two papers, the first three chapters being epitomized for us by F. N. Calvin, of St. Louis, and the last three chapters by L. B. Cupp, of Platte City. It is impossible to review such a book as this in two brief papers, and the brethren mentioned wisely refrained from any such attempt, but rather gave us, mainly in the author's own language, a digest of his views on the leading topics. Dr. Clarke's views of eschatology, or the "last things," aroused the criticism of one or two speakers, but the majority welcomed the effort of this great and clear thinker to throw some light upon confessedly dark and difficult problems.

On Wednesday evening, instead of the address by F. G. Tyrrell, of St. Louis, on the "Ethics of Wealth," Bro. E. L. Powell, who had to leave early the next morning, delivered his splendid lecture on "Citizenship in a Republic," which was to have been delivered on the first evening of the Lectureship. It was an able and eloquent appeal for the high ideals of the Republic and for a more faithful discharge of the duties of citizenship. It is a lecture that might well be delivered all over the state of Missouri just now, and, as for that matter, throughout the country. This lecture was given in the Presbyterian church, whose auditorium, being larger than that of the Christian church, was courteously tendered for this occasion.

Brother Tyrrell, who had generously surrendered the evening to our guest, Brother Powell, delivered his lecture at 9:30 on Thursday morning. We have often heard Brother Tyrrell on the platform, but we have never heard him do himself and his subject greater justice than in this splendid lecture. The fact that he drew a very large audience at that hour in the morning was highly complimentary to his ability as a speaker. The Lectureship closed with a few concluding remarks by Dr. Moore, by the president, Crayton S. Brooks, and the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, the benediction being pronounced by Brother Moore.

A very pleasant episode of the Lectureship was the visit to William Woods College on Wednesday morning, on the invitation of President J. B. Jones. The Lectureship attended in a body, occupying the platform and witnessing the calisthenic exercises of the young ladies, performed with wonderful grace and unanimity. After devotional exercises conducted by one of the visitors, one of the young ladies welcomed the Lectureship in a happy little speech, which was responded to in his own felicitous style by E. L. Powell. Brief addresses were also made by Brother Perkins, of Huntsville, and Brother Marshall, of Independence. It was a joy to all of us to see the evidences of prosperity and improvement in this popular institution, to note the large attendance and the fine quality of young women who make up its patronage. Brother Jones deserves all honor for his faithful and untiring perseverance in lifting this school out of its misfortunes and placing it upon the firm foundation it occupies to-day with its present outlook. The Lectureship owes much to the young ladies of William Woods College and of the Synodical College, and presumably to the young men of Westminster College, for their attendance upon all the various sessions.

The hospitality of the good people of Fulton was characteristic of the place—ample and whole-souled. Fulton is among the most beautiful of our interior small cities, as it is one of the oldest. Its educational and benevolent institutions give it advantages that belong to but few other places in the state. Bro. Crayton S. Brooks, of Jefferson City, gave fine satisfaction as chairman, showing himself as modest as he is capable. Levi Marshall was chosen president of the next lectureship, which, however, will probably be confined to a business session at Columbia in connection with our congress there next year.

A Word From Brother Ames.

When a man's orthodoxy merely is called in question, he may or may not reply. One can often afford to pass by such criticisms without suffering any damage, but when a minister of the gospel is declared in a public journal to be an "alien" whom all our papers, churches, preachers, missionary societies and secretaries should regard as such, it is altogether proper that he should speak. In answer to a letter to Brother Ames asking for a more recent and direct statement concerning some of the heresies with which he is charged, he has kindly sent us, with permission to print, the following letter:

CHICAGO, ILL., April 9, 1904.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:

I have no hesitancy whatever in expressing myself fully on the points you mention. It has been my habit to speak freely, and here at home among my own people, whether they agree always with the form of words, I have never been accused of such wholesale heresy as some papers now charge to me. That is, I am sure, not due to the whole church here having departed from the faith but to their interpretation of specific utterances in the light of my whole ministry. It is now almost two years since the "Personal Confession of Faith" was printed, and hundreds of copies have been distributed, some of them to prominent ministers among us. Besides, it was given as a personal statement and many here and elsewhere who would not subscribe to it at all have said it was a privilege which our freedom permitted. On the other hand, many of the class for whom it was especially intended, have said they were helped by it, and not a few have been led by it to a far more vital hold upon Christ and the church.

It was because of the value of these views to myself that I first formulated the statement, and their greatest help to me has been at the very point you mention, that is, in the acceptance of Christ as the Son of God and the Saviour of the world. I understand New Testament faith and all genuine faith to mean trust, loyalty, devotion. It is best measured by the degree to which it draws one toward its object and controls action. I am chiefly concerned to make it a matter of life, of conduct for myself and others.

I am glad to say that the experiences of my ministry here have greatly increased this practical, working faith in Christ. My own temper and statements have become decidedly more positive and constructive, and the results in my church have been larger and better. Of course it does not mean much to outsiders to talk about the "peculiarities" of one's field, but some will understand that a city church in the vicinity of a university presents tremendous problems.

I have a growing conviction of the greatness and vitality of the original plea of the Disciples of Christ. Rightly understood and interpreted to our age it has unlimited possibilities. But the narrow, literal, legalistic character of some among us is the worst departure from that plea which it is possible to conceive.

I wish I might emphasize for every one who has read the recent attacks upon my views this statement of fact and of my faith: I am not, never was, and never shall be a "Unitarian." I like a fine phrase which passes smoothly among us, "We seek not to be Unitarians nor Trinitarians, but simply Christians." My faith is, and I can say it with my whole mind and soul, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and my Saviour.

EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES.

Our readers are altogether too well indoctrinated as to the real position and teaching of this reformation, not to understand that a man who holds the position stated in the foregoing letter, and who in addition maintains a Christian character that has never been called in question, is not to be disturbed in his fellowship, much less denounced and treated as an alien. Any one, of course, is at liberty to dissent from some of the utterances which he may have made, or they may not be able to sympathize with his mental temperament, but they cannot deny him Christian fellowship without proving untrue to the historic position of this movement, to its basis of union, and to the spirit which has controlled its representative men and teachers throughout its whole history.

Who is there among us that will deny that genuine faith "is best measured by the degree to which it draws one toward its object and controls action"? That has been our time-honored contention, that faith is not an idle sentiment, not a form of words, but a vital principle that manifests itself in a life of loyalty to the Son of God, and that not in any one act, but in the general tenor of one's life.

We are gratified to know that the experiences of Bro. Ames' ministry "have greatly increased this practical, working faith in Christ," and that his "own temper and statements have become decidedly more positive and constructive." This is the inevitable result in any one who seeks to be loyal to his Master and to do his will as he understands that will. An earnest minister cannot come in contact with the real problem of human sin and suffering and seek to bring Christ to those burdened hearts and consciences as their only help, without knowing more and more the power of His gospel and of His life to make men whole, and to inspire them with hope and courage even amid the deepest sorrows and disasters. The Christian who does not find his faith increasing as the years go by, may well question whether his life is loyal to the faith which he already possesses.

Nor are we surprised to learn of Bro. Ames that he has "a growing conviction of the greatness and vitality of the original plea of the Disciples of Christ"; and that "rightly understood and interpreted to our age it has unlimited possibilities." Such has been our own experience as we have looked upon a divided church, with its undue emphasis upon untaught questions, with its party spirit and party shibboleths. Falsely interpreted, this movement may become very "narrow, literal and legalistic," and so fail to accomplish what it was designed to achieve. We have no doubt but that this conviction of our brother will increase with the years.

We did not need to be told by Brother Ames that he is not, never was, and never shall be a Unitarian. Anyone acquainted with the spirit of Unitarianism knows that it is something very unlike the position occupied by him. We felt sure that he could repeat, and we are glad for the sake of others that he has repeated, that good confession which he made when he became a Christian, "that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and my Saviour." Better that any man or that any religious journal have a millstone tied about its neck and be cast into the sea, than to declare him an alien who can make that confession, and who is seeking to be loyal to it in his personal life and in his public ministry.

An aged brother writes: "One great error of the Disciples in their early history was the emphasis put on forms and ordinances, giving to a religion of life and love a set, unvarying form called 'the ancient order of things.'" But it must be remembered that the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper had well nigh lost their original significance and it was needful to give large emphasis to them until the pendulum should swing back to the center. It is too true, perhaps, that in doing this some may have emphasized the form at the expense of the spirit. We are sure some have done this, but the tendency at present is to maintain the true proportion of emphasis.

Editor's Easy Chair.

"Faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love." The Easy Chair sometimes wonders whether this Pauline statement is fully accepted, even by those of us whose avowed object is to restore New Testament Christianity. Indeed there are constantly recurring evidences that many of us do not believe it. We are rightly jealous of our creed—the creed of Christianity. It is so short, simple, comprehensive, fundamental and vital, that there is nothing in it to compromise. Flesh and blood have not revealed it, but our Father in heaven. On it Jesus said he would build his church. On it rest all the fondest hopes of humanity. If it be not true that Jesus of Nazareth was and is the Son of God, the Messiah that was to come, and whose coming would change the current of the world's history and open up a fountain of life for our perishing race, then indeed, "we are of all men most miserable," because we have caught a glimpse of a glorious destiny which can never be ours, if so be that Jesus is not the Christ of God. In view, therefore, of the vital and eternal interests involved, we ought to be exceedingly careful about surrendering even an outpost of the faith that would in the least endanger its very citadel. Not that the citadel is really endangered, but men's imperfect faith may be endangered by such doubtful concessions. We do not wonder that brethren are zealous for the maintenance of this divine creed in its integrity with all it involves. It is right that they should be.

Let us take, for instance, the question of miracles. Admit that they do not hold the same evidential value to this generation that they did to former generations; they are, nevertheless, a part of the New Testament record and are inseparably bound up with Christ's teaching so that we cannot reject the one as incredible and maintain the other. So also the supernatural birth and pre-existence of Christ. These facts may not come first in the scheme of apologetics adapted to our day, but they stand as an imperishable part of the testimony concerning Christ, as given by men who were promised, and who claimed to have received, the Holy Spirit in such measure as to enable them to bear reliable witness to Christ. When we rise into the region of faith and of spiritual insight into which these men had been lifted by the revelation of Christ, we do not believe these doctrines will trouble us, nor will we permit ourselves to be turned away from them or be led to undervalue them by any system of ancient or of modern philosophy. It is one thing, of course, not to make prominent use of these facts as evidences of Christianity in dealing with a certain class of skeptical men, and a very different thing to reject them as incredible. One is bound to use that course of argument that he believes to be best adapted to those whom he is seeking to bring to faith. The question of environment exerts a very modifying influence on the form of our apologetics, and this fact will not be lost sight of by those who have judgment sufficient to discriminate. Paul did not preach at Athens quite like he did at other places, but he was always and everywhere seeking to bring men to the same essential faith.

But admitting all that, we are free to say that any preaching that omits or minimizes the presentation of the facts of Christ's miracles, of his unique advent into the world and his pre-existence "in the form of God" before he "emptied himself," and "was found in fashion as a man," must be only a partial gospel, lacking some of the essential elements which have made the gospel of Christ a conquering power in the world. We should never make the mistake of supposing that, because our own personal faith may be able to stand independent of certain historical facts, this is equally true of the faith of others. The ladder that has helped us up to the altitude of serene, unshaken faith, should be left for the use of others who may need it for the same purpose. There will always be those who are struggling out of doubt and darkness, feeling after God, if haply they may find Him, and who will need every possible help that we may extend to them. Let us reach out helpful hands to them. So shall faith abide, and hope, her fair daughter, will abide with her, bringing cheer and gladness into erstwhile dark and despairing souls.

"But the greatest of these is love." It is well to be sound in faith. It is better to be sound in love. "Love suffereth long and is kind; love envieth not; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, taketh not account of evil; rejoiceth not in unrighteousness, but rejoiceth with the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." With this principle dominant among us, we shall maintain unity. Otherwise it will be impossible. Differences in judgment, differences in taste and temperament, differences in attainments and points of view, differences in methods of reasoning and of work, there must always be. But love blends all these into a sublime unity in Christ, giving freedom and fellowship to all. Better to err in some of the things involved in faith, or in hope, than to be defective in love, which is the bond of our unity. These truths, always timely, have a special application just now to existing conditions and needs. A word to the wise is sufficient, and let that word be that of our great apostle: "The greatest of these is love."

Notes and Comments.

In his address at Chicago on "The Distinctive Mission of the Disciples of Christ," Bro. T. W. Grafton gives a quotation from Mr. Campbell, with a comment which we warmly commend to the brotherhood as touching one of the supreme needs of the hour:

"I would not," said Mr. Campbell, "value at the price of a single mill the religion of any man, as respects the grand affair of eternal life, whose religion was not begun, carried on and completed by the personal agency of the Holy Spirit. Nay, I esteem it the peculiar excellence and glory of our religion that it is spiritual, that the soul of man is quickened, enlightened, sanctified and consoled by the indwelling presence of the spirit of the eternal God."

If our plea for the restoration of primitive Christianity is to gain acceptance and infuse new life and power into indifferent Christendom, while not less loyal to external requirements, it must place greater emphasis upon the work of the Holy Spirit and the exhibition of the unmistakable fruits of spiritual life.

In the beginning, we are told, the Christian church was "all with one accord in one place," but if Peter and Paul were to come to New York, or to New Orleans, or to San Francisco, or to Boston, they would find the members of this one church in 169 different places, with a practical man, named James, leading one group of disciples; an emotional Peter leading another group; the aesthetic John leading still another group; and the philosophic Paul each guiding his own band. The cross of Christ stands in the centre, but each regiment, with back toward that cross, marches away from his fellows, while his denominational leader beats time. Yet unity, co-operation, could combine these scattered regiments into a solid army, marching to victory.—Newell Dwight Hillis in Everybody's Magazine for April.

Now if we can only persuade the "denominational leaders" to face the cross, and allow Christ to "beat time" while they give themselves to keeping step to that time, we should soon have the unity which would mean victory.

There is a very pretty begging of the question and skipping over the main point in many speeches and articles upon Christian union one meets with. Any writer who takes "the Comprehensive Church" as a theme and starts off with the axiom that "a homogeneous whole was never yet constructed from heterogeneous parts," is not in the way of reaching any fair conclusion. A man who goes no further back than Luther does not inspire us with any hope that he will contribute much to the reunion problem. This seems to us the starting point of Dr. Henry Dosker in his discussion of the present tendency to church union. If it be true that "denominationalism after all is the essence of Protestantism," we wonder if there is not something even more authoritative than Protestantism as a standard for determining whether Christians shall work and worship together in united harmony. If Dr. Dosker would go back to the early church and would lend his aid to bringing about the kind of union which Jesus Christ wants, he would not have time to worry himself about any "comprehensive church" or merely mechanical unification.

England's Gospel Gladiator

By Wm. Durban

There are several men living in England whom America might covet. And, of course, per contra, America owns a number of men who would gladly be welcomed as immigrants by England. The old country has tried to kidnap Dr. Amory Bradford, to capture Dr. Gunsaulus, to annex Dr. Hillis, to recover my old friend, Dr. Harwood Patison (of whose death I hear with deep grief). Two men are at this moment constantly before the English religious world. They are Reginald John Campbell, the pastor of the City Temple, and Dr. Clifford, of Westbourne Park, Bayswater. The former is the most prominent Congregationalist in London; the latter is the leader of London Baptists.

"Campbell in Hot Water."

As I passed through the streets of the City of London this afternoon, I saw on the large contents-bill of the Pall Mall Gazette, a popular evening journal, a line in startling letters, "Campbell in Hot Water!" By the law of the association of ideas this instantly reminded me of something that happened many years ago in the experience of the famous Bishop Wilberforce. As that prelate was riding in a train on a journey to a conference, he was recognized by some passengers, one of whom was rude enough to ask a companion, "Jack, why is a certain bishop always called Soapy Sam?" Now, this soubriquet was popularly applied to Bishop Wilberforce, who listened to the remark and instantly intervened with the information, "My friend, I can tell you what you want to know; it is because the bishop in question is always getting into hot water but every time comes out with clean hands!"

We have in our midst a preacher who has not long been in London, but has attained as Dr. Parker's successor prodigious fame. But Mr. Campbell is already betraying very eccentric tendencies which are making him an incarnate conundrum to many even of his admirers and friends. He is attracting immense crowds, but he is of late taking to oratorical escapades of bewildering character, as well as to new departures in the way of strange innovations of conduct. He is upsetting the order of things in his sanctuary by putting the choir into vestments. This is against Puritan traditions, for which the City Temple is famous. He went to the great conference of the Federated Free Churches a fortnight since, and flung a sputtering firebrand into the arena by an attack on the working classes, describing great numbers of them as drunken and dissolute, with a few more unflattering adjectives. He, not long before that, had gone off to Birmingham to visit Joseph Chamberlain, and came back to publicly say that some of Mr. Chamberlain's ideas did not seem to be wrong. He raised a storm at a great meeting in Queen's Hall by allusions to the late Boer war, seeming to justify that deplorable conflict. And finally, Mr. R. Perks, the leading Wesleyan layman of England (a famous engineer and railway magnate and member of parliament), last night in an important meeting, attacked the minister of the City Temple for seeking an introduction to the King. Thus Mr. Campbell has during his very brief London ministry piled up a number of heavy indictments against himself.

Dr. John Clifford.

I am myself pronouncing no opinion on his vagaries, which seem to me to be of small moment when we take into account his genius. But I want to devote most of this article to a man of far larger celebrity and of much greater weight and influence with regard to the national life. I allude to Dr. Clifford.

The "Life" of Clifford.

I am impelled to take up this personal topic by the appearance of a biography of John Clifford. It is issued this week, from the pen of Mr. William Bateman, and is entitled "John Clifford, Free Church Leader and Preacher." This book does not do justice to Clifford, for this reason, that no book could do him justice. Many people who are competent to judge are of opinion that the great Baptist is the foremost living Englishman. He is certainly the most versatile man amongst living English preachers. His sermons are sacred orations of the very highest level. His lectures are masterpieces of didactic delivery. His pamphlets on great current topics, social, political and educational, are so powerful in both argument and declamation that to the latest even the Prime Minister of England was constrained to issue one in reply, which elicited a crushing and humiliating rejoinder, although Mr. Balfour is a splendid writer. Dr. Clifford's university career placed him in the front rank of the students of the time. He is M.A., B.S., and LL.B. of London University, an institution which has never given any honorary degrees, and makes its curriculum more difficult than that of any other institution of learning in the British Empire.

From Factory to Pulpit.

Dr. Clifford is a splendid sample of the ascent of manhood. He began life as a little factory boy, for at the age of ten he was obliged to go to help his father at the lace machines. Technically speaking, he was at the start a "jacker-off." In 1900 Dr. James Murray, the famous editor of the great Oxford Dictionary, noted the fact that Dr. Clifford began his life in this capacity, and asked him to supply the definition of the term for the Oxford Dictionary, adding that explanations of such mysteries ought to be given, when no dictionaries have them. The work of a "jacker-off" in a lace factory is to remove the last pieces of thread remaining on the bobbins used in making lace, and fasten them on together in order that a continuous thread may be made which can be used again. Young Clifford for a year left the factory at Nottingham, in order to work in gardening, for the sake of his health. Thus, like the great missionary, Robert Moffatt, he was able to study the laws of nature in the most beautiful sphere. Moffatt was a youthful gardener in Cheshire when he was converted, and at the very same time brought to the resolve to be a missionary, while listening to a sermon on foreign missions, preached by Dr. Burder, of London, in a Macclesfield chapel. It is probably to that year amongst the flowers that Dr. Clifford owes much of his vividly picturesque style. He is equally logical and rhetorical; equally impassioned and argumentative; equally simple in expression and profound in thought.

Dr. Clifford is more fully identified with the common people than any living English preacher, while he is far above them in his intellectual power. He is the finest living example of Christian socialism, at any rate in this country. In all the great current controversies he is in the front as the chivalrous champion of popular right, but only on the ground of heavenly righteousness. He is a patrician in thought and plebeian in sympathy; a prince in the pulpit and one with the peasants and laborers in their yearnings, struggles, sorrows and toils. So the workingmen love Clifford as they love no other public man. He goes out into the wide world and raises his voice on behalf of the poor and the weak.

As Seen from the Dome

By F. D. Power

The next thing is the May offering: the Calends of May, remember. May 1 is a memorable day in American annals. It was on Sunday, May 1, 1898, that Dewey's fleet entered Manila Bay and added 1,200 islands and 8,000,000 people to our colonial expansion. This sixth anniversary of the great naval victory should mean even larger things for our national greatness. That signified a clash of arms and an enlargement of territory; this has to do with the spiritual and eternal interests of our whole people. As goes the first of May, so goes America; as goes America, so the world.

The making of Christians here is our chief business. One noble soul born into the kingdom in these United States will ensure a potent factor, not only in the future of the imperial nation where its life begins, but in all lands which feel the leavening power of this republic. As the home of the plea for the simple gospel and the union of God's people, as the ripest mission field on earth and the land above all others and before all others which must be Immanuel's land, as the base of supplies to which we look for the means and the men to bear to all the world the glorious gospel of the blessed God, we must push the work of home missions as vital and imperative. Here are the sources, the very roots, of things. Jerusalem, all Judea, Samaria, the uttermost parts of the earth—is the divine order. How mighty for the cause of all missions is a single consecrated Christian in this land which God is making a radiating center of light to all lands! How one true American Christian counts in the work of world-wide conquest! How much we gain when one soul is gained and all its marvelous and magnificent forces are directed from this high vantage ground upon the adversary! How much a man or a woman means in America!

On the Lord's day, March 20, one of the most prominent and impressive figures in our Virginia brotherhood entered upon the rest that remaineth for the people of God. The well-known and well-beloved Mrs. Dolly Walker, of King and Queen county, fell asleep in Christ. At the ripe age of 73, for 61 years a Christian, for 53 years a wife, the mother of 11 children and grandmother of 21, 40 years a Sunday-school teacher and 40 years leader of the service of song in the Smyrna church, her hand has been in every good work and her influence has been felt far and wide. Seven of her children survive her, and one of them, my old classmate in Bethany, Dr. R. Temple Walker, is president of the Florida Christian Missionary Society; another is the wife of the efficient pastor of the Norfolk church, J. T. T. Hundley, and still another, Dr. Roland Walker, is an elder in the same congregation. Edward B. Bagby, of this city, is her nephew. She was one of three who became members of the C. W. B. M. when its claims were first presented in Virginia at the General Missionary Convention in 1876. She was a regular attendant with her husband at the district and state missionary conventions and was thoroughly devoted to the cause of her Master and liberal in her gifts for the advancement of his kingdom.

Originally a Baptist, the daughter of Richard and Dorothy Ann Bagby, of King and Queen county, she was married to Dr. Bernard H. Walker, Feb. 12, 1851, a member of Smyrna Christian church. Before their marriage she proposed that he should go with her two Sundays in each month, and that she should worship with him the other two Sundays at Smyrna. He said, deeply as he loved her, he could not consent to such an arrangement, as it would be at a sacrifice of his convictions of duty; that he would always be glad to have her go with him, and when she wished to go to her own church he would provide a way for her to do so. She replied: "I honor you for your adherence to what you regard as your Christian duty, feeling sure that if you were not true to your obligations to your God, you would not be true to your obligations as a husband." After marriage they studied the Scriptures together, praying for light and guidance, and in six months, unsolicited, she expressed her desire to unite with Smyrna church. From that time to the close of her life she worked with her good husband for the upbuilding of the cause she had espoused. He has been for two score years an elder in the church and together they have labored and together rejoiced.

My first pastorate was with that congregation. I had many opportunities during the two years to observe the strong faith and bright hope, the noble, generous nature and consistent Christian walk, the charity and missionary zeal and loyalty and deep devotion of this most excellent Christian woman. She and her husband were among my chief helpers. They were in the Lord, they labored in the Lord, they labored much in the Lord. The prophecy that King Lemuel's mother taught him was abundantly realized in her. Strength and honor were her clothing. She opened her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue was the law of kindness. She stretched out her hands to the poor, yea, she reached forth her hands to the needy. Her children rise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her. Suddenly on the morning of the Lord's day she was taken. The church in Norfolk was planning for a meeting. Although she knew of her husband's deep interest, she could not help asking: "Doctor, are you praying for the meeting?" She had been in declining health, but was preparing to go to church when stricken. Her last words, just fifteen minutes before she breathed her last, were:

"I'll speak the honors of His name
With my last laboring breath,
And dying clasp Him to my breast—
The antidote of death."

The Old Guard dies, but it never surrenders. Of what unspeakable value are such heroic souls in this restless age! These are days of drift. Athens was; but there never were so many Athenians as to-day. To hear and to learn some new thing seems the ambition of every man, and more so, if possible, of every woman. The old, the tried and true, the unchangeable and eternal, does not appear to satisfy this drifting, shifting, hurrying, testing time in which we live. Positive people are the need of the world: men and women who have something worth standing for, and know what they stand for, and stand. When Alexander the Great was asked how he conquered, he answered, "By not wavering." President Pendleton, of Bethany College, took this text for his baccalaureate to my class in 1871: "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit ye like men, be strong." It was a great word which will never be forgotten.

What has this to do with the May offering? Much every way. From one end of this land to the other we want to go making disciples, and just such disciples as I have described, after the New Testament apostolic pattern. We want to build into the living structure of this American nation just such material, and soon we shall fill the world with the greatness and magnificence of the house. We want to cherish such inspiring examples, and follow them as they followed Christ, and sow the same seed into the deepest, truest, mightiest life of this great world-power we call our country, that has produced such lives as the one I have so poorly pictured. God make us equal to our hour of responsibility.

In the interest of the home offering, Z. T. Sweeney led a great rally at the Vermont Avenue church of this city, Tuesday, April 5. Among others with us were Peter Ainslie, J. A. Hopkins, H. C. Kendrick and J. I. Bitner. All our home forces rallied. Our eloquent president was at his best. From the Dome we see that $200,000 rolling in, and that forlorn figure, with the rope about her wrists, lifting her freed hands in blessing and thanksgiving. Twenty-three added to Ninth Street church last Lord's day, eleven to Vermont Avenue, and two to Whitney Avenue; twenty added to Vermont Avenue the past three weeks. As seen from the Dome, things are moving.

Home Missions: Buildings and Men

Central Church, Charlottetown, P. E. I.

Grand Avenue Church, Minneapolis, Minn.

We present a picture of our eastern most mission Charlottetown, pastor R. W. Stevenson. A few years ago this church was torn to pieces by some who were making a test of fellowship, with the doctrine that the Anglo-Saxon race was the last ten tribes of Israel. Through the efforts of R. W. Stevenson, under the support of the home board, the cause was saved and re-established.

Our New Work in New England.

The New England Board of Missions through the A. C. M. S. and the C. W. B. M. has united in New England. J. H. Hardin has been the superintendent of missions, and during his year's service has made a splendid record, organizing a new church at Portland, Me., and receiving a Congregational minister into the fellowship of the church. He says that if our people would make a strong, aggressive campaign in New England, a score of preachers would find their way to the platform of the New Testament Christianity, and many of them would bring their churches with them. At present

Brother Hardin is visiting the churches of Kentucky in the interest of the May offering for home missions.

The district of W. J. Wright, superintendent of missions in the east, is from the Hudson to the Potomac rivers. Here are sixteen millions of people and fourteen millions never heard the plea of the Disciples of Christ. Brother Wright says he would organize at once four new churches, if the home board would assist in their support after organization.

Claude E. Hill is the missionary pastor of the church at Mobile, Ala. He has added sixty members during the last year. By help of the Board of Church Extension a splendid lot has been purchased and a temporary building has been erected upon it. Under the efficient service of Brother Hill our people are already taking a prominent place in the religious life of Mobile. Missouri especially ought to be interested in Brother Hill's work, as he is one of its preachers.

Alexander Campbell visited Baton

Rouge in 1845. Under his great preaching a church was organized there that sent its influence all over the state. During the throes of the civil war the church was scattered abroad and the property was sold. For long years afterward the brethren of Louisiana dreamed of recovering the church in Baton Rouge, but were unable to do so. In 1903 the home board united with the state board of Louisiana in sending John Haddock to Baton Rouge. The result of this was the organization of a church of eighty-six members and one hundred and seventy in the Sunday-school. Brother Haddock has now gone to organize another church at Alexandria, La.

The church at Galveston is the one re-erected in response to the special appeal made by the home board. Immediately after the great storm enough money was sent in to rebuild the church, pay the mortgage indebtedness and purchase a parsonage. Last year S. M. Martin held a great meeting, which added very materially to their strength. The city is rebuilding and the church promises to become self-supporting next year. The sympathies of the brethren will be with Brother and Sister Munro, who have passed the deep waters, having been compelled to bury their eleven-year-old son Donald.

Mexican Mission in Texas.

One of the most interesting and promising fields of missions is among the Mexicans in the southwest. There are over six millions of these people in the United States, and our first work among them is in San Antonio, Texas. We have purchased an excellent lot upon which there is a small building, which is now used as a chapel. Ygnacio Quintero came to Brother Ranshaw when he was pastor of the church in San Antonio. He had been a Roman Catholic and a gambler, but, sin-sick and heart-sick, he sought the better way. He became a convert and even a missionary, on a salary of $25 a month, providing for himself and wife and five children. He goes out to the other cities round San Antonio and preaches the simple gospel and plans the organization of additional churches. We are hoping to greatly enlarge this work in the near future.

Our German Work in Cleveland.

Co-operating with the state board of Ohio we have organized two churches among the German people of Cleveland. William Kraft is the very efficient missionary, his reports showing earnest, faithful work and creditable results.

Ygnacio Quintero, Texas.

Baptists have 232 churches among the German people of America, supporting eighty-six missionaries. This fact should serve as a suggestion or, indeed, a challenge that we should greatly enlarge our work among the Germans.

Among the new stars added to the diadem of our home missionary society we note with pride the church on Grand Avenue, Minneapolis. It came as a result of the enthusiasm of the Minneapolis convention. The movement was led by C. J. Tanner, and C. R. Osgood is pastor. The church numbers one hundred and twenty members, and is pressing toward self-support.

Our Northernmost Missions.

Our northernmost missions are Montreal, Quebec and Winnipeg, Manitoba. Our brethren in Montreal meet in a rented hall; F. C. Ford is the tireless missionary. The population of Montreal is largely Roman Catholic. The Methodist people of Canada gave $45,000 to establish a strong Methodist church in this city. Our brethren will have to come largely to the help of the Christian church at Montreal.

The north star of our mission work is the church at Winnipeg, organized two years ago, assisted from its birth by the A. C. M. S. The church has bought a house and has begun the great work of leavening the religious life of Manitoba with the pleas and platform of Christian union. Already the church has become a little mother of missions by sending Bro. McMillan, its pastor, to organize another church at Snow Hill.

There are two states in the Union where we have no churches—New Hampshire and Nevada. We have a little band of brethren at Manchester, N. H., which will serve as a nucleus of an organization. Some church ought to say it will take that as its special field. We have a band of brethren at Reno, Nevada, and a little work there would result in the organization of a church. It would have to be supported as a mission.

Where is the first church that covets the honor of planting the first church of Christ in Nevada?

Was the Ideal of Our Fathers in the

An address given at the Missouri Christian Lectureship by E. L. Powell.

The one splendid, luminous ideal of the fathers was Christian union. All else, distinctive in aim and work, converges to this goal. In order to Christian union there must be a sense of proportion in the study of the Scriptures, else Old Testament requirements will receive equal emphasis with New Testament teaching. In order to answer the question, what is necessary to the constitution of a church of Jesus Christ—what faith, what ordinances, what organization, what ministry?—it was essential to ascertain whether or not all Scripture is of equal value and of equal binding import in determining the worship and discipline of the church. There can be no Christian union on the basis that all Scripture is of equal importance as respects the constitution of the church. Old Testament ritualism and New Testament simplicity cannot have fellowship. With very great earnestness and applying the methods of historical criticism, Mr. Campbell was led to draw the sharp distinction, so clearly recognized by the New Testament writers, between the law and the gospel, and to distribute the facts of Scripture in the various departments and dispensations to which they severally and collectively belong. Here was a great stride toward the simplification of Christianity as respected its constituent elements of faith, worship and discipline. The conclusion reached was that as the Old Testament is sufficient for the worship, discipline and government of the Old Testament church, so the New Testament is sufficient for the worship, discipline and government of the New Testament church. If, then, we are to discover the faith required for membership in the New Testament church, or the organization and government of that church, is the New Testament. Accepting this plain truth, the fathers began the work of exploration, discovery, overthrow and construction. They were led to accept simple faith in Christ as the only and sufficient confession of faith. This meant for them the overthrow of all human confessions as a basis of fellowship. They were led to accept immersion as the only and sufficient baptism for all who professed this faith and were honest in their desire and purpose to turn away from sin. This meant for them the overthrow of infant or adult sprinkling or the substitution of any other form or ceremony for Christian baptism. They were led to accept Jesus Christ as the only Head of His church and therefore to resent clerical or priestly arrogation of authority or any legislative functions exercised by "superior or inferior church judicatories."

Our Source of Information

They were led to accept the simple organization of the New Testament church, as far as that organization was plainly outlined, in opposition to all accretions and ornamentations of human device. They were led to accept the words of the New Testament, as opposed to any and all interpretations of these words, in all matters of doubtful disputation, giving to each man the right of private interpretation, but insisting that such interpretation should not be made a test of fellowship or that such interpretation should not be preached to the subversion and troubling of the churches. Little by little, step by step, with open minds and hearts, they threaded their way back through centuries of theology, clerical tyranny and corrupt organizations and practices into the very presence of Christ and His apostles, and asked for guidance from Him who alone could speak as one having authority in all that pertained to the life and continuance of His church.

Christian union, based on the essentials of New Testament Christianity, was the vision splendid which smote their hearts with irresistible charm and power.

This was the Ideal—

the one ideal of the fathers. Was it a practical ideal? Before undertaking an answer to this question, it may be proper to encourage our souls with the reflection that very much of the contention of the fathers has been accepted—whether directly or independently of the influence exerted by the Disciples of Christ matters not.

The abuses against which Mr. Campbell contended have largely passed away. Clerical authority in the realm of conscience is virtually dead among Protestants. Creed acceptance is no longer made binding on the membership of the churches, and the creeds are accepted lightly and with mental reservation even by the preachers and professors and officials. The right of individual interpretation of Scripture has conquered. The ability of the people to understand for themselves what is essential to life and salvation is more and more recognized. The identification of theology with Christianity is denied, and theology has come to take its place as a purely human science—to be accepted as a help to the understanding of the truth, and as having no binding authority because approved by synod or council. Our liberty in Christ is secure. A protest now and then does not intimidate. We simply claim and exercise the right as part of our Christian inheritance. False and arbitrary tests of fellowship have ceased to be barriers in co-operative Christian work. Marvelous has been the progress in the way of a simplification of Christianity, or rather in divesting it of its man-made accessories and restoring it to its pristine beauty. But what of the future? Is Christian union practicable on the simple basis of the primitive faith and ordinances and life? This is the question we are to consider. And first we are to think for a few moments of the "faith once for all delivered to the saints."

What Does the New Testament Require?

In its last analysis, or rather in the simplest statement of the faith that is necessary to fellowship, does the New Testament require anything more, in the feeble and necessarily imperfect beginning of the Christian life, than a faith which is sufficiently strong to lead us to accept Jesus as Lord? If one is honest in confessing Jesus as Lord and gives proof of that sincerity in submitting to the ordinance of baptism—an ordinance which has no meaning apart from the authority of Christ—is he not entitled to fellowship, whatever may be his ignorance of the rich content of the Christian faith or his misapprehensions and wrong conception of that faith? Certainly we cannot require that he should have an accurate, full and comprehensive understanding of all that is involved in the sublime truth that Jesus is the Christ of God. That would exclude all save the most gifted minds, and even the most gifted cannot in this life grasp adequately with the intellect that which must so largely be an experience of the heart. As a matter of fact, we accept this confession of faith from a child or an ignorant person, knowing all the while that the child, by virtue of its limitations, can mean only the simplest thing—"I love you and want to do what thou wouldst have me do." It is this simple, reverent faith of the child which marks the beginning of the Christian life.

Nor do we nor can we rightfully require that one should have arrived at this simple faith in any uniform or stereotyped way. One man believes in Jesus Christ as the Son of God apart altogether from any reasoned argument based on prophecy or miracle. He has seen the face of the Master. He has been brought in some way to feel the spell of his beauty. He has fallen in love with the great personage. Jesus satisfies his deepest needs. He does not know prophecy. He has never studied the relation of miracle to faith.

He is in Love with the all-beautiful One, and would follow him to the ends of the earth. Are there not souls that instinctively and intuitively come into possession of this faith? The intellectual in the man is subordinated and the affectional nature is dominant. Is not such faith genuine? And yet it is not based on any other evidence than the simple beauty of the character of Christ. The man says: I cannot explain the origin of the dawn as it brightens into the day. I only know the sun has arrived and that, giving myself to its beams, I am warmed and cheered and satisfied. As such an one grows in the knowledge of divine things, he may come to see the relation of prophecy and miracle to this radiant and divine being. In the beginning, he is won by the smile on his face, by his compassion and tenderness, by his wonderful love and beauty. If a man had only the four gospels, and as a result of reading them should be so completely dominated by the great personage of whom they speak as to give himself utterly to following him, would we be authorized in denying him Christian fellowship because he was ignorant of the story of creation or knew nothing of Jonah or the Ninevites? Or per contra, suppose that he is a Bible scholar and holds honest conclusions as to the literary structure of the Bible different from those commonly denominated orthodox—placing a different construction on the aim and purpose of certain portions of Scripture from that commonly accepted—should his faith in Christ be impugned? "Who art thou that judgest thy brother? To his own Master he standeth or falleth." If it shall seem to us that his critical conclusions contravene faith in Christ, we are to remember that such conclusions (if the man himself is to be believed) do not invalidate his own faith. It is his personal faith, and not what we may think is necessary to it, that entitles him to Christian fellowship. It is the faith and not its method of attainment that is the essential thing. Only that which is essentially connected with that faith, without which that faith in a given individual would be impossible, can be made part of the faith that is necessary to Christian fellowship. If there be one thing or many things, accepted by others, not essential to this individual's faith in Christ, then in his case it is not essential to his acceptance as a follower of Christ and our brother. Remember that we ask not one word concerning his faith in anything in the Bible or out of it—only are we concerned about his faith in Christ, assured that if he is right in his relation to Christ, he will get right in regard to other matters and things.

Current Reformation Practicable?

In other words essential Christian faith need not, in order to its validity, lay hold of all that is involved logically in the sublime truth that Jesus is the Christ of God. If we could accept at once all that is meant, then what chance for growth in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ?

In a sense, of course, we accept in our confession of faith in Christ all that is logically involved, just as in our acceptance of the law of gravity we receive all that it means though we may be ignorant of a thousand applications of it. It would not be claimed that an intelligent apprehension of the thousand unknown applications is essential to our faith in gravity. My contention is that essential faith is of the simplest character, and that only the essential faith can be made a basis of Christian fellowship.

What is logically involved in our faith in Christ brings before us all the realm of revelation—the unique relation he sustains to God, his supernatural birth, his words and works, his death, burial, resurrection and ascension, his sinlessness, his supreme authority as Lord, his relation to the Old Testament, with all the high and rich meaning of these great truths. Here is a whole library of Christian truth—a territory so vast that no theologian has ever found its limits. The essential faith, in the very nature of things, cannot intelligently accept all that is involved in the tremendous proposition that Jesus is the Christ of God. It need only lay hold of the hem of his garment—the acceptance of him as Lord—able to save—the one who died for us and who proclaims God's love—the one who has opened the way to glory for us—the one whom we can absolutely trust to tell us what to do—and whom we can follow in life and through death.

It is one thing, however, to be ignorant of much that is involved in Christian faith and while ignorant of much to hold fast to that which is essential to spiritual life and salvation, and quite a different thing to have a knowledge that certain things are logically and integrally involved in that faith and to deny them as essential to the integrity of such faith. The latter makes impossible the acceptance of the Christ of the New Testament, and such an one necessarily shuts himself out from Christian fellowship.

There Are Only Two Courses Open—

one for the simple and untrained mind who says, "I believe in Christ," meaning thereby a loving loyalty to his will—waiting for the opening and unfolding of the great truth which has been accepted; the other course is to have a fuller knowledge—the result of study and investigation of what is involved—and to deny the thing involved as true. As respects the former, we do not hesitate to grant fellowship; as respects the latter, fellowship will not be asked.

We have no right, however, to insist that the intelligent who admit all that is involved in Christian faith shall be made to accept our interpretation of the subject matter. The right of private interpretation is a fundamental principle of Protestantism. We dare not make our exegesis the test of fellowship. Christian union on the basis of this simple faith in Christ seems practical. If, however, we insist upon our interpretations of this faith as essential to fellowship; if we brand with heresy those who, while accepting the great facts involved in this faith, place a different construction on these facts; if we demand that all shall arrive at this faith in the same way, or that this simple confession shall be as intelligently apprehended in the beginning as after long years of fellowship with the Master, or if we shall demand the acceptance of the theological speculations engendered by this faith as part of essential Christianity, then Christian union shall remain only a beautiful dream. We are concerned with nothing more than the loyal, honest confession of faith in Christ as the Son of God. We ask no further question. We leave the individual with God and his conscience. And now as respects the ordinance of baptism—is Christian union practicable? Is it at all probable that the whole Protestant Christian world shall ever accept immersion only as Christian baptism? It seems to me that right

Here Optimism Finds Its Greatest Check.

If Christian baptism were a church ordinance—established by the church with a view to accomplishing a special purpose—then it would be within the province of the church to change it or to dispense with it, but if it be an appointment of Jesus Christ, to meddle with it in any way is to impugn the authority of our Lord. Here, then, is the real issue. Is baptism a church ordinance—arising in the development of the life of the church to meet a special and temporary need, or is it based on the authority of the head of the church? If the latter, we dare not sacrifice it even for the sake of Christian union. A union based on any compromise of the authority of Jesus Christ is not Christian. It would be a caricature and a fraud. There is left for us no other course than to exalt the authority of Christ and to insist on baptism as having its meaning and standing in relation to that authority. But in our insistence on immersion as baptism, it seems unnecessary to insist upon the philosophy of baptism as essential to Christian fellowship. In what sense is baptism for the remission of sins? In answering this question differences of opinion and interpretation are permissible and will always exist. It is the command which is important. We are divided among ourselves as to formal and actual remission. Our scribes have not settled this question for us. With what sort of propriety can we make a fractional interpretation—an interpretation, that is, not unanimously accepted by ourselves, a test of fellowship for others? Let us preach baptism as an appointment of Jesus Christ; let us insist upon the obedience enjoined as a test of loyalty to divine authority, and let us leave the speculative parts of the question to the individual. If he reaches a wrong conclusion, the honesty and validity of his obedience is not involved.

Some Things to be Guarded.

In pressing on to the realization of our ideal there are some things we need to guard against as hindering our success and some things we ought to welcome as helping the quest and attainment.

We must guard against lessening the power of our special contention by emphasizing and exaggerating unimportant matters. Is it, for instance, a matter of vital importance—an article of a standing or falling church—whether our ministers should be known as "Rev." or "Dr."? Certainly there is no disposition on the part of the people to unduly exalt the minister of religion. There is no recognition of any superior or magical virtue in the bestowment of the title. Nobody believes that affixing the title of "Rev." to a preacher's name means anything more than an indication of the special work in which he is engaged. Why waste time in discussing such questions? We have surely passed the period of quibbling. If a preacher prefers to have John Smith, M. D. V., rather than Rev., let us gratify his taste. But why reflect upon the Rev. Smith and have it appear that he is a bloated specimen of religious pride and is seeking through a title to gain power over the brotherhood? We are summoned to a more serious task. Why whittle sticks when we are called upon to build a temple? We shall never have Christian union on the basis of the unimportant and trivial.

Sublimated Pharisaism.

Furthermore, we must quit patronizing our religious neighbors. We have not learned all of truth. There are some things in which we need instruction. When we speak of the "sects" in a somewhat contemptuous tone—meaning, "We thank thee, oh, God, we are not as these publicans,"—what is it but sublimated pharisaism? Do we suppose for a moment that such manifest injustice will tend toward a closer fellowship? Calling hard names has never yet promoted fellowship. If we are really in earnest in promoting Christian union, let us at least be courteous. I would not tone down the truth. I would preach it in love. Let us reason together, but brickbats are suggestive of vulgarity. Hear these words from Alexander Campbell: "This plan of making our own nest and fluttering over our own brood; of building our own tent and of confining all goodness and grace to our noble selves and the elect few who are like us, is the quintessence of sublimated pharisaism. The old Pharisees were but babes in comparison with the modern, and the longer I live, the more I reflect upon God and man, heaven and earth, the Bible and the world, the Redeemer and his church, the more I am assured that all sectarianism is the offspring of hell, and that all differences about words and names and opinions, hatched in Egypt, Rome or Edinburgh, are like the frolics of drunken men, and that where there is a new creature or a society of them, with all their imperfections and frailties and error in sentiment, in views and opinions, they ought to receive one another, and the strong to support the infirmities of the weak, and not to please themselves. To lock ourselves up in the bandbox of our own little circle; to associate with a few units, tens or hundreds as the pure church, as the elect, is real Protestant monkery—it is evangelical pharisaism." And while we are speaking our mind, let us understand that Christian fellowship will not be promoted by suspicion or jealousies or mean rivalries in the conduct of our religious journals. An insipid journalism is to be avoided, for dullness is inexcusable, but a seeking to wear the purple of authority on the ground of self-claimed orthodoxy which largely consists in denunciation and miserable innuendoes—needs to be rebuked. I am speaking of an evil of which many instances might be cited. There are some editors and even a few preachers who are "hounds of the Lord" and who never think of "green pastures and still waters" without a feeling of disgust with the serenity of the situation. Give them a heretic and heaven has no sweeter joy. It would seem that heretics are specially provided for their delectation.

A religious journal has unquestionably the right to criticize the public utterances of any man. It can condemn whatever may seem to itself hurtful in doctrine. But when it uses its power and influence to turn a whole brotherhood (or such part of the brotherhood as it can influence) against a man's view in such way as to unduly prejudice them against him, and advises them to regard him as an alien and an enemy of the truth who ought to be cast out from their fellowship, it is guilty of an outrageous abuse of its power. Heresy consists not in disloyalty to any man's doctrine but in disloyalty to Christ, and as long as the individual avows his loyalty to Christ, no religious journal can have the right to denounce him as a heretic. And further, when a man disavows his loyalty to Christ, the authority to discipline him lies not in a religious journal, but in the congregation with which he is affiliated. And if we would realize #### the Desire of the Father

for a united brotherhood we must recognize that there is no Cincinnati, Lexington, Louisville or St. Louis standard of doctrine to which the preachers of the church must either conform or be driven out of our fellowship; that our ministry should be left to regard themselves as free men in Christ Jesus, owing supreme allegiance to the great Teacher and bound in loyalty to Him to advocate always and everywhere what they believe to be the truth rather than the doctrine of any party. It is within the right of the humblest preacher to say to all religious journals in this matter, "Let no man trouble me, for I bear in my spirit the marks of the Lord Jesus." Conscious loyalty to Christ is our claim of independence.

We must welcome all truth and not be afraid of it. Openness of mind means progress. Let us not impoverish our souls by refusing to hear only from

MEMORY MAKER

Food With Certain Elements Required in the Brain.

Poor memory means an ill-nourished brain. The proper food to help and nourish the brain will thus help the memory as in the following case:

"I have not known what it is to enjoy real good health, not having seen a well day in over 20 years and taking medicine most of that time until about a year ago.

"At that time I was suffering greatly from nervous prostration and general debility, the result of several severe illnesses from which I never expected to fully recover.

"My memory was also so poor that it caused me much chagrin at times.

"I had often heard how Grape-Nuts had helped other people's memory and that it was a brain food. Finally I was put on Grape-Nuts for my meals.

"It was so pleasing to the taste I enjoyed eating it and after a time I saw such an improvement in my health generally that I gave up medicine altogether. Am not even using laxatives now that I had been unable to do without for years. Grape-Nuts helped my nerves, gave me strength, increased my weight ten pounds and I can now work and walk better and enjoy life as I never expected to again.

"When my friends remark how well I look and act I tell them it is all due to Grape-Nuts. My doctor never sees me but he smiles with genuine pleasure at my improved condition, for he is an old friend and would like to see me perfectly well, knowing how long and how much I have suffered." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Look in each pkg. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Paul. Apollos has something to give us, and Cephas likewise has a message. Provincialism is certainly a barrier to Christian union. Some one has remarked that the "new biblical scholarship is to be the chief agency in bringing about the union of Christendom. Disunity, separation and division rest largely on scholastic definitions of Scripture. It is by these largely arbitrary differences that the polemic spirit has been bred, and men have been separated by formal didactic statements rather than by real differences." If the newer study gives us a deeper and truer insight into the truth of God, let us give it hospitable welcome. Of all religious bodies, we are least trammelled in our pursuit of truth. Loyalty to Christ and the limitations imposed by his authority—this is our priceless heritage. We are a great people. Hasty and inconsiderate condemnation of higher criticism is evidence of immaturity. We are too well seasoned to get scared. It is possible that higher criticism has something to give us. At least if it is empty-handed, we shall soon discover the fact. In the meantime, we need not fear that it is loaded. Our attitude should be that of those who care only for the truth and who want only the truth.

How About Church Federation?

If it can help on Christian union, without the sacrifice of conscious loyalty to Christ, I should think it would be very gladly welcomed. As far as I can see, it is giving organic expression to a principle which our people have recognized all the while—that of co-operating with other religious bodies as far as we can do so without the sacrifice of convictions we deem to be vital. Certainly we want to do this. It is right in line with our contention. We do not minimize our special testimony; we augment our practical efficiency. While we must guard against provincialism and pharisaism and the undue emphasis of the unimportant, we must maintain our dignified position as a religious body that knows its ground and has no apologies to make for its contention. It seems to me that there are two clearly marked tendencies among us—the one which regards with suspicion the consideration of new questions and the necessary adaptation to new conditions, and the other which regards the new culture as a substitute for the old faith and a sort of contemptuous disregard of our special and peculiar testimony. Of the two tendencies, the latter is the worse. Better that we hold fast whereto we have attained, even if we miss much that might prove our enrichment, than that we should minimize or lose the definite essentials of the Christian faith. Why can we not hold fast to first principles and go on to perfection? Let us not forget the two words which are our heritage—liberty and loyalty—liberty within the limitations of loyalty. To no religious body has there ever come a greater opportunity to hasten the bright and shining day of Christian union. Let us not prove recreant to our high trust. It may be that the ideal of the fathers will not be realized in our day, but the clearly marked tendency points that way.

Lectureship Notes.

The presiding officer, Bro. Crayton S. Brooks, won praises from all by his modest, dignified and impartial manner as president of the Lectureship. It is often the case that the presiding officer of a convention takes up entirely too much time in talking and explaining matters which really need no explanation, and he also takes part in the discussions; and though this is done in an informal way, and usually between different parts of the program, it sometimes happens that these talks, when added together, take up a large portion of the time. Brother Brooks attended strictly to the business before him without injecting any of his own wisdom into the discussion.

William Woods College was out in force at most of the important meetings. The college seems to be prospering. Brother Jones was ill towards the last, and consequently did not attend the concluding services. We trust that by this time he has entirely recovered.

The special guest of the Lectureship this year was Bro. E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky. The two admirable addresses given by Brother Powell were heartily received by large audiences. Brother Powell's elocution is a constant reminder of the old times, when such men as Clay, Prentiss, Marshall, Breckinridge, Menafee, etc., were the star orators of the south. These all belonged to a school which has almost entirely disappeared. Indeed, Brother Powell is the only worthy living representative of this school that we now remember. The conversational style of oratory has almost entirely superseded the declamatory, but Brother Powell holds on to the latter, and though his style is somewhat of an anachronism as regards the present day platform and pulpit, he certainly has remarkable power in holding the attention of an audience, while at the same time he is capable of moving them to a high degree of enthusiasm. His personality is also very delightful, and this adds a charm to the strong and well modulated voice in the delivery of his impassioned addresses.

The last address was by F. G. Tyrrell, St. Louis, on "The Ethics of Wealth." Brother Tyrrell perhaps never excelled this effort. It was admirable in spirit, in argument and in its high moral trend. It fairly created an atmosphere of civic righteousness, and was really a great speech.

Brother Levi Marshall gave a unique lecture on "The New Psychology." It was interesting from beginning to end.

The only criticism we would offer is that Brother Marshall somewhat sacrificed literary form and style to what we suppose he felt to be the popular demand. He came very near playing to the gallery, though this was evidently not his own thought. Undoubtedly his aim was to bring a somewhat difficult subject within the comprehension of his hearers.

The book reviewed was that of Clarke's "Outlines of Theology," and the reviewers, F. M. Calvin and L. B. Cupp, did their work excellently. Brother Denton, of Warrensburg, entered his protest against the teaching of the book, and intimated his belief that this was most pernicious. Brother Denton's contention seemed to imply that such books ought not to be brought into notice, notwithstanding Dr. Clarke is well known to be one of the most orthodox of modern writers on theology. It is not necessary to accept all his conclusions in order to find much in the book that is both stimulating and informative. In many respects it is the ablest compendium of theology that has been published in modern times. According to Brother Denton's view, it seems to us, progress is simply impossible, for the reason that we must not read anything that conflicts with our present knowledge and present convictions. It seems to us that preachers, at least, ought to be trusted to do what the apostle Paul urges all to do, viz., "Prove all things and hold fast that which is good."

DIDN'T LIKE IT Soon Found Why.

Coffee has a terrible hold on some people.

"About 8 years ago I was a great sufferer from stomach trouble; my liver was all out of fix and a wise doctor forbid tea and coffee. At that time I was so weak I could hardly walk, absolutely poisoned.

"One day I noticed Postum in the store, and having read about it I bought a package and made some. I did not like it but tried it again and followed directions carefully. It was not long before I liked it better than any other drink and it has brought me out of all the old coffee troubles, too.

"I can now eat what I want, am strong and healthy and the effects of Postum on me were so good all our family soon drank it.

"In summer when the weather is hot I do not have that 'all gone' feeling now, for when I drink a cup of Postum it refreshes and strengthens but never has the bad after-effect like coffee.

"Postum is like everything else—it needs to be made right and there is no better way than the directions on the package." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

PRAYER AND PROMISE.—
Luke 11:1-13.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Ask and it shall be given unto you; seek and ye shall find.—Luke 11:9.

A Lesson in Prayer.

It was when Jesus himself was praying that his disciples came with the request that he should teach them to pray. His example was contagious. Such was the winsomeness of his character and personality that his associates naturally desired to learn his secret. Evidently the unique thing about him was his relation to God, and one's relation to God finds expression in prayer. The disciples wished to know, therefore, how it was that he succeeded in approaching so close to the Father in prayer. The answer to such an inquiry could not be the deliverance of any mere form of words to be repeated as a ritual, but must be some suggestion as to the spiritual attitude which is to characterize the one who prays. The "Lord's prayer," which he gave at this time, is therefore not simply a prayer; it is a lesson in the spirit, the purpose and the subject-matter of all prayer. Simply to repeat the words used by Jesus in the Lord's prayer is not to put into practice his teaching on the subject of prayer. The spirit which it expresses must be the spirit of every petition which we utter and of the constant attitude of the soul toward God.

Our Father.

If the whole message of Jesus to men and His purpose for men must be put into two words, perhaps these two would most adequately embody it—the definition of God as "Our Father." To begin with, it means that God is not merely a philosophical concept, not a convenient hypothesis for explaining the universe, not the unknown First Cause of all things, but a person with whom we may have personal relations.

Besides this, the use of the word Father instead of King means that our relation to Him and His to us are primarily those of mutual affection. However important the considerations of authority and obedience may be, these are secondary to the great and central fact that God is a loving and a lovable God. This does not weaken authority, but gives it a higher value, a richer meaning for the spiritual life. An authority which is wholly external and which enforces itself solely by compulsion or penalty, can have no significance for the spiritual life of man, however successful it may be in getting itself obeyed. Only an authority based on love can be truly religious and spiritually effective.

In the third place, "Our Father" means that He is the common Father of men. It is broadly inclusive and points to the true basis of human fellowship. It is not enough to say "my Father"—though in certain moments of personal self-consecration one may properly dwell upon that thought. God is our Father and we cannot be true to our Father without also being true to our brothers.

Thy Will Be Done.

Here is the heart of all prayer. With this petition in our hearts and on our lips, we cannot go wrong in our asking. Without it, we cannot go right. The ultimate purpose of all human events should be to get the will of God done on earth. Faith in God is mere empty profession unless it involves such trust in Him that we are willing that His will shall be done rather than ours. This is God's world and sooner or later His will will be done in it. If one really believes that, and believes also that the doing of God's will is the highest good that can happen, one can afford to put away all the petty worries and anxieties that fret us and be glad in the confidence that the will of God ought to and will prevail.

On Earth as in Heaven.

The transformation of earth into the likeness of heaven is a process which will go forward just as fast as God's will is done here. It is not the divine purpose that a few souls shall be snatched from a world that is doomed to destruction. Salvation is a broader enterprise than that God's will is to be done on earth and throughout the earth—not simply in a heaven which is a place of refuge for those few who have escaped the general cataclysm. To pray this prayer, therefore, commits us to the effort to bring this present world into the fullest harmony with the will and purposes of God.

Forgive Us Our Sins.

Forgiveness of sins is the most precious blessing God can grant to man; forgiveness of injuries done to himself is the most divine activity that can be exercised by man. The two go together. The unforgiving man is an unforgiven man. The unforgiven man is a lost man. "Deliver us from evil" can have no meaning unless one is willing to put away from his heart the great evil of a revengeful and unforgiving disposition.

Ask—Seek—Knock.

The principle which applies to prayer and its answer is a principle which holds good generally in life. The one who asks is the one who receives. The seeker is the finder. Doors open only to those who knock. Success comes to no man; it is overtaken by those who pursue it. The law of spiritual blessing is the same. One cannot neglect the higher things and yet receive the blessing that is in store. One cannot devote all his asking and seeking to material things, and have spiritual values come to him without care or effort. The Christian who devotes nine-tenths of his time to laying up treasure on earth, need not be surprised if nine-tenths of the product of his efforts pass away with the passing of earthly things. It is because the things of the kingdom of God are first in importance and can be obtained only by effort that Jesus said, "Seek first the kingdom of God."

HOME MISSIONS.—

Luke 8:39.

"Return to thy house and declare how great things God hath done for thee. And he went his way, publishing throughout the whole city how great things Jesus had done for him."

The text of the lesson grew out of the incident of the healing of the demoniac by Jesus in "the country of the Gerasenes, which is over against Galilee." This man, it will be remembered, dwelt in the tombs, wore no clothes, would break the chains and fetters asunder, which were put upon him, and was no doubt a terror to the community until Jesus met with him and healed him. In connection with his healing there was the drowning of the herd of swine into which, it is said, the demons, exorcised from the man, had entered. This aroused the natives who "went out to see what had come to pass; and they came to Jesus, and found the man, from whom the devils were gone out, sitting clothed and in his right mind at the feet of Jesus; and they were afraid." They therefore "asked Jesus to depart from them, and He did so." They have not been the only people in the world who are unwilling to entertain Jesus if it is to cost them the loss of property. It were better, according to their low philosophy, to have men afflicted with demons than to have their swine stamped into the sea.

A prayer denied. Naturally enough the healed man desired to go with Jesus, and "prayed Him that he might be with Him," but Jesus "sent him away" with the language quoted above, to be a missionary to his own household and friends, telling them what great things Jesus had done for him. No doubt it would have been very gratifying to this man to have spent some time in the company of Jesus, and no less perhaps to Jesus to have had this grateful and devoted man with Him, but there were others that needed the same blessing, and especially who needed to know about Jesus and His power to heal and save. And so the man must forego his personal pleasure, and return to his home as a missionary.

A home missionary. There are reasons why this man was sent to his own home as a missionary. He would naturally have a deeper interest in his own family and friends and neighbors than in any other. On the other hand, they would more likely receive the message from him, having known of his affliction, when they should see him fully restored to sanity of mind and body. These are two good reasons for home missions. We ought to have a special interest in our own country and in the people who speak our language and who share with us the benefits and obligations of our common government. On the other hand, they are in better condition, when they receive the gospel, to send it to all the nations.

Beginning at Jerusalem. It has always seemed to us a stroke of divine wisdom that the gospel should have begun to be preached at Jerusalem, the very place where Christ was crucified, and among the very people who would be most familiar with the facts connected with His life and teaching. Even when the gospel had been carried out beyond Judea and Samaria into the uttermost parts of the earth, the apostles were wont to preach "first to the Jews." There was with them a knowledge of the Scriptures and of the true God, which would serve as a basis for their message. It was only the part of wisdom, therefore, for them to make the offer of salvation "first to the Jews and then to the Gentiles."

The May offering. We are approaching the time of our annual offering for home missions. Let there be earnest prayers during this meeting for the success of these efforts and for the missionaries who are now engaged in evangelizing in our own country.

Prayer: Gracious Lord of the harvest, wilt Thou be pleased to send forth more laborers into the great harvest field, which our own country offers, and to this end wilt Thou stir up the churches to larger liberality, in order that the laborers may be multiplied, and the harvest gathered in to the praise of Thy glory and for Thy name's sake. Amen.

ANSWERED PRAYERS.—
Acts 4:23-31.

While our topic deals with "answered prayers" in the current acceptance of the term, we might as well consider ourselves at liberty to inquire whether the prayers we say are unanswered, because the petition is not granted, are not in the true sense answered? The Father has received the petition, and, while He has not given us the thing we asked, He has done the best. We should thank Him that His wisdom has saved us from the consequences of our own shortsightedness. Then prayer is more than asking for things. Let us see what more in our study to-night.

For the Members.

1. The lesson is based upon Acts 4:23-31 and context, which is an account of the healing of the lame man at the Beautiful Gate and the persecution of the disciples which it stirred up. The brethren were praying for the arrested apostles. As soon as the apostles were set at liberty they met with the brethren. And, what is most strange, in the light of our day, instead of praying that such persecution might not come to them again, they prayed for greater boldness and for courage to bear all that might come upon them. We do not often hear a prayer like the first petition—the prayer for boldness, which was the cause of all their trouble.

2. If we consider prayer and its answer in the usual sense, which largely identifies the answer and the petition, that is, the prayer is answered when the petition is granted, it is an important matter to pray for the right things. God will not give us things not for our good. Therefore, it is important to think over what we are going to ask for. Prepare to pray. If we are not going to take this pains, let us, then, pray, as did our Master, "Thy will be done." This is the more excellent way at all times.

3. It has been said, "Prayer which is not made in the spirit of the phrase, 'Thy will be done,' is not prayer, but dictation." How true is this. Do we not find ourselves often in this condition? Dictating to God! It is most foreign to the true idea of prayer. The feeling of human extremity is the source of true prayer. We come to the end of our way. We cannot go further. We cannot see further. Help must come from a higher source. We throw ourselves, then, upon the Lord. This is not the position from which the prayer of dictation should come.

4. Prayer will not submit to rules. One cannot well set forth a science of prayer. It rather classes with art than science. Prayer is poetic, heroic, devotional. It springs from the sense of human frailty in the presence of the divine Father. It defies analysis; is degraded by philosophy; but, when it springs spontaneously from the human heart, it is rich in pathos, fire, imagery, consolation.

5. Prayer occupies a sacred place in the provisions of God for us. Its precincts are sacred. Dare anyone commit sacrilege within its limits? Pray to God. Pour out your heart before Him. Let no one trouble you. Be afraid of no one. Do not pray for the ears of the audience, but for God. The people will hear the public prayer and they will be lifted up to the throne by it, if it be made to God alone, and as if He alone heard. But if it be made for the people to hear, it is a rhetorical display, a pharisaical performance, and it will go no higher than the heads of the hearers.

Quiet Hour Thought.

Oh, God, help Thou me through Thy Spirit to reach the heights of communion with Thee in prayer.

Our Budget

—Keep in mind the May offering for home missions which occupies the first place on the calendar until it is fully completed.

—We give considerable space this week to the report of the Missouri lectureship, as we take it our readers are interested in what is said and done at such gatherings.

—The pastor of the Fulton church, Bro. M. A. Hart, by his modest bearing, his unvarying courtesy, and his close attention to the comfort of his guests, won the hearts of all the members of the lectureship.

—The choir of the Fulton church rendered us some splendid music and contributed in no small measure to the success and enjoyment of the evening sessions.

—The friends of Bro. Howard T. Cree will be glad to learn that he has been very heartily received by the church at Augusta, Ga., and that he feels that there is a great and effectual door of usefulness open before him in that beautiful city of the south. He has been greeted by large audiences, and says he and his family are receiving every courtesy and kindly consideration from its hospitable people.

—The call, the recommendation of which we announced in our last issue, to J. M. Philputt was agreed upon at a meeting of the Union avenue Christian church, St. Louis, in the Mt. Cabanne building on Lord's day evening. At the same meeting the official boards that have been acting for the separate congregations were elected to serve as the board for the united church—the Union avenue Christian church. It is fitting that one of the streets upon which the building now in course of erection will face is called Union avenue. It is not yet known whether Brother Philputt will accept.

—We call attention to the letter from Brother Ames, which we embody in an editorial, and also to the preamble and resolutions of the Hyde Park church, which we print in another place in the paper. Both these documents throw important and necessary light upon the question we discussed in our last week's issue. They confirm the wisdom of the course we advised in our last issue, and which it is always safe to follow. There are men of national reputation for their Christian faith and character in Hyde Park church, and it is safe to presume that they are not going to betray the cause, nor suffer it to be betrayed, without a protest.

—G. W. Henry, Tipton, Ind., is pursuing studies at Butler college.

—H. A. Denton, of Warrensburg, Mo., has received a call to the church at Maryville, Mo.

—The church at Refuge, Ind., under Clay Trusty's administration, is remodeling its building.

—San Francisco, with a population of 450,000, has only two Christian churches and two struggling missions.

—The First church at Philadelphia reports a successful year's work. They are about to employ a pastoral helper.

—Geo. O. Black, who recently resigned the pastorate of the church of Christ, Hamilton, O., will engage in farming at Mount Forest, Canada.

—News from the home office of the American Christian missionary society reports three annuities received this week of $100, $1,000 and $2,000.

—J. W. Lowber's recently delivered lecture in the interest of the students of the university of Texas on "The Philosophy of Herbert Spencer and Christianity" was published in the Austin Statesman.

—We have before us an opportunity of vast magnitude—to lay the foundations of five hundred new churches a year. The fields are waiting, if we can only enter. The May offering will be our answer.

—O. P. Spiegel is engaged in a good meeting, with Claude L. Jones, minister, at Shreveport, La. His permanent address is Birmingham, Ala., where those desiring to make engagements for meetings should address him.

—The seventh district convention of Kansas meets April 26-28 at Lyons, Kan. A good program has been prepared and a valuable convention is anticipated.

GEO. E. LYON, president.

—J. H. Jones and family, Bolivar, Mo., have just been "severely but mercifully pounded." Brother Jones writes that they have sufficiently recovered to be able to enjoy a feast of the good things left.

—Sister M. M. Banks, of Lockhart, Texas, has given $10,000 for the support of Bible work in the State university. Are there not many stewards of the Lord who will do likewise for our educational institutions?

—W. H. Waggoner has been holding institutes at Ft. Wayne, Beech Grove and Cornua. He has had more interest manifested than ever before, and will be busy at this kind of work for some time to come.

—The field of home missions is vastly larger and more important than when the American Christian Missionary Society was organized in 1849. Then the population of the land was 30,000,000, now it is 80,000,000.

—Last week the foreign society received four gifts on the annuity plan, one of $1,000 from a brother in Canada, one of $750 from a friend in Iowa, one of $500 from a sister in Maryland, and $100 from a friend in Michigan.

—Bro. J. H. Hardin, who recently received into the fellowship of the Boston church the pastor of a Congregational church in a suburb of that city, reports a second Congregational preacher inquiring more perfectly into the way of the Lord.

—The Woodlawn church of Christ at Lake City, Iowa, has just put out a little weekly, edited by its new pastor, C. L. Organ. The value of these local news sheets depends on what goes into them. We hope that the Woodlawn Christian will have a long, useful life.

—On April 5, the Board of Church Extension received $1,200 on the annuity plan. One of the gifts, $500, was from Ohio, the other two, $500 and $200, were from Kansas. Address G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 600 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., concerning annuity funds.

—What a scandal before the world that this great year of the World's Fair in St. Louis has to be so deeply darkened by the villainies of the "ring." What a shame to have a senator sent to the dungeon for so base a crime. Our land is becoming terribly corrupted by these villainies.

CHAS. LOUIS LOOS.

—We regret to learn that our esteemed and venerable brother, Alfred Flower, of Tampa, Fla., recently had a fall, bruising his left hip so that he has not been able to leave his bed since. Bro. J. P. Rowilson, who announces the incident, says that through all his suffering he is cheerful. We sincerely hope for his early recovery.

—Through the faithful labors of J. P. Childs, the little church at Eagle Lake, Minn., has been resuscitated after the building had been closed for more than four years. During the year three special meetings were held and more than $1,200 was raised for the work. Another pastorless church was assisted, a pastor secured and Sunday-schools were organized at three other points.

—Within the period covered by the history of the American Home Missionary Society, many and great changes have taken place, which render the work of home missions most important. The wonderful drift to the cities, the danger in these congested populations, the certainty that as go the cities so goes America, makes the work of city evangelization most imperative.

—We are planning to erect a new church building here as soon as we can decide upon plans. This has been made possible by the liberal offer of two of our brethren. One will bear a third and another a sixth of the expense. Others will be equally liberal in proportion to their ability, and we hope to secure a house fully equal to any in our little city. One added last Sunday.

J. H. WRIGHT.

Woodbine, Iowa.

Children's Day

FOR

HEATHEN MISSIONS

First Sunday in June, 1904.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society furnishes supplies, free of charge, to Sunday-schools observing the day for Heathen Missions. Order at once. State number in school.

Address F. M. RAINS, Cor. Sec., Cincinnati, O.

—It is cheering when a man active in business finds time and energy to be active also in the Lord's work. Ira Elliott, of Rushville, Mo., though a large fruit grower and member of the town council and school board, is never too tired to go to prayer-meeting and other church gatherings. Like unto him is E. M. Peters, a banker and general business man.

—We call attention to the new leaflet of our home board, "We are Doing too Little." It is full of inspiration to larger plans and the splendid opportunities that are before our people. Every Disciple should read this leaflet, which will be sent free to anyone writing for it to the American Christian Missionary Society, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

—I am more than thankful for your article on the Hyde Park church and its minister, not that I agree with the position taken by its minister, as I do not fully understand it, but for the Christly position taken. Please give us some articles along this line until the persons who usurp the place of our Saviour, will with shame get off the judgment seat.

G. E. SPRING.

—Christian Endeavorers have received permission to use the Stadium at the World's Fair for the exercises of their special day, June 28. The Century chorus choir, recently organized in this city, is to sing and the Christian Endeavor choir from Kansas City will also be heard. Among the probable speakers are Dr. Ira Landrith, of Chicago, and Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, of New York.

—The Missouri Christian lectureship elected the following officers for the new term: Levi Marshall, of Hannibal, president; R. H. Ellett, of Chillicothe, vice-president; F. B. Cupp, of Platte City, secretary. Executive committee—Wm. N. Briney, Paris, Mo.; J. J. Morgan, Kansas City, and W. G. Surber, Moberly, Mo. The place and time for the next meeting has been left to the discretion of the committee.

—Dr. W. T. Moore will be gratified that two of his "boys" are having such evangelistic success. James Small, who has been stirring up Jacksonville, Fla., was one of Brother Moore's converts at Liverpool, England, while it was through the reading of "The Christian Commonwealth" that Bro. R. W. Abberley, who has just had great success in a meeting at Bloomington, Ind., was led to join our ranks.

—"Many friends of the saintly veteran, John Shackelford," writes Bro. Morton L. Rose, "will be interested to know that although he is not in good health, he is still that gentle and cheerful Christian gentleman, the light and warmth of whose life is enjoyed by all who meet him. What a blessing such a life is in this old world! What an incentive to noble and earnest living! What a satisfaction to the man himself!"

—We regret exceedingly to learn, through Prof. G. P. Coler, of the death of John Tribble, son of our lamented Prof. J. M. Tribble, so widely and favorably known. Sister Tribble lives at Ann Arbor, Mich., where she had been educating her son for his profession. He was her chief dependence for future support. Our sincerest sympathies are extended to the bereaved mother and sister who we are sure will be cherished in the hearts of the brotherhood which Prof. Tribble so ably served.

—We trust that the length of the address by E. L. Powell, delivered at Fulton last week, which we publish in full in this number, will prevent no one from reading it. It is exceedingly timely, and perhaps no better statement has been made of that conception of the ideal of our fathers which is practicable as a working basis. The supplementary address by the editor of this paper may be given later, showing that while the papers were written independently they cover substantially the same ground.

—Brother Frank Marshall writes us that there is a mission study class of 30 and a volunteer band of six students in the Texas Christian university. Seventeen persons will receive the A. B. degree and two the A. M. in June. The enrollment for the year is 425, considerably in excess of last year's figures, which were 302. This is, we believe, the largest gain of all the institutions of Texas. President Zollars' lecture tour is a great success. A missionary rally is to be held May 3 with Brother McLean in attendance.

—Sister Wilhelmina Meldrum has been recommended by the missionary committee as a suitable helper of Brother and Sister McPherson in Havana, Cuba, to be supported by the Jefferson Street Church of Buffalo, N. Y. As soon as the Foreign Missionary Board shall ratify the choice, the congregation will be asked to sanction the recommendation. Sister Meldrum is considered one of the best qualified public school teachers in Buffalo. Bro. McPherson seems delighted at the prospect of having her as a co-worker.

—The board of trustees of the New England Christian missionary society passed a very cordial vote of thanks and resolutions of confidence in Bro. J. H. Hardin on his relinquishing the New England field. "Not only," said one of the resolutions, "will he be remembered with growing Christian affection and appreciation for his patient and persevering efforts in our midst, amid much that made these efforts difficult, but the ripe experience of his life as exemplified in his labors and words and deeds remains a benediction to us as a people." We are sure Brother Hardin will appreciate such a testimonial.

—Joseph Lowe is spending a year's "vacation" in Missouri by taking care of two congregations, and by planting a new one at Helena, Andrew Co., Mo. He is making his temporary home with his old friends of 25 years ago at Rushville, Mo., where he lately held a meeting resulting in 52 confessions and, in all, 82 additions to the church. He preaches twice a month for this congregation, which is now seriously contemplating the building of a parsonage. The orphans' home realized $23 as the result of an Easter offering suggested by Sister Lowe.

—The Fulton Daily Sun, in its report of the lectureship, said: "Dr. W. T. Moore's able address upon 'Preachers' Problems' impressed the audience with the speaker's depth of scholarship and his thorough familiarity with the various problems of the ministry—those growing out of the preacher's personal relations to his work, those growing out of the modern view of the world and those growing out of ways and means. Dr. Moore's paper was quite original and presented many new suggestions which will, no doubt, be of great benefit to the ministers in attendance and furnish them much food for thought."

—Here is how a missionary in Mexico lives: "The church at Saltillo not being able to support its pastor, he has had great difficulty in finding other work, and what he is doing is not nearly sufficiently remunerative. One of his members gives him a home rent free, but he has no furniture to speak of; his family have no clothes fit to go out in, his clothes are shabby; a wife and four hungry children ask him for more than he can provide, yet he declines employment from the denominations. He is not in the employ of the C. W. B. M. at present, but gives all the time he can to missionary work." We find these facts in the little paper devoted to Mexican work.

—In his Church Leaflet, I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, Ky., makes a plea for the attendance of the membership at the Lord's day evening service, "to help him in preaching the gospel." Brother Spencer well says that "the preacher and the choir, with a small percentage of the church membership cannot impress strangers and worldly attendants with their own danger and the power of Christ half as much as they can with the help of a large, earnest, prayerful, sympathetic body of believers in the pews. The very atmosphere of a devout and large attendance is the best resource any preacher can have next to the message itself. And the message becomes five-fold more powerful when reinforced by and incarnate in a large audience of sympathetic believers."

—If Z. T. Sweeney is conservative in his theology, he is not conventional and hackneyed in his pulpit style. His touring as president of the American Christian Missionary Society is being productive of excellent results. Brother Sweeney, according to Bro. Anson G. Chester, of Buffalo, is "omitting altogether juiceless statistics, prolix numerical exhibits, elaborate and confusing diagrams, and the inevitable begging, showing instead what the gospel has already accomplished, what there is still left for it to do, and how they all may assist in bringing about its further triumphs." Brother Sweeney puts upon those who listen to him an individual responsibility which is certain to swell the aggregate of the May offering.

—So glad to read your timely article on "Why Trouble the Missionary Societies?" I started to write one under that very caption last week, but did not, owing to the press of other matters. Such articles as some which have appeared in some of our papers recently will militate greatly against the May offering. If the American Christian Missionary Society is to be held responsible for an occasional departure from the faith on the part of certain congregations, why not hold each minister or evangelist responsible for the going astray of a single one of his converts? The two articles from Filander Fusome are timely. Hope Filander will give us his views on other topics of the day. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has the spirit of Christ.

J. MURRAY TAYLOR.

—Great credit is due to J. R. Shie's Christian family for their devotion to the work at San Bernardino. This is the report that comes to us from many sources. Brother Shie has literally put his life into this difficult field. The result is that "they who were no people are now the people of God." From a despicable place in the allied forces of righteousness in this wicked city, the Disciples have been lifted in his three years' ministry to a position of prominence and influence. The last Sunday in February witnessed the dedication of the new house of worship. Those who have seen it, say it is a little gem. The papers say that Brother Smither, in dedicating it, canonized the pastor, giving him the name of "Saint Richard." We are sorry that considerations of health and family welfare have compelled Brother Shie to leave this work for his new sphere, already announced.

—John L. Brandt, pastor of the First Christian church, read a very able and interesting paper on "Conscience" at the Christian ministers' meeting in the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST Monday morning. Prof. C. M. Sharpe, of the Missouri Bible college, was present and participated in the discussion. Prof. Sharpe had with him the plans for the new Bible college building soon to be erected in Columbia. It is to be a beautiful stone structure, three stories, with capacity for a sufficient number of class rooms, offices, library, etc., on the first floor, with the two upper floors devoted to the purposes of a dormitory. The money is in hand for the building, which it is hoped will be completed some time next autumn. Brother Sharpe is now seeking to increase the endowment so as to make the income of the institution sufficient to defray its necessary expenses. We commend his mission to the favorable consideration of all who are interested in the work of Bible teaching and ministerial preparation.

—It will perhaps avoid an expenditure of energy, and possibly some heartache, if we announce that neither the editor nor anyone connected with the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is able to find positions in St. Louis during the World's Fair for friends or readers of the paper who, either by reason of the necessity of finding work or the inclination to dwell in the exhibition city during the period of the Fair, want to come here. The city is already full of would-be aspirants for positions. Over twenty thousand people have made application for merely clerical positions connected with the Fair, all of which have long since been filled. We have heard of many people throwing up good positions with the hope of "bettering themselves" at St. Louis. Such people are extremely foolish. We wish especially to warn young women. Many traps have been laid for them, and it will be the commonest wisdom for them to be on their guard when answering any advertisements offering inducements to come here. Cooks and house-workers may find positions if they are competent and not extravagant in their demands, but there is no demand for anything but the more menial and rougher work.

Resolutions of Hyde Park Church, Chicago.

The following preamble and resolutions were adopted by the board of officers of the Hyde Park church, Friday evening, April 15:

Whereas certain criticisms have recently been published concerning the alleged teaching and practice of the Hyde Park church of Christ; and

Whereas these criticisms have in some quarters called in question the responsibility of the American Christian Missionary Society, which helped to establish the church; and

Whereas the officers and supporters of such society have a right to know if the Hyde Park church has in any particular departed from the common faith and practice of the churches of Christ; therefore be it

Resolved by the board of officers of the Hyde Park church of Christ that we declare our full allegiance to the plea and position of our brotherhood, and that while we insist upon our right to manage our own local affairs in our own way, even to determining to what extent those who are not ready for membership with us may be permitted to take part in the work and worship of the church, we declare that it is not the practice of the Hyde Park church to receive anyone into its membership on any other terms than those commonly stated by our churches everywhere to be laid down in the New Testament, and we further declare that no one has ever been received into this church except by full obedience to the gospel or upon presentation of a letter or other satisfactory statement showing such obedience before coming to us.

Resolved further that we protest against any statement or movement to place or regard us outside the brotherhood, and we declare our intention to remain a part of the Church of Christ and to co-operate in the establishment of our faith and plea throughout the world.

We declare our absolute faith in the fatherhood of God, and in the divine nature and redemptive work of Jesus Christ. But we shall contend earnestly for the freedom of study and interpretation which Christ gives to each of his disciples.

Resolved by the officers of the Hyde Park church of Christ that the pastor of this church be, and is hereby, requested and authorized to keep a separate list of the names of such people, with whom he comes in contact as pastor, who, while not ready to become members of this church, are friendly to our plea and practice, and would like to co-operate so far as possible with us. We suggest that from time to time he communicate such names to the board, and deem it advisable even to have them reported publicly to the members of the congregation, provided, however, that no such persons are to be received in any public way as members of the church or to be listed as such.

The board meeting was united and harmonious and in good spirit. There was but one dissenting vote on the first resolution, and none on the second.

News From Many Fields

California Notes.

There is no better field for the earnest faithful Christian evangelist than California. The demand for workers has never been as great as at the present time.—Platt and Honn will soon begin at Chico for a long siege. Bro. Picton has everything in good order for the meeting. Bro. Gallahorn helped us in a few days' meeting at Clay, with ten conversions and two from the Baptists. He now goes to Marysville for a long pull and a strong pull. His wife, who is a fine singer, will assist.—Bro. Reager, assisted by Bro. Green as singer, is in a good meeting in his own church in Sacramento.—The San Joaquin Valley district convention will meet at Selma. We are sorry to lose Bro. Stafford from the Lodi church, but the West Side church, San Francisco, will be the gainer.—This calls for another preacher from somewhere in your country.—Burn the bridges behind you, for, California is a ripe, rich field, but when you come out don't think you know all about everything. Preach the word, but Paul says study the "seasonings" of the Gospel. Our brethren in the east may hear of the California Christian colony very soon in San Joaquin Co. The Baptists have located one in Sacramento Valley. We are pleased with the prospect of a Christian settlement in that fine county.—Sister Hazelrigg is helping Bro. Davis in a fine meeting at Santa Cruz.—Bros. Hazen of the First church, and Harrold of the Central are doing good work in San Jose.—The town of Saratoga has just enjoyed "flower day." Thousands visited that beautiful little city at the foot of the mountains ten miles from San Jose. People living east of the Rockies have no conception of a flower show in California till they see it. The church at Saratoga is doing fine work under the labors of Bro. Ashley. We have no better laborers in the Lord's vineyard than Brother and Sister Eli Fisher. Their work at Pacific Grove was well done. We miss them from our part of the state, but Ventura gave them a royal welcome and their work is moving grandly. The Dunkards are forming a colony in San Joaquin county, California.

Kansas Letter.

The Kansas ministerial institute has passed into history. The chief speakers were H. O. Breeden and T. P. Haley. The attendance was hardly up to that of last year, owing, no doubt, to the place of meeting, Hutchinson being a little too far west for a good many of the preachers.

Everyone seemed to enjoy the lectures and addresses of Brothers Breeden and Haley. No one who heard these men could fail to be greatly benefited. Brother Breeden dealt rather with the theoretical phases of the preacher's work, while Brother Haley emphasized the practical side. These brethren occupied nearly all of the time except what was required for discussion and business. A full report of the institution will appear in the Kansas Messenger.

One resolution passed deserves wide publication, that is: that all certificates issued by the institute cease to be in force after Jan. 1, 1905, and that only such certificates be reissued where the applicant pays his dues between Jan. 1 and the meeting of the institute, in April. The certificates will be good for only one year. The dues were raised to $2 per year.

Elmer Ward Cole and his people entertained the institute in a very hospitable fashion. His work is opening up in a very promising manner. We are glad to have Brother Cole in our ministerial ranks.

State Evangelists J. Ira Jones and his singer, Bert I. Bentley, were at the institute and went from there to Baxter Springs, where they began a meeting April 10. Their ten days' meeting at Tonganoxie resulted in five additions and a revival of interest in the church work among the members. C. A. Hill and wife passed through Topeka en route for Ohio, their home. They have had to give up evangelizing for the present on account of Brother Hill's ill health. They will return to Kansas this fall. C. C. Atwood and wife are now at Parker trying to revive the dying embers and unite the discordant elements in a very difficult field. Their meeting at Mound City resulted in eighteen additions. R. W. Woodside and Miss Snowy Ditch held a six weeks' meeting at Oakley. There were twenty-two additions. C. A. Smith, of Oakley, writes that they now have the strongest church both in numbers and financially in town. Brother Woodside is available for a meeting in May. J. D. Greer is in a little meeting at Howard. His work was hindered on account of his taking la grippe.

We dedicated the church at Dwight on April 3. They have a neat frame building costing $1,500. H. I. Bryant is the pastor and is building another house at Sylvan Park. We dedicate at Dresden April 17, at Center, near Columbus, May 1, at Argentine June 19, and at Belleville about June 5.

Sister Fullen, our state organizer, organized a C. W. B. M. auxiliary at Mound City with twenty-five members; also at McCune with twelve members. Sister Fullen is doing excellent work in her department. Miss Alma Moore is again in the field for the month of April in the interest of the C. W. B. M. and junior work.

Indian Territory Notes.

The church at Ardmore is now a living link church in the home field, with its own evangelist. Since taking this new responsibility the church has taken on new life and all departments of its work are looking up. Many plans are being laid and carried out for the enlargement of its own usefulness. Brother Reed, the pastor of the church, seems very hopeful for its future. This is a splendid people, and our work with them is and has always been very pleasant. We are sure God will bless them the coming year, and many if not all of their hopes will be realized. The collection for foreign missions will go beyond their apportionment.

Our work as evangelist in the Chickasaw Nation for the Ardmore church began the first of January. Our first meeting was at Duncan, commencing new year's eve. They had been without a pastor for some time, and as a result, as is always the case, the church was in a very low spiritual condition. While our meeting was attended with some difficulties, aside from this we felt it was fairly successful, continuing five weeks with sixty-four additions. There were during this meeting some rather startling occurrences, and some very pleasing things which, while they greatly interested the community, might not be of general interest. An old gentleman seventy-four years old and his wife near the same age were baptized. At the close of the meeting we organized two Endeavor societies. I go back to Duncan in September for another meeting. Brother Riley is preaching for them half time, dividing with Marlow.

North of Duncan ten miles we have a congregation at Marlow; ten miles north of this we have one at Rush Springs; ten miles north of this we have one at Ninekah. Chickasha, still further north on the Rock Island, is doing well under the ministry of Bro. J. B. Boen. Southeast of Chickasha, on a new road, lately built, at the town of Lindsay, we have a number of good people that we believe during the season will build a house of worship. At Pails Valley, on the Santa Fe, we have some good people, and have planned, as soon as the weather is good, to hold a meeting. We will have to use a tent, so for this place have to wait for good weather. Bro. C. E. Chambers has done a splendid work at Purcell. One year ago this was one of the very weak churches in the territory. They have grown wonderfully and are now becoming quite self-reliant. The apportionment for foreign missions was ten dollars. They raised twenty-five. They have bought a new parsonage and are planning for a great work the coming year.

About one year ago we organized a little congregation at Lexington, O. T. It is across the river from Purcell. Since then Brother Marshall held a meeting, with about fifty additions. They now have a good house and are doing a good work. We are anxious to locate a good man with this people; we are to hold a meeting for them in July.

At Wynnewood we have a small congregation. Their house is now being used for school purposes. As soon as it is free, we hope to be able to help them some. We begin a meeting April 11 at Marietta, a town twenty miles south of Ardmore. Of this place we will say more after the meeting.

Michigan Notes.

The new church at Belding entertained the third district convention. The attendance was not large but the convention was very helpful. The church will dedicate their splendid new house of worship April 24.

There were eleven additions at the Lyon Street church, Grand Rapids, Easter Sunday. The church is in a prosperous condition, and the outlook brighter than ever before. They dedicated a $2,000 pipe organ on Easter Sunday.

A. L. Martin has resigned at the Fifth Avenue church, Grand Rapids, and will close his work April 24. W. H. Betts recently baptized four at Trowbridge, where the work is taking on new life. P. C. Wing has located with the church at Ballards, and expects to open a new work at Sparta. An auxiliary has been organized at Sparta, which we expect will grow into a church. Ballard expects to have a new parsonage this summer.

Brother Porter is in a meeting at High Banks with fifteen additions to date. L. O. Drew is in a meeting at Lacota, with thirty additions to date. D. Munroe is in Ann Arbor taking treatment. At last report his condition was somewhat improved.

There were two confessions at Iona last Lord's day. Brother Green reports the work at Mt. Pleasant in a flourishing condition.

I will close my work at Cascade, April 24, and begin work at Paw Paw, May 1; one addition at Cascade recently.

The Michigan state convention will be held with the church at Adrian, June 6-9. We hope to make this the best convention in our history.

Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia.

The Sunday-school of Joppa, Maryland church, has celebrated the ninth anniversary of its organization. This church was helped by the Church Extension Board. They have almost, or perhaps entirely, paid back their loan. J. R. Goff is the minister there and at Jerusalem and Fork.

H. F. Lutz, of Fairmont, W. Va., passed through Waynesboro and stopped off and preached for our mission. His sermon on "How to get Power" was just what we need for encouragement at this stage of the work. He reports the work at Fairmont prospering and the church growing rapidly in the grace of giving. He will preach a week at Harrisburg, Pa.

E. B. Bagby reports 19 confessions and other additions at Ninth street, Washington, in the last two Sundays.

I notice an advertisement in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of the Living Oracles, translated by George Campbell, James McKnight and Philip Doddridge, Doctors of the Church of Scotland, printed and published by Alexander Campbell, Buffalo, Boone county, Virginia, 1826. I have a copy before me of that date which belonged to my grandmother, a sister of John Perry, one of the elders of the church at Wellsburg, Va., in the early days of the restoration movement. I wonder how many of our brethren read this book? Two men are in our town now selling the Twentieth Century New Testament and claim that many people are buying it who had not been reading the Bible, but are reading this with a new interest, as its language is modern and attractive.

I want to compare a verse or two in the King James, the Living Oracles, or Sacred Writings, as Campbell gives the title, and the Twentieth Century New Testament. Take Matt. 3:15: "And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness. Then he suffered him." (King James.)

"Jesus answering said unto him, Permit this at present; for thus ought we to satisfy every institution. Then John acquiesced." (Living Oracles.)

"Let it be so for the present, Jesus answered, for it is proper for us to satisfy in this way every religious requirement. Upon this John yielded." (Twentieth Century.)

Other passages might be given to show the modern English of the Living Oracles, and the value of this translation for comparison. It also translates baptize. "Reform and be each of you immersed," etc., Acts 2:38. It has also an appendix.

Let the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in the great middle west remember we in this missionary territory are pleading with you to come over and help us by a great offering on May 1. It ought to be $200,000. We will try to give liberally. We want your prayers as well.

Waynesboro, Pa.

Ohio Letter.

Let the doxology be sung throughout the state! The Brannock City ward option bill has passed both branches of the legislature. The temperance forces won at every point. The senate passed the bill 27 to 6. The brewers and the state administration were against the bill, but the servants of the people in the Ohio legislature have learned that if they want votes in the future they must support temperance legislation. The anti-saloon league leaders deserve the hearty thanks and congratulations of all good people in Ohio.

C. A. McDonald has resigned at Coshocton. This is one of our state missions.

The following telegram came on a postal card Monday, March 28, from Samuel H. Farner, of the Fourth Avenue church in Columbus: "Great day yesterday; $77.50 for foreign missions and 19 confessions. House filled to overflowing and congregation voted unanimously to begin and rush to completion the new auditorium. Everybody happy and no blue Monday." But who is surprised?

The new West Side church in Dayton was dedicated Sunday, April 10. President Cramblett preached and took the pledges. The property cost $12,500, lot and house. It is a building of brick and will seat 350 people. Nine thousand dollars was called for on dedication day and something over $6,000 was pledged. The new church is well located and ought to have a bright future before it.

The Nelsonville church is happy in securing E. S. DeMiller as pastor. He will begin as soon as he can be released from his evangelistic work in Canada. We have few better preachers and pastors than Brother DeMiller and he is welcomed back to Ohio most heartily.

The seventy fifth anniversary of the Central church in Dayton was celebrated April 17-20. B. L. Smith lectured on Sunday night on Alexander Campbell. Monday night A. McLean spoke on "Missions Among the Disciples." "City Evangelization" was the theme of A. M. Harvuot on Tuesday night, and Wednesday night the annual church meeting was held. Brother Cahill reports 13 confessions the past two weeks and a membership of 800.

The sixty second annual meeting of the Franklin Circle church, Cleveland, was held Tuesday night, April 12. In all departments the church raised $9,059.25; of this $2,371.35 was for missions. The church is a living link in the F. C. M. S., the A. C. M. S. and the O. C. M. S. The church was never in a better condition than now. Edgar D. Jones is leading the church very successfully.

Remember May 1 and also the Ohio state convention, May 23-26, Cleveland, O.

Missions.

The church at Bowmanville, Ont., of which B. H. Hayden is pastor, nearly doubled its apportionment for foreign missions.

The Easter offering of the Maryville, Mo., Christian church Bible-school, of which W. D. Alkire is superintendent, was $275.

The Christian church Bible-school at Troy, Mo., of which E. J. Lampton is pastor, gave $16.33 on Easter Sunday for the Orphans' Home.

The Junior Endeavor of Bloomfield, Iowa, gave an entertainment for the benefit of missions, from which $24 was realized.

Washington State News.

G. S. O. Humbert is making a tour of the western Washington churches in the interest of the endowment of the Eugene divinity school. Brother Humbert is the field agent for the school. He was the first to graduate from the institution, and his work has been very successful. He combines good business ability with consecration and a knowledge of the word, and being a man of good social powers he is most happily fitted for this work in which he is engaged. The school is growing rapidly and a greatly increased endowment fund is needed to meet the growing demands upon it.

Dr. W. T. Thomas and wife, and their son, Merrill, well known in Missouri, have recently located in Tacoma and are already at work in the First church. Our churches in the west have a cordial welcome for all such earnest disciples of our Lord.

The need of greatly increased offerings for home missions is realized here in the northwest as in few other portions of our country. Here we have all the needs of a new country—towns are going up as if by magic. We need means to establish churches in all of these places and to secure property while it is to be had at reasonable prices. Many souls are lost every year because we have not the means to answer the calls for workers. We are a great people with a plea that the world needs. Let us fulfill our mission.

Health is Your Heritage

If you feel sick, depressed and irritated, if your food disagrees with you, if you are constipated, if you suffer from catarrh or kidney and bladder trouble, you are not getting what you are entitled to out of life. There is no reason why you should not be restored to a life of perfect health and usefulness. There is a cure for you and it won't cost you a cent to try it. The Vernal Remedy Company have so much confidence in their superb remedy, Vernal Palmetto (formerly known as Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine), that they are willing to send, free and prepaid, to any reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST that writes for it, a trial bottle. You can try and test absolutely free of all charge. We advise every reader to take advantage of this generous offer and write to-day to The Vernal Remedy Co., 506 Seneca Building, Buffalo, N. Y.

Isaac E. Barnum,*

A Builder of the Church in the West.

Judge Barnum was born on May 19, 1842, at Paw Paw, Mich. He came of a good family; his father was a man known throughout all the community for integrity and Christian work. An opportunity offering for service in the United States Navy, Isaac took that up for a time, but his mind was set on the legal profession; he entered the University of Michigan and graduated in the law department in 1867, at the age of twenty-five years. Two years afterward he married Mary Elizabeth Abbott, who, with the son Edward, survive him.

A fine looking man, gifted, eloquent and energetic, the young lawyer was rapidly building up a fine practice in Michigan and Chicago, when a threatened lung trouble sent him and the family to Denver, in 1877. Indeed his friends feared the worst; it was thought by many he would not live a year. But the Colorado climate co-operated happily with the cheery, hopeful determination of the invalid. He lived the year; he lived twenty-seven years and accomplished a work that will never be forgotten.

He entered into a partnership with Judge Graham, of this city, and was conspicuous in some of the notable criminal trials at that time. After the partnership ceased, he served as police judge two years, receiving the appointment from Governor Eaton, and after that he continued practice at the bar up to his recent illness, always handicapped by a relentless struggle with physical pain and weakness, but never yielding a single advantage that could be held by heroic will-power and unflagging determination.

He was brought up in the Christian Church, he became an earnest and avowed Disciple in his youthful manhood. It became the chief concern of his life. When he came to Denver he found the church of his choice weak, without a house of worship and without any immediate prospect of securing one. He, nevertheless, took up the problem of building up the church with the keenest interest. He put his shoulder to the wheel and soon became a leader in all the efforts to advance the cause. The joys, the sorrows, the defeats, the victories of the church became an important part of his own life. That position of leadership, of burden bearing and helpful ministry he retained up to the very last year of his life. He was an elder in the congregation for more than a quarter of a century; he was on every important committee, counselor, advocate, teacher, administrator; he was a shepherd of the flock, more than falls to the lot of any preacher or pastor serving the church but a fraction of its history. The service he rendered this church continued through the administration of the different pastors, and in the absence of a pastor he was able to fill the pulpit himself.

Doubtless his unflagging attention to the needs of church, Sunday-school and the mid-week meeting interfered somewhat with his law practice, but it made him a better, nobler and happier man. Faith in God and the Christian religion kept the reservoirs of hope and courage always full in his own heart, and these gave him buoyant cheerfulness and added years to his life.

It is well for the lawyer to give the attention necessary to success to the demands of the Denver bar; it is better to give also the necessary attention to the demands of that bar where God sits in judgment, to that bar before which he now stands, not to plead for mercy on account of a beggarly preparation due to his absorption in the petty things of the earthly life, but to stand face to face with his Maker without fear, in the confidence of a filial and loving relationship long established, a relationship from which love had driven all fear. That is worth while at the threshold of eternity.

Brother Barnum is dead. The voice we so often heard in eloquent praise of others is silent. The heart that ever throbbed in sympathy with all that is good and true, has ceased to beat. The long struggle with an enemy that his wonderful will-power and watchfulness could hold at bay, but never completely overcome, is ended. The warrior is at rest. The spear and shield are laid aside forever. Wave your palms for the victor. Sing songs of faith and triumph, you who knew and loved him well. Let heaven open wide her gates and angels sing a welcome. If heaven and earth do not hail him thus, for whom we speak to-day, there is no hope for any of us.

Brother Barnum dead! No; he has escaped a tenement that had become unserviceable through the destructive effect of time and disease, and his spirit, disciplined and purified, has assumed the incorruptible, glorified body of our faith.

Judge Barnum loved life. There was every reason why he should. He had the poet's heart, the poet's vision. He saw not only the outward beauty delightful to the eye, with which life clothes itself in all its protean forms, he saw also the inner beauty that delights the soul. He loved this good world. He loved men and delighted in the fellowship of congenial friends. He knew what was in men because so many of the elements that enter into the composition of human character were represented in his own rich life. When a fine thought or emotion from a kindred life reached him, his mind felt the stimulus, his emotions glowed and his tongue grew eloquent.

I knew him well. I loved him. I dare not, even by the aid of the written page, attempt to recall the dear, old days when all his gifts were in their best estate. It were too hard for his loved one to hear, and too hard for me.

He had a wit that kindled at a word, a genial humor that lighted his face, and his eyes became the radiant prophet of his ready words. The sublime and the ridiculous could crowd themselves together in a single sentence of his talk, so quick was the play of his emotions and the transition of his thought.

He was at his best when the prayer meeting was at its best, when heaven and earth were in communion through the mediation of the wonderful words of Jesus. He would sit at one side, quiet, absorbed, thinking; at the last, just before the meeting closed, he would rise, and in a brief talk sum up, expand, enrich, develop what had been said or suggested in words and manner, eloquent, elegant and inspiring beyond anything I have ever heard from any other man at any time. Of course it was at rare moments, especially in his later years, that he was at his best. Like all fluent speakers, he sometimes used his high sounding, rich vocabulary when his memory was in command rather than the impulse of a genuine emotion. The best of us do that. We cannot always command the service of our emotions, but we often are compelled, by some sudden demand upon us, to command the use of words.

Had he faults? Yes. The faults inseparably associated with the poetic temperament. His judgment was always swayed by the influences of the hour, rather than the intention of a previous hour. If the influences of the hour were strong and his emotions deeply aroused, he was inclined to be imperious and sometimes provokingly determined, especially to one in opposition. All his faults were along this line; perhaps we ought not to call them faults at all, but failings. His heart was set on noble ideas, his purpose was always to do right in the sight of God and men, his life was remarkably pure, useful, admirable.

When the speaker came to Denver, to take the pastorate of the Central, Brother Barnum, who had been directing the affairs of the church, did not at once yield to the newcomer. I had to earn his confidence; that was right. When I had won his esteem, I had his loving and loyal co-operation to the end.

This church will always cherish his memory and feel the influence of his devoted life. He has left a rich legacy of proud memories to his family and an honorable record in the city and state. The memory of the just is blessed.

Sunday-School Pilgrims at Mars Hill.

I must tell your readers of our service yesterday on Mars Hill, Athens. I am on the world's Sunday school cruise en route to Jerusalem, where the world's convention is to be held April 21-23. We have 820 delegates on board from every state and territory in the United States, the provinces of Canada, Mexico and the West Indies. We have many leaders of Sunday-school work and a number of missionaries. Yesterday we held a service on Mars Hill. The weather was ideal, for 20 miles down the Saronic gulf, over the bay of Salamis, toward Corinth, across the Attic plain, in the direction of Marathon the eye swept with delight. At our feet the busy din of Athens came faintly up. With 170 ministers of every persuasion standing around him, Dr. Gates, president of Roberts College, Constantinople, led the reading of Paul's matchless sermon on Mars Hill, Acts 17:22-31. Then Dr. John Potts, of Toronto, president of the international lesson committee, preached the most remarkable sermon it has ever been my fortune to hear. It was superb in its simplicity, in its abounding with scriptural quotation, in its argument and homiletic division. The old rock was covered black with our delegates and they sat in carriages at the base of the rock and listened with almost bated breath. His theme was "Christ and the Resurrection," Acts 17:18. May I venture just a brief analysis? "In lonely grandeur," said the preacher, "Paul proclaimed Christ and the resurrection, with the glistening Parthenon towering over him." Athens was called "the eye of Greece, the mother of eloquence," but Paul looked at her in the light of sin and immortality, not of the grandeur of arts.

No subject in the New Testament is used for so many purposes: forgiveness, a lively hope of immortality, bereavement, Christian life and work.

1. To preach Jesus and the resurrection is to preach a triumphantly vindicated Christ.
2. It is to preach a gloriously complete gospel. The gospel of culture and rationalism is not complete. Said Drummond, "Science without mystery is unknown; religion without mystery is absurd." Man is alienated and in rebellion toward God; although he is immortal, he is defiled. The gospel to meet his need must give atonement, pardon, purity and make him prepared to enjoy immortality.

3. To preach Jesus and the resurrection is the only hope for the world's evangelization. In every home some time the question is asked, "If a man die, shall he live again?" Science cannot answer, and only this gospel can satisfy.

4. Without this there is no proper view of childhood.

One of the most tragic moments was that when Dr. Potts referred to Job's question as asked in our homes, referring to our kindred and loved ones 5,000 miles away, and a mighty sob went up from the great company on Mars Hill.

One of the sensations of the occasion was the unfurling of a beautiful "conquest" flag and the waving of "Old Glory" and the "Union Jack" as we sang "America." We have had superb weather all the time during the past three weeks, and to-night drop anchor in the Golden Horn, Constantinople.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

The resident members of the state board met at the residence of Mrs. W. D. Harrison on Friday, April 15. The votes on the question of adding the words, "and five cents a month to the state treasury," to article V of auxiliary constitution have not called out the general expression we had hoped for. Only six auxiliaries have voted "No" to date, but so many have failed to indicate their opinions. They can do so yet by bringing the matter before their auxiliary in regular session as described in my last letter to the auxiliaries.

Before this reaches our readers a letter on "Tidings campaign" will be in your secretary's hands. I hope every executive committee will at once get together and work out the campaign, each in its own best way, with plans founded on prayer, executed with prayer and successes crowned by prayer.

"I've a secret I can tell." Our national president, Mrs. N. E. Atkinson, has promised to be with us at our state convention. We must give her large and hearty greeting on the very first session, Friday, June 17. Use your influence with the "powers that be" in the churches to send their preachers to the whole of this convention. Give them a Sunday off and let them listen to others one Sunday and see how they like it.

Mormonism in the East.

Upon the invitation of the Federation of Christian Women, I visited Syracuse, N. Y., for the purpose of delivering a course of lectures on Mormonism. There were present each evening from two to four Mormon elders, and, as is my custom, they were given the privilege to stop the speaker at any point in his address to correct whatever they might consider a misrepresentation of their position. They were not in the least backward. Denial is their forte. If an unpleasant truth or fact is stated, they simply meet it with a denial. But these gentlemen soon tired of this amusement, for no sooner had they registered their denial than a quotation from their own books would silence them. The audiences were large and enthusiastic. We exposed their deceptive methods, as well as the fallacy and wickedness of Mormon teaching, apparently to the satisfaction of all present, except the defenders of the delusion.

From Syracuse we went to Albany, the capital city of the great empire state. Here a committee of thirty had made ample arrangements for a course of nine lectures. These were delivered in eight different churches, distributed over almost the entire area of the city, thus giving the largest possible number of people an opportunity to hear. One of the most encouraging features of the work was that the meetings were attended by people of large influence and high social standing. Here, as at Syracuse, the elders were permitted to speak and ask questions, with about the same results.

The daily press of both cities gave brief but very favorable and encouraging reports of the work done under the auspices of the committees having the anti-Mormon movement in charge.

On my return I visited Palmyra, N. Y., the birthplace of Mormonism; talked with many of the old citizens about its origin; visited "Mormon Hill," where the plates are said to have been found; climbed to the topmost peak and examined the hole whence the plates are said to have been taken. I tried to get a small section of the hole to bring away as a souvenir; but the hole was so time-worn and "ragged around the edges" that it would not hold together, and so I had to abandon the project altogether. Another explanation of my failure may be found in the fact that until quite recently, the late Admiral Sampson owned the property, and his amiable brother, who still lives on the farm, was not authorized to negotiate the sale of any part of the precious soil; but I did manage to get a few queer-shaped stones from the hill, two of which were picked up in the very midst of that memorable hole. In proof of this narrative, if you are in doubt of its correctness, call at my study, see the stones and be convinced.

Bloomington, Indiana, Meeting.

There were one hundred and seventy-three accessions—one hundred and two by confession and baptism—in the twenty-five days' meeting at Bloomington, Indiana. On account of the necessity of returning to our pastoral work in Minneapolis the meeting had to close all too soon. There were additions at every service except the first night, and fourteen came forward the last night. The city of Bloomington is a strategic point, this being the location of the State university which is only four squares from the church, and many of the students attended the services. There was no great excitement in the meeting, but an earnest, quiet enthusiasm for souls born of a reasonable faith in the gospel's power. There have long been two congregations of Disciples in Bloomington, one being anti-missionary society, anti-organ, etc. Many members from the latter attended the services, got new light and united with the missionary church. Thus the meeting was a triumph for the spirit of missions and a broader Christianity. Brother Thomas J. Clark has been pastor here for ten years, and this great meeting is an evidence of the wisdom of the long pastorate. He is loved by the whole community as a strong preacher and an ideal Christian gentleman. We have never seen a better spirit in a meeting, even the so-called "anti-missionary people" conceded that, and those who united with the Kirkwood Avenue church came practically without personal solicitation to leave their own organization. We have never enjoyed a meeting more than this with this splendid church. We lectured to a crowded house the last night on "A Trip Through the British Isles."

A Splendid Meeting.

The writer, with home forces, assisted by Sister J. E. Powell, of Wabash, Ind., as soloist and leader of a large chorus, has just closed a successful meeting with the East End Christian church, Pittsburg, Pa. According to the unanimous expression of the officers and members of the church, this was the most successful and profitable meeting ever held with this congregation. Sister Powell's singing delighted and charmed all who heard her. As a personal worker in soul saving she is the best the writer ever worked with. Her life is wholly committed to this supreme work. The interest in the meeting grew from the first to the last. The church stood royally by its pastor. There were 30 confessions and baptisms, six by statement, one by letter and one from the Baptist Church, making 38 additions. The leading soprano in the quartette of the East End church, a Methodist Church, was visiting in the city, heard the gospel, obeyed her Lord in baptism, and returned home a disciple of Christ. The church has been blessed, and we all rejoice and praise our King.

WILLIAM J. RUSSELL, minister.

From Webster County, Mo.

Our county co-operative work starts out in fine shape. R. B. Havener closed a fine meeting of two weeks at the Corinth church, in which there were twenty-two additions—seventeen by baptism. Eleven were young men and four were public school teachers. This doubles our membership and gives us some of the brightest young people in the community. Brother Havener found us weak and discouraged, but leaves us happy and hopeful. He put us to work in a Bible-school, and we hope very soon to inaugurate Christian Endeavor work. This is my home church.

Prior to the above meeting Brother Havener conducted a two weeks' meeting at Sinai church, in which there were eighteen additions, ten of whom were young men. A Bible-school was organized and a subscription for preacher's salary for one-fourth time raised at each of the above meetings.

Bro. F. M. Wood, of Springfield, Mo., conducted a meeting at the Davis schoolhouse and had four additions by baptism. Brother Wood is employed to preach one-fourth time, and they are in the midst of building a house of worship.

Bro. F. M. Hooton, our president, is pushing this work, and we are hoping to come to our county convention with a good report of work done.

MRS. J. P. CALLAWAY, Sec.
Marshfield, Mo.

"Unconquered Land."

DEAR BRO. GARRISON: I am now a Missourian, having located with the Pattonsburg church for full time. It is almost thirty years since I left Missouri, during which time much of the land has been "conquered," many heroes have fallen, many friends have been won, much progress has been made, many false notions of missionary plans and work outgrown, better equipment and closer co-operation for evangelistic work gained, and we are better and more favorably understood by our religious neighbors than we were thirty years ago. There is cause in all this for great gratitude and encouragement. I feel sensible of both, and a confidence in the spirit of the Missouri brethren that forbids any hesitation in taking my place among them and assisting in taking the rest of the "unconquered land."

Keep me straight, if you can. If you have any good advice, let me have it now. Don't wait till it is too late. If you know anything better than the "old Jerusalem gospel" for my parishioners, teach it to me; or any better way to preach it than just as it is, let me know all about it, so I can keep step with the column as it advances to the conquest. I have read your serial on the "Unconquered Land." I find no fault with any position there taken.

"Them's my sentiments, tew." I do not always agree with you, but maybe quite as often as you do with me. Still I am always on the same side with you in the grand movement for Christ, in purpose, feeling and effort, if not in method. And I expect to have my share in the rejoicing when the victory has been won.

J. H. PAINTER.

The Evangelistic Band of the University of Chicago.

Last December ten young men of the University of Chicago banded themselves together for evangelistic work. Their plan was to visit cities near Chicago, hold meetings from Friday evening till Sunday evening, returning to their studies on Monday.

They have held six meetings in such places as, Michigan City, Ind., Hammond, Ind., and Beloit, Wis. In these six meetings more than three hundred people have been brought to confess faith in Christ.

The work of the band is done absolutely without charge, the young men asking only that their railway fare and entertainment be provided. In these meetings each man does that particular work for which he is best prepared, and much personal work is done.

At Batavia, Ill., the churches all united, giving the band full charge of the meetings.

The entire community was greatly impressed by the unselfishness and genuine earnestness of the men. The spiritual life of each church was deepened and enriched, while many were brought to see more clearly than ever before the reality of the religion of Jesus Christ.

H. F. BURNS.

World's Fair Accommodations.

THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST can be of very material aid to those of its readers who intend to visit the great Louisiana Purchase Exposition, which opens April 30. The question of lodgings while in the city is first in time and importance. The want columns of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be used by the membership of the church in this city to call attention to rooms which they may have in their residences for the accommodation of visitors to the Fair. We believe that through this medium both the renters and those who have the rooms to let will be benefited because of congenial arrangements. In this issue will be found three advertisements of the character referred to above, namely, that of Sister T. R. Bryan (wife of the treasurer of the Church Extension Board), Sister Henry Orpen, Sister E. L. Foster and Sister T. B. Spurlock (112 Oakwood avenue), of this city. These are all favorably known to us, and we recommend those intending to come soon to write to them and let them know just what their needs are and when they will visit the Fair.

Semi-Annual Report Compton Heights Christian Church, St. Louis, Mo., April 6.

I have been with the Compton Heights Christian church just six months. During this time we have received into our fellowship 49 people: 17 by baptism, three from the Baptists and 29 by letter and reclaimed. Our three Sunday-schools are doing excellent work. They are reaching about 700 pupils, with an average attendance of over 500. We have just organized our women into a union, and are now districting the city for an advance movement. We have one of the best Christian Endeavor societies in the state. We raised $300 for foreign missions and are planning for the home collection, May 1. Our prayer-meetings are well attended; our people are united and happy.

BROWN.

Sister Elizabeth Brown, who died recently in Rushville, Mo., was nearly 94 years of age. She had been a member of the church 60 years. Her death was a glorious exemplification of the Christian faith. She arranged for her burial as if she were arranging for a pleasure journey. After all was arranged, she requested Bro. Joseph Lowe to preach her funeral, which he did from a text of her own choosing.

HALL.

Claiborne Hall died at Athens, Ill., April 13, 1904, aged 84 years, 7 months and 8 days. He came to Athens from Virginia in 1829, went to Knoxville, Ia., in 1843 and returned here in 1864 where he has since remained, a leader in good works. He was liberal, public-spirited, devoted to the church and often preached. He was always in his place. Athens will seem lonely without him. He leaves a wife and one son.

HELLER.

Dr. William H. Heller died at Abingdon, Ill., April 4, 1904, aged 80 years, 10 months and 23 days.

JARMEN.

Louisa Ann Jarmen died in Bolivar, Mo. April 10. She has been a sufferer for twenty-five years. She leaves nine children and a husband. She has been a faithful member of the church for eighteen years. Funeral by writer.

J. H. JONES.

JONES.

Mrs. Helen Jones, daughter of Dr. John T. Cox, of Moberly, Mo., died at her home in Palmyra on Tuesday. She was married about a year ago to Elder Jones, who is pastor of the Christian church at Palmyra. She leaves a child a few weeks old. The burial will take place to-day in Oakland cemetery, near this city.

MIKSELL.

Joshua Mikkell departed this life March 29, 1904, aged 83 years and 1 day; was the father of 9 children, 5 living and 4 dead. He was a member of the Church of Christ 64 years. He died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. A. Pierson, in Avery, Iowa. Funeral services conducted by Bro. B. W. Pettit.

Avery, Iowa, April 13, '04. ELDER A. PIERSON.

RAMEY.

Abigail West was born July 26, 1828, at Liberty, Brown county, Ohio, and died at Unadilla, Neb., March 3, 1904, surrounded by her six children, a band of men and women to make glad the heart of any mother. She was a member of the Christian Church from her youth, and all of her children are members of the Church. She was the daughter of John and Lavina Stewart West, and sister of Eleanor Pickrell, W. W. West, J. S. West, and the wife of the writer. She was married to William Neyman Ramey in 1847. In 1858 she moved with her husband and family to Edina, Mo., where her husband died in 1869. She was a devoted and most unselfish daughter, sister, wife, mother and friend. Funeral services were held in the church at Unadilla, and her body was borne to its last resting place in Unadilla cemetery by her four sons, her son-in-law and a grandson.

O. A. BARTHOLOMEW.

WEST.

Died, in Bolivar, Mo. April 23, Mrs. West, a faithful member of the Baptist Church from girlhood. Funeral by writer, assisted by Professor Dow, of Southwest Missouri Baptist College.

A Sermon in a Nutshell.

In the Scripture the cities are the worst and the best of places. From Sodom, the worst, the best is a long call. It is only possible by the saving power of the gospel. Home mission work has no harder problem nor heavier burden than the saving of the cities, yet it must be done. Consider home missions: 1. For the sake of the cities themselves. 2. For the sake of the country. 3. For the sake of the world. 4. For the sake of Christian workers. 5. For the sake of Christ.

Business Notes.

Have you seen the "Lesson Primer" for the primary teachers of our brotherhood? Well, that you may do so, we offer it at 15 cents, postpaid.

"Man Preparing for Other Worlds," by W. T. Moore, with over 500 pages, discusses some most interesting problems, and is offered you at $2, postpaid.

"Jonah and Jesus," says the manager of the book department, while they last, at 15 cents. That sounds like giving away good literature and throwing in the cover.

So the "Morning Star" was, in its time, a most acceptable song book, but we have 150 on hand, boards, and you may have them at 50 cents per dozen, $4 per 100, not prepaid.

Those revised Testaments at 7 cents for limp, 15 cents for the full cloth, and 35 cents for primer, silk cloth, will soon exhaust our stock; then come the regular prices again.

Our baptismal suits always give satisfaction, for we have refused to handle any but the best; yet we sell these at less than others, for we can afford to do it, handling them in such quantities.

The Souvenir Portfolio of the World's Fair offered by Our Young Folks is one of the very generous offers to which we like to call your attention, feeling you will thank us for the "bargain."

The Lesson Helper is for teachers of the "Intermediates," and that you may use it the remainder of this year, feeling sure you will then order for the next, we are offering the book for 15 cents, postpaid.

The Revised Christian Hymnals, boards, at 30 cents, are the books for the congregation. In cloth, at 75 cents, they are the acme of the song book list and are offered in dozen and hundred lots at much less.

"The Christian Worker's Testament" continues to attract attention, as it should, being very handy for young people wishing to be always ready to say a word. It sells at 75 cents, $1 and $1.25, according to the binding.

You need not that we should call your attention to the most excellent offer of the head of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST subscription department to give a set of dishes for ten subscribers to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. That's enough.

Our Popular Hymns No. 2, Living Praise, and Silver and Gold, continue to be the song books of the brotherhood; while Gospel Call No. 1 or 2, and the combined, are in constant demand, and will be for some time. Try them, and you'll use them.

Think of one of the most interesting books ever written, "Life of John Smith," by Williams, cloth, steel portrait, 578 pages, 50 cents. At that price, every parent can well afford one for the children—all the children. Never sold before for less than $2.

Some of the most "shamefully cheap" bargains are offered our friends in another part of this paper this week, but the offer holds for only 30 days, as we feel that most of the books will be gone by that time, and the offer applies only during the present stock.

The Pocket Record and Memorandum, by G. A. Hoffmann, seems to be filling a long felt want, or the preachers have long felt the want, but could not meet the price until this handy little memorandum was put to them at 50 cents, so that we will soon issue another edition.

"Half Hour Studies at the Cross" continues in demand, thoroughly furnishing with the needful preparation one who presides at the table. It makes the part he takes acceptable and helpful to the membership. The book was prepared by Brother Garrison with this in view. 75 cents.

To the many mission Sunday-schools being organized this spring, we will furnish song books like "Tidings of Salvation," 120 pages, in boards, with good music, at ten cents each, or one dollar per dozen, and $7 per hundred, not prepaid; and you may have the limp at $5 per hundred, not prepaid.

While in the "old book" business, we have "Apostolic Songs" in boards, another great seller in its time, but they are offered you now at 50 cents per dozen, $4 per hundred, not prepaid. "Pearly Gates" may go the same road; then we will have only the newest and most up-to-date song books.

Think of McLean's Missionary Addresses at 25 cents for the next thirty days! Do not wait one day, for surely the demand will soon carry such a book into the library of every minister and most of the reading brethren not now supplied. It both equips and quickens one for missionary sermons at all times.

Why should not one of the brethren compliment the mechanical part of the books of the Christian Publishing Company, as compared with some others? This company does not put out any but the best of work in that line, and when the "Life of John Smith" is offered you at 50 cents, it is the same book that we have been selling at $2, but now that the trade in that book is about over, we had rather the books were in your libraries at our loss than on our shelves at the loss and doing no good.

"Is it not a helpful solution to the problem of the future," says Dr. W. T. Moore, "if it can be made probable that all the worlds that now roll in space will be ultimately inhabited by people who have lived, sinned, suffered and been redeemed during their pilgrimage on this earth? In that case the whole universe will ultimately be inhabited by a common brotherhood who will be fitted for the most sublime fellowship through the ceaseless ages of the future. Doubtless we shall carry with us from this world many of the memories and habits and even the vocations with which we have been familiar, and which have helped to form our characters while passing through the discipline of the present life." "Man Preparing for Other Worlds" (price $2), by W. T. Moore, is the result of fifty years of study and thinking. W. T. Moore is one of our strongest intellects. He was a favorite pupil of Alexander Campbell.

FLORIDA.

Jacksonville, April 12.—The meeting conducted by Brother James Small, evangelist, and Bro. J. T. Boone, pastor at the First Christian church, closed its fifth week last Lord's day. The congregation that night, composed largely of members of other churches than the Disciples, voted unanimously for the continuance of the meeting. The attention and interest has been intense, and increasing. Every Lord's day the house has been crowded to its utmost capacity, both auditorium and Bible-school room. Many tourists were regular in attendance. This is another demonstration of the wisdom of building largely and commodiously. Great audiences come every night. There have been 88 additions to the church. Brother Small has done a grand and glorious work. The seed he has sown will bring abundant harvest.—JAMES R. CHALLEN.

ILLINOIS.

Harvey, April 11.—One addition last night. Interest increasing steadily. Have just purchased three pulpit chairs, which add beauty to the church.—JOHN J. HIGGS.

Quincy, April 11.—Two additions by baptism to the First church last night; one by letter one week ago.—WALTER M. JORDAN.

Eureka, April 11.—One addition at Mackinaw.—H. H. PETERS.

Barry, April 15.—We have been here one month. The Sunday school manifests symptoms of a revival. Audiences increasing, in spite of bad weather. The church exceeded its apportionment for foreign missions, though it was without a pastor the first Sunday in March, and no special preparation had been made.—W. J. BURNER.

Rock Falls, April 15.—Meeting in Rock Falls closed on Friday night with 65 additions. These were as follows: 17 by letter and statement, nine reclaimed, 25 by primary obedience, five from M. E.'s, one from Congregationalists, one from Protestant Methodists, four from Baptists, one from Swedish Lutheran and one from Catholic church; 54 of these are adults, 24 are men. There was a nucleus of 47 here, so that there are now 112 in this church. This has been a mission of the Sterling church, and to their help and the untiring zeal of their pastor, W. E. Spicer, the district is indebted for this church. $675 has been raised toward a preacher, and with the help of the district board a minister will be located at once. This is the third church which I have organized under the first district in northern Illinois this year. I close my contract with them now and go to my farm near Speed, Cooper county, Mo., for a month's rest. I shall then re-enter the general field.—HAROLD E. MONSER.

INDIANA.

New Albany, April 11.—Three confessions and two by letter at the Central church yesterday. Two confessions at last prayer-meeting, making 17 additions at regular services in eight days. We are having somewhat of a revival without special effort and at regular services.—B. F. CATO.

IOWA.

Corning, April 12.—Meeting closed with 16 additions. A good meeting considering the condition of the church at the beginning. Evangelist Gregg preached as able a series of sermons as I ever heard. The people were well pleased with the meeting. Would be glad to hear from pastors or evangelists who wish to secure my services. Permanent address, Cotner University, Lincoln, Neb.—CHAS. E. MCVAY, singing evangelist.

Corning, April 12.—Closed last Sunday with crowded house. Opposition has been very much against us, yet all count the meeting a success. There were 16 additions, nearly all from new families. Prof. C. E. McVay led the song service. He is a very capable leader and a fine soloist.—SAM'L GREGG, pastor-evangelist.

Ellston, April 12.—We closed a meeting here Friday night with 32 additions. One more confession on Lord's day morning. I preached at Kellerton Sunday, where I held a meeting in January with 75 additions, and had two valuable additions by letter. Churches desiring meetings write me for terms at Des Moines, Iowa, University Place.—J. SHERMAN COFFIN, evangelist.

Atlantic, April 11.—Meeting here grows in interest; 45 to date; 7 last night; Mrs. Sada Hamilton, singer.—W. B. CREWDSON.

Creston, April 11.—The church is enjoying a good degree of prosperity. Eighteen were added to our membership the past month, and some eight or ten earlier in the winter not before reported. Nine came by confession and baptism, the others by letter and statement. We exceeded our apportionment for foreign missions.—R. H. INGRAM.

Des Moines.—The revival meeting at the Ninth and Shaw St. church of Christ closed with crowded house and unabated interest. The preaching was done by the regular pastor, J. Edward Cresmer, and the music was furnished by a chorus of twenty-five voices, led by the regular chorister, Mrs. Mary A. Mercer. The results of this three weeks' effort were 22 confessions, six reclaimed and two by letter. Bad weather hindered the meeting very much, but everyone is happy and encouraged over the results.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Tishomingo, April 13.—One added by letter at Roff last Lord's day.—E. S. ALLHANDS.

KANSAS.

Salina, April 13.—Eleven by letter and twenty-two by confession added to the church since Jan. 1.—DAVID H. SHIELDS.

North Topeka, April 11.—Began as pastor of the North Topeka church March 1. Have had six additions—four by letter, two by statement. I am pleased with the outlook.—F. H. BENTLEY.

Caldwell, April 11.—One by statement and one from the M. E. Church at last night's services. I put the records of additions, as given by Brother Buckley, on a blackboard at the morning services, and I believe it is doing some good.—LEE H. BARNUM.

KENTUCKY.

Lexington.—J. B. Hunley has been assisting Gayle Spencer in a meeting at Forest Hill, this city, in which there has been a deep interest, and during which a number of persons have made the good confession.

MISSOURI.

Carrollton, April 13.—We have had the following additions in regular work: three at River Side (two confessions, one restored); three confessions at Norborne, three at Green City; on the second Lord's day, April 10, one from the Baptists and two by statement.—73 in all since the first of the year.—J. B. LOCKHART.

Shelbyville April 12.—Our Lord's day school, under the supervision of Bro. W. W. Mitchell, is growing in interest and attendance. Offering for orphans' home amounted to $17.16. The work in general is very encouraging.—CLARENCE E. WAGNER, pastor.

Boonville, April 11.—Three baptisms and one by letter on the 3rd. Three confessions and two by letter yesterday, April 11.—H. N. McKEE, pastor, E. H. ROBERTS, JR., clerk.

Mound City, April 5.—One confession at Fairfax Lord's day, and one by letter in March.—J. N. COLE.

Sedalia, April 15.—Meeting continues with increasing interest. J. M. Rudy, the new pastor, is managing things very wisely and successfully; he is striking hard blows against the sins of the town; the church is being very much spiritualized; the future is very bright. The pastor's wife is supplementing his work in many ways. She is honored and loved by all the people of the city.—H. A. NORTHCUTT, evangelist.

Moerly, April 14.—Am preaching where I have been for four years, with exception of Salem. Work is getting along nicely. Paid $350 debt at Renick; raised about $30 for orphans' home at Clark, first Sunday in April. Expect to build a new church at Salem this summer. Will try to get each church to fall in line in all missions.—S. J. COPHER.

St. Louis, April 18.—Three confessions at the Hamilton Avenue church yesterday.—FRANK J. NICHOLS.

NEBRASKA.

Beaver City, April 13.—Closed a three weeks' meeting last night with De Forest Austin as our evangelist. Brother Austin is young as a preacher, but held us a fine meeting. We recommend him to others who need an evangelist. Added to the church by baptism, 18, letter, 2, from the denominations, five.—A. C. CORBIN.

OHIO.

Dayton, April 14.—Two confessions at the Central church last Sunday.—I. J. CAHILL.
Richwood, April 9.—During a short meeting with the church here recently, three persons made the good confession, and one was received by statement. The church, which has been without a pastor for over a year, will co-operate with some nearby point in the support of a pastor. There is a promising field here for a wise and diligent workman.—M. B. RYAN.

Glenville, April 9.—Five added by letter and one by confession and baptism recently.—M. B. RYAN.

Van Wert.—"We are glad to say that God has blessed our efforts here until to-day we are permitted to see this church free from debt. On April 10, 1904, we saw her indebtedness canceled and the mortgage consumed in flames."—H. E. STEVENS, minister.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Perkins, April 13.—A three weeks' meeting at Carney resulted in 18 additions, and an organization of 44 members. Carney is a new town of about 500 people on the new Katy railroad.—W. J. GARNER.

Ripley, April 12.—Closed here yesterday with 30 added—17 by baptism, three from denominations, ten by letter and restoration. Go next to Stroud. Ed McKinney fine chorister. Open for engagements; address him Dorsey, Ill.—ARTHUR W. JONES, Comanche, I. T.

Shawnee, April 12.—Four additions last Sunday.—GRANVILLE SNELL.

Geary, April 11.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting in Cleveland county, O. T., five miles west and three north of Norman. Planted a New Testament church of fourteen members. Bro. J. C. Powell, one of the old guard of our movement, lives in the vicinity and will care for them. I leave for Garfield county and north part of territory Thursday, April 14.—R. S. SMEDLEY.

Blackwell, April 15.—Bro. H. C. Hilton who had been our pastor for eighteen months, having resigned and gone to Ellensburg, Washington, the church has called Zach A. Harris, of Ft. Wayne, Ind., who has accepted the call and will be on the ground for service May 1. Our church is out of debt all round, and we commence the new partnership with a fair prospect for increased influence in this community.—JOS. W. HALL.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Philadelphia.—The annual report of the First church shows that $8,128.97 was raised for all purposes. Of this amount $938.75 was given for missions and $800 was paid upon the mortgage indebtedness. The year was closed with all debts paid and a balance of $27.03 in the treasury. At a recent meeting of the board it was decided to employ a pastoral helper to assist in the extension of the work. A series of special meetings was held Easter week, the pastor preaching, which resulted in 14 accessions. A home missionary rally was held in the church April 6. In the evening Bro. Z. T. Sweeney spoke to two hundred of the Disciples of the city on "American Civilization."

TEXAS.

Cleburne, April 11.—Two splendid additions to the church yesterday by statement.—J. G. CREASON.

Houston, April 16.—There were four confessions at Sabinal last Sunday and two accessions the visit before; one man 72 years old by baptism. I could assist some church in a meeting beginning the third Sunday in May.—E. W. BRICKERT.

WISCONSIN.

Milwaukee, April 12.—Six added since my last report. Work continues to prosper.—C. M. KREIDLER.

WYOMING.

Sheridan, April 11.—Two additions, both by letter. Our Bible-school's first offering for our Benevolent Association was $15.35.—F. E. BLANCHARD.

To-Day.

Upon John Ruskin's writing desk
A slab of chalcedony lay,
And on it, cut in careful script,
The word "To-day."

Honored of all, a wondrous man,
And held a prophet in his way,
He let "To-morrow" bide its time
And used "To-day."

Upon the tablet of the will
How good to write, the selfsame way,
Putting to-morrow's uses by,
The word "To-day!"

—Harriet Prescott Spofford.

Ministers' Boys.

Are you the son of a minister or are some of your boy friends sons of ministers?

It is a common saying that ministers' sons turn out badly. Well, don't you believe it. There is a noted French scientist who has studied into this subject, and he has a long list of names to prove that the sons of ministers make up the larger number of the world's great men. Here, for instance, are some of the names:

Agassiz, Hallam, Jonathan Edwards, Whatley, Parkham, Bancroft, the Wesleys, Beechers and Spurgeons, Cowper, Coleridge, Tennyson, Lowell, Holmes, Emerson, Charles Kingsley, Matthew Arnold, Dean Stanley, Macaulay, Thackeray, Sir Christopher Wren, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Swift, Sterne, Hazlitt, Presidents Cleveland and Arthur, Peter Stuyvesant, Adoniram Judson, Timothy Dwight, Henry Clay, FitzGreene Halleck, Morse the inventor, Justices Field and Brewer, United States Senator Dolliver, of Iowa, and many others in the Senate.

Forty Dollars Worth of Temper.

Whoever wishes to hear a solemn, almost tearful, oration on the evils of losing one's temper should apply to a certain scientific gentleman in Washington, of whom the Star tells a tragic story.

He had a negro servant who exasperated him by his stupidity. One day, when he was more stupid than usual, the angry master of the house threw a book at his head. The negro ducked and the book flew out of the window.

"Now, go and pick that book up!" ordered the master. The negro started to obey, but a passerby had saved him the trouble, and had walked off with the book. The scientist thereupon began to wonder what book he had thrown away, and to his horror discovered it was a quaint and rare little volume on mathematics which he had purchased in London, and paid $50 for it.

"The next time that I feel that it is absolutely necessary to throw things," he exclaimed in his sorrow, "I'll choose something less expensive than a favorite book."

But his troubles were not over. The weeks went by, and time, the great healer, had begun to assuage his grief, when, strolling into a second-hand book shop, he perceived to his great delight a copy of the book he had lost. He asked the price.

guarantee perfect digestion, no matter what the condition of the stomach is. The reason is plain. They themselves digest the food and permit the stomach to rest and get well.

ALL DRUGGISTS, 50 CENTS A BOX.

"Well," said the dealer, reflectively, "I guess we can let you have it for $40. It's a pretty rare book, and I dare say I could get $75 for it by holding on a while."

The man of science pulled out his wallet and produced the money, delighted at the opportunity of replacing his lost treasure. When he reached home he sat down at the table to gloat over his find, and a card dropped out of the leaves. The card was his own, and further examination showed that he had bought back his own property.

"Forty dollars' worth of temper! Huh, I think I shall mend my ways!" he was overheard to say. His daughter, who tells the story with glee, declares that the negro servant is positively worried over the sunny disposition of her father. He feels that the worthy man must be ill.—Youth's Companion.

Coining.

Night and day the money-making presses of the Philadelphia mint continue to turn out gold at the rate of nearly $1,000,000 every twenty-four hours. Nothing else is being done. Not a silver coin is being handled. The order of the Government is for $100,000,000. The San Francisco mint is expected to furnish one-half of the amount. The new money is to be put in reserve for gold notes issued under an act of July 12, 1882. These have been getting very scarce within the last six months; banks have been running short of them. All hands are working over-time in the melting and refining-rooms and the assay department. The big task will not be finished for several weeks yet. It was begun about the first of last month. When the $100,000,000 has been manufactured the gold notes in denominations running from $20 to $10,000 will be cancelled by the Treasury Department. Meanwhile, the presses will not cease operations until the last dollar called for is coined.

Bishop Mallalieu, of the Methodist Church, always advocated paying better salaries to ministers. He told once of a capital young fellow, hopeful and happy in his pastorate in spite of the small pay. He had lost sight of him for twelve or fifteen years, when suddenly he met him in Boston, looking prosperous.

"What church are you in?" asked the bishop.

"Oh," he said regretfully, "no church—the wholesale hat business."

"Why did you leave the church?"

"For seven reasons."

"What were they?" asked the bishop.

"One wife and six children."

THE TRANSPORTATION BUILDING AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

The Transportation building of the World's Fair covers over 15 acres. The facades show a most pleasing adaptation of the French renaissance. On the east and west fronts are three magnificent arches which embrace more than half of the entire facade.

Each of the arched openings is 64 feet wide and 52 feet high. Through the archway 14 permanent railroad tracks will be laid.

The statuary is happily placed in front and at the base of the main piers at the sides of the grand openings.

This affords 16 groups which will illustrate transportation in all its phases as well as the progress made by the United States in this science. There will also be four groups of statuary surrounding the four pylons placed at the east and west fronts.

Queer Japanese Customs.

Japan is a queer country; it is a land of contradictions and inversions. We prefer sweet fruit, and they sour; they make saucepans of paper; we weep at misfortunes, they laugh; we think white teeth beautiful, Japanese ladies varnish their teeth black; they put on the roof of a house first, and build the walls up afterward; their carpenters draw the plane toward them; their horses' shoes are of straw; their tailors, in stitching, point the needle from them; in their locks their key turns from left to right. Old men in Japan fly kites and spin tops, while children look on; Japanese writers use painting brushes, not pens, and write from bottom to top, and from right to left; in Japan there are no lawyers, and Japanese doctors never make any charges or send in any bills; our mourning garments are black, theirs white; and they mount a horse on the off side.

A New Heart.

"Mamma," said Blossom, "how will God get my new heart in?"

"My darling, what do you mean?"

"Why, my verse mamma; don't you know? 'A new heart will I give you.' How will he get it out, this one that I've got, and put the other in?"

"Dear little Blossom, it is not your heart that you hear beating that God means; it is the part of you that thinks and loves people, or that hates anything. That is what God promises to change. When God says he will give you a new heart, it means that he will make you love things that you didn't love before, and not want to do naughty things any more."

"Oh," said Blossom, "I see how it is—it's my think that God is going to make new."

Bishop Dudley, of Kentucky, who has just died, and who had many warm friends in Boston, used to delight in a story of a colored girl in his church.

"Supposing," he asked her, "that you were walking along the road and saw a low hanging branch, and on that low branch was a nice fat chicken. What would you do?"

"Don't ask me that question, boss," she begged.

"Oh, yes, tell me, what would you do?"

"Well, boss, you know I've only an infant in de kingdom."

Which ended the conversation.—The Boston Record.

Children's Children.

John D. Crimmins, a prominent New Yorker, is never more delightful than when telling anecdotes of children.

"A little girl of seven," Mr. Crimmins said one day, "came to me after church on a Sunday morning and asked: 'Have I any children?'"

"I dropped my newspaper and regarded her with amazement.

"What?" I said.

"Have I any children?" she repeated.

"Well, I should hope not!" I exclaimed. "Why on earth do you ask me such a question as that?"

"Why, in church this morning," said the little girl, "the clergyman preached about children's children, and I wondered if I had any."

CHAPTER VIII.

George was strengthened by his conversation with Mr. Halway; not that the old gentleman had announced any new truths, but he had given expression to what the young man had only vaguely felt. It was his purpose henceforth to fight his battle against privations without making the combat more difficult with the burden of vain regrets. It was hard to give up his old friends, or rather, to have them give him up. But after all, the struggle for recognition must be made between oneself and circumstances; he must make up his mind to stand alone. He found life easier after reaching this resolution. Diligent in his work, faithful to every trust committed to him by his employer, he no longer cast wistful glances at the Greer home as he drove past; he no longer half hoped Linnie Greer would wave to him, or give him a kindly greeting from the sidewalk. As he saw her in the distance, bright and sparkling, laughing with her school-friends, no bitterness pricked at his heart. A cloud did not fall upon his brow when he met Flora Stoner and she pretended to be attracted by an object on the other side of the road. With all the intensity of his will, he had resolved to accept the consequences of his lowly position, and cease expending any of his energies in vain revolt.

In the meantime he was pursuing his self-education. Never swerving from his purpose of becoming a physician, he devoted his spare moments to study. It was only after the day's work, or before the early hour of hurrying to the store, that he could call time his own. Mr. Stoner would not have tolerated a book in his hands during business hours. At first it had been hard to apply himself to study after his day of labor, and still harder to rise before day and bring his faculties to bear upon their task. But after relentlessly dragging his body out of bed, while his mind was still half asleep, it became easier to form the habit. He allowed himself only six hours of sleep. His open-air life in the delivery-wagon kept him strong and well, yet gradually there was a change in his appearance, a change hardly to be defined. He became graver, more self-reliant, more self-centered. His ambitions and the poverty that made their attainment difficult, gave him an air of maturity. He seemed several years older than Spot. Gradually his former companions ceased to hail him facetiously with "Hello, Wheels!" or "Hi, Poll!" or to ask him if he had lost his green umbrella.

His life was not unhappy, though it lacked the sunshine that warms the eyes of friends. He sent all the money he could spare to his father, and at last began to grow a little uneasy about the amount he had lent Spot, since that youth was still unable to cancel the debt. Letters from Florida told him that his father's health was about the same, which meant in a condition serious enough to necessitate his remaining with his sister. Mr. Clayton had been unable to get work for his son in Florida, but still hoped to find an opening that would enable them to live together once more.

As Spot was now in the high school, George did not see much of him. Sometimes his employer's son sat up after bedtime, reading a dime novel while George studied Latin. In a corner of the meagerly furnished room was a stack of sensational paper-back novels, each bearing upon its cover a crude picture executed with considerable dash and spirit. Spot was devoted to this class of reading,—the "sans culotte" of literature,—but he usually took his novel to the home of a friend, because his own room was so cheerless. It had never been Mrs. Stoner's philosophy that her son should care for his own room. For this reason there was no stove. As autumn came with its chilly nights, George would put on his overcoat before sitting down to Latin. The Stoner family appeared to live in luxury, but the extravagance in the front of the house was atoned for in the rear. No one in Burr City dressed more richly than the mistress, and no girl in "the set" spent more upon her clothes than Flora; but perhaps no family dined more frugally; and George often left the kitchen table filled rather with awe from Mrs. Binitzer's relentless eye, than with victuals. Nor did Mrs. Stoner show a useless waste in the matter of her wardrobe. When not upon parade she attired herself in wrappers, and kept herself from the sight of man. During these periods of wardrobe-economy, company rang the door-bell in vain. It mattered not that Mrs. Stoner knew the visitor was aware of her being at home. She would rather make an enemy than appear without one essential pin or fold. It was in the non-essentials of life that the family were profuse. Rigid economy in its essentials, in those features which are not presented to the public,—in its beefsteak and fuel,—reconciled Mr. Stoner to expenditures in other directions. For example: the grocer consented to the purchase of a handsome stove for the parlor, because he knew it would seldom contain fire. Mr. Stoner called himself a careful man of business. He was, in fact, a miser.

Spot often carried away a pocket-full of detective stories for the delight of his companions, returning about midnight enveloped in an atmosphere of tobacco. One night in October as George sat in his overcoat bravely fighting one of Cæsar's battles, Spot entered the poorly-furnished bedroom. It was only half-past nine, and George, supposing the other intended to remain at home and associate with pirates under his own electric light, did not look up.

"Look here, George,—say!" said Spot, sitting astride of a chair, and settling his hat over one eye. "You've got 'way over in that book,—farther than my class. I wish I was your sort.

I believe you'll beat me in the race yet, although you've got a check rein on you. But I can't help it. I'm Spot Cash Stoner. I wish I'd lived up to my name. I'm in awful trouble."

"I can't lend you any more, Spot," said George. "I have told you that father lost everything he had, and I must send him money, and not let him feel that he's living on charity. You know how little I make, and there just isn't a dollar to spare."

"Now, I never dreamed of trying to borrow from you," said Spot reproachfully. "Can't I discuss my troubles with you without exciting suspicions like that?"

"Oh, excuse me," said the other, closing his Cæsar, but keeping his finger at the page. He was about to add that borrowing had been the inevitable result of Spot's former discussions, but the sight of the handsome, bright face drove away every slighting thought.

"Old fellow," said Spot. George warmed toward him at the friendly tone. Spot left the chair to stand before the mirror. "Say, George, do I

A MILLION FROM A MILLION LEAVES A MILLION MORE.

That is to say, a million dollars from a million disciples for Home Missions would not impoverish, but enrich. Every heart would be rich toward God. Every contributor would be confident of treasure laid up in heaven. The cause of Christ would be set forward a decade. We ought to average one dollar a member for Home Missions.

We are asking for only $200,000 this year to answer the appeals which already amount to double our spendable income of last year.

seem a little pale, a little thinner than usual? The awful strain I've been under is enough to wear out some men."

"I haven't noticed any change," said George.

Spot stared at his reflection and pulled his hair down over the middle of his forehead. "Yes, I bear up remarkably well," he said, a little discontented. "George, I've come to you for help. I trust you as I never trusted another man. Put up that Latin. I want you to go with me."

"Where?" asked the student.

Spot began to make a cigarette. "My boy," he said, looking down upon his companion, and spreading his legs judiciously, "don't ask any questions. I'll tell you everything I can reveal. It's necessary for me to go two nights in the week to a certain old tumbled-down cattle-shed out in the woods—where I'm going to take you in a few minutes."

"Oh, thank you!" said George doubtfully.

Spot laughed. "Now, my son, there are no cattle there to horn you. But how can I laugh? This is a serious matter—two nights every week. It's about five miles from town, in an awful lonely place. I ride one of ma's horses. But mark you, lad, I am supposed to walk there. So I dismount in a quiet nook, when near the shed, and finish the journey on foot. After reaching the shed, I enter and light an old lantern which you will find in an inverted barrel in the northeast corner."

"I do not intend to enter this shed," said George with decision.

"You light the lantern," continued Spot, lighting his cigarette and inhaling the smoke, "and set it where its light may be seen from without." He held up the cigarette as an illustration. "Then from out that barrel you take a greasy old blank book. On one page my name is written several times, with the date after it, like a hotel register. Every time I make my nocturnal visits, I must write my name and the date on that page. After this is done, I blow out the lantern, put it and the blank book back in the barrel, and come away. That is all."

"Why do you go?" inquired George.

"If I do not go twice a week, I am ruined—that's all. But isn't it enough? I can't explain further. But isn't it enough? I am simply ruined if I don't go!"

"Very well," said George, who did not like this mystery, "then go!"

"Exactly," responded Spot. "Come on."

"Not I, Spot. I don't like it, and I shall go on with my lesson. I don't think Latin very interesting, but I prefer it to cattle-barns. Spot, I am losing some useful time, old fellow. Tell me about it to-morrow."

Spot again placed himself astride of the chair, with his elbows on the back.

"Look here, George; now I'm pretty patient, don't you think I am?"

"So am I," replied the other, opening his book.

"You've nothing else to do but be patient," returned Spot Stoner. "I'll finish my tale. You know Jim Greer has taken the typhoid fever. It's lucky you have had it, for I spent night before last with him, up to twelve o'clock, reading. It's very likely that I'll take it. As you had it last spring, you're safe. Now do you see the connection? If I get sick, I can't go to that cattle-barn. You will have to go for me, and sign my name and the date of your going."

"Forgery!" said George.

"No," interposed Spot, "you don't imitate my handwriting. There's no intention of deceiving anybody. All that's required is that my name be written there twice a week; it doesn't matter who writes it. You are the only man I can trust with my secret."

"But you haven't trusted me with it," said George. "Why must your name be written there?"

"Because if it is not—I speak to you upon my honor, George—I am ruined."

"But how can such a foolish performance as that keep you from being ruined?"

Spot shook his head gravely.

"Who has demanded such an unreasonable service?"

Again Spot shook his head and smoked with the air of a bandit.

"Spot, you never seem really in earnest. Are you joking?"

"George Clayton," said Spot, impressively pointing his cigarette at the other, "it's not a matter of life and death, but upon my word as a gentleman, it's a question of my honor. And if my name fails to appear on the cattle-shed register, there will be a disclosure that will cause me to run away from home; it will bring a cloud upon my parents, and poor little Floy would never hold up her head again."

George felt a thrill of intense and painful excitement. "Oh, Spot!" he cried out, turning white, "what have you done?"

"Whatever is done, is done," responded Spot gloomily. "The past is gone; it belongs to us no more. We are concerned with the future. I have lived, I have enjoyed. I have been a man of the world. The consequence: cattle-barn; blank book; lantern."

"And how long must you keep writing your name in that blank book?"

"Until I can compass, in some manner, the sum of five hundred dollars."

"Oh, Spot!" George exclaimed in horror.

"Just so, George. That is what I often say to myself. There is nothing else to say. Now, old boy, you understand why I want you to go with me to-night; it is to show you the way. I'll never ask you to take the trip again, unless I am too ill to go. In that case you'll help me out, I know. And if I don't show you the road while I'm in proper trim, you couldn't go right. For the main road is not the thing. If I walked as I was ordered—mark you, George! I am ordered; thus have I fallen beneath a tyrant's thumb!—if I walked, I should take the main road. But as I steal a march upon the enemy by riding, I must slip along a hidden way to the rendezvous."

Quickly cured to stay cured by the masterly power of Drake's Palmetto Wine. Invalids no longer suffer from this dread malady, because this remarkable remedy cures absolutely every form of stomach trouble. It is a cure for the whole world of stomach weakness and constipation, as well as a regulator of the kidneys and liver. Only one dose a day, and a cure begins with the first dose. No matter how long or how much you have suffered you are certain of a cure with one small dose a day of Drake's Palmetto Wine, and to convince you of this fact The Drake Formula Co., 758 Drake Bldg., Chicago, Ill., will send a test bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine free and prepaid to every reader of Christian-Evangelist who desires to make a thorough test of this splendid tonic Palmetto remedy.

READ WHAT OTHER PEOPLE SAY OF DRAKE'S PALMETTO WINE:

J. W. MOORE, Monticello, Minn., writes: "Four bottles of Drake's Palmetto Wine has cured me of Catarrh of Bladder and Kidney Trouble. I suffered ten years and spent hundreds of dollars with the best doctors and specialists and got no benefit. I am a well man again and cannot thank you enough. I have recommended Drake's Palmetto Wine to nine persons who are now taking it with good results. One young woman in Monticello was given up to die with Bladder Trouble by a Minneapolis specialist, and he and our local doctor said they could do no more for her. Her father got a bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine, and she has now taken it a week and is rapidly recovering. I write this out of gratitude to you, and you are at liberty to publish it if you wish to."

J. W. BROWN, Kasbeer, Ill., writes: "I had Stomach Trouble 25 years. Had vomiting spells and threw up pus and blood, and would get so weak I could not walk. I was that way when I received your trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine, and had given up hope of ever getting any relief at all. I used the trial bottle, got four large bottles and used them. I am glad to say my stomach is all right and I feel like a new man. You don't know how a person suffers when afflicted as I was, nor what a relief is experienced when cured."

JAMES G. GRAY, Gibson, Mo., writes about Drake's Palmetto Wine as follows: "I live in the Missouri swamps in Dunklin county and have been sick with Malarial fever, and for fifteen months a walking skeleton. One bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine has done me more good than all the medicine I have taken in that fifteen months. I am buying two more bottles to stay cured. Drake's Palmetto Wine is the best medicine and tonic for Malarial, Kidney and Liver ailments I ever used or heard of. I feel well now after using one bottle."

A. A. FELDING, Knoxville, Tenn., writes: "I had a bad case of Sour Stomach and Indigestion. I could eat so little that I was 'falling to bones,' and could not sleep nor attend to business. I used the trial bottle and two large seventy-five-cent bottles and can truthfully say I am entirely cured. I have advised many to write for a free trial bottle."

JAMES MCCARTHY, 149 Breckinridge Street, Detroit, Mich., writes: "I purchased at the drug store a bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine, and find it unsurpassed for kidney trouble, and I am sure it will do all you claim for other complaints. I am recommending it to my friends, and wish you every success for your wonderful medicine."

SQUIRE CLARDY, "The Arlington," Hot Springs, Ark., writes: "After using Drake's Palmetto Wine seventeen days I have no sick stomach, and my bowels have become as regular as clockwork, digestion is good once more, and I am gaining in weight. Use this for the good it will do some other sufferer."

MRS. M. E. GIVENS, Jackson, Tenn., writes: "Drake's Palmetto Wine has relieved my stomach. My son's wife, at Mounds, Ill., was having the doctor wash her stomach out, and could eat only graham bread and drink sweet milk. After taking your Wine can eat anything she wants without hurting her."

A Free trial bottle alone has brought health and vigor to many, so you owe it to yourself to prove what it will do in your case. Write this very day.

MRS. MYRA MONTI, Geneva, Wis., writes: I cannot tell you how much good Drake's Palmetto Wine has done me. It is the very best that was ever invented. If I could have had it long ago I might have been saved years of suffering. My stomach and bowels were in [dreadful] condition. I would have sinking spells, and my bowels would discharge a hot, slimy substance; would feel so bad I wished I might die. Your Palmetto Wine has stopped that feeling, and I do not have sinking spells. My bowels are not quite well, but, oh, so much better. I truly thank God for the blessing—for a blessing it was to me. I am truly thankful to you, and remain your very grateful friend."

D. MOORE, Geneva, N. Y., writes: "Obtained a bottle of your Drake's Palmetto Wine of our druggist: My wife is deriving much benefit from the Wine for obstinate constipation—indeed the most she has received from any and all other medicines. I also am helped of kidney difficulty. We regard it as an excellent remedy. It has no defects or drawbacks. It does its work quietly, kindly and sweetly, and leaves no evil effects. We take pleasure in speaking of it to others. I went a few days ago to see a sick brother, and took a bottle along, hoping it might benefit him. I am a retired minister of the gospel and 92 years old."

MRS. DANIEL W. NEWTON, Greenfield, Mass., writes: "Mrs. Mary Reese, 74 years of age, has been ill with stomach trouble over a year, and for three months was in very serious condition. I gave her the trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine you sent me, and it gave her great relief. Then she purchased a bottle, and has taken two-thirds of it, and walks a mile every day; can eat anything without any distress; has fine appetite and bowels are regular and thorough."

MRS. SUE A. MAY, Luverne, Ala., writes: "I am the mother of eight children, and have been in bad health ever since I was married. I had been sick in bed for three months—had physicians every day—when I received your Drake's Palmetto Wine. After taking it for two weeks was able to be up and attend to my work. It is truly a splendid remedy. I will always thank you and my God for such relief."

MISS FLORENCE GORDON, Braymer, Mo., writes: "I have for several years been troubled with catarrh of the head and throat, until my voice, which was at one time beautiful, was almost ruined. Had sneezing spells which lasted sometimes for two days. Since beginning the use of Drake's Palmetto Wine have not had even a slight attack, and feel sure I am cured."

AURVIL MOODY, Orangeburg, S. C., writes: "After taking your sample bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine I felt a sudden change in my feelings. God bless you in your work. It has done me so much good I am telling it to other suffering people. I only wish every sufferer in the land knew of Drake's Palmetto Wine."

M. T. LANE, Glencoe, Ill., writes: "I have lived in Florida several years, and knew from experience the value of Palmetto fruit. Drake's Palmetto Wine has the real taste and result of palmetto. In extreme constipation it relieves without griping and cures."

We give you absolutely free a trial bottle to test this wonderful tonic Palmetto medicine. It is a boon to disease-laden, pain-ridden men and women.

OUR Government has its legislative, judicial and executive departments, to enact, interpret and enforce the laws of the nation. It has its army and its navy which stand for domestic order and national safety. It has its flag, the emblem of its national sovereignty and power, which is honored and respected the world over. It has its galaxy of free states or commonwealths, self-governing and yet each owning allegiance to a common constitution. And yet behind the Government's flag and Constitution, behind Congress, the Supreme Court and the President, behind the army and the navy, the forts and the arsenals—the source of all, the foundation of all—is the revelation of God in Christ Jesus, recorded in the Holy Scriptures. All free governments and free constitutions derive their liberty and their ideas of the rights of men from the Man of Galilee. To preach His gospel and to hold up His divine ideals of life and duty, is alike the highest act of Patriotism and of Religion. This is the supreme duty and opportunity presented to us in the May Offering for the Evangelization of America.

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumphs speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

A Confidential Letter.

Punkin Center, Jan. 19, 1904.

Our church here is in need of a pastor. Can you send us a man? We can pay a salary of $325 84. Any man who wants the place may write to Cymbing Seed Johnsing, clerk of the session, on the subject. The preacher must be a big-hearted, whole-souled fellow, with unlimited energy, attractive in the pulpit, unselfish, well educated, highly cultured, merry mannered, and, if married, possessed of an humble, submissive wife. An unmarried man is preferred, however. Paul was something of the type of man we want, except as to personal appearance. We want an Apollo in looks, a Jupiter in strength, and a Minerva in wisdom; a regular walking encyclopedia, with good average capacity for working miracles, ready to be stoned or made a scapegoat of, as occasion may require—one who can teach the women, interest the children, confound the wise (of other sects), pick up sticks, play the piano and guitar, earn his "pin money" as a lightning rod or patent churn agent, weep with us in our sorrows, and keep an evergreen smile on his face; when we leave him out of our joys; one who can go through fire and flood for the good of others without expecting that they will in any way in erest themselves in his personal welfare, and one who, in a general way, can lead a forlorn hope of despondent followers, and always be at his best in the family that has sent out of the neighborhood for a "big preacher" to marry John Henry and Sallie Ann. Correspondents will enclose postage for reply.—Exchange.

Let no man talk of freedom until he is sure he can govern himself.—Goethe.

Current Events

The house of representatives, by a strict party vote, has passed the bills for the admission of four territories as two states. Oklahoma and Indian territories are to form the state of Oklahoma, and New Mexico and Arizona territories will together be known as the state of Arizona. The senate will not take action until next session. In these cases again party politics has played a great part. The disturbance of the balance of power and not the question whether the territories were ripe for statehood has been the chief consideration of the politicians. Together the new states will have four senators and seven representatives, and just what their political complexion may be is doubtful, and we do not particularly care.

The Bible may be read in the public schools of Kansas. The supreme court of the state has so decided. In nearly every Kansas school it has been customary to read the Bible or repeat the Lord's prayer as an opening exercise. A citizen of Topeka, objecting to this, kept his son from attendance at such exercises, and the boy was suspended. The father brought an action to compel the city board of education to permit his son to re-enter the public schools. The district court refused to order this and the supreme court in affirming the decision—an eminently sane one—says:

"A public school teacher who, for the purpose of quieting the pupils and preparing them for their regular studies, repeats the Lord's prayer and the twenty-third psalm as a morning exercise, without comment or remark, in which none of the pupils is required to participate, is not conducting a form of religious worship or teaching sectarian or religious doctrines."

The essential greatness of man is not questioned by any discoveries of modern science. But a great many people—especially young men—seem to question the greatness of a man who has any religious convictions. To be a member of a Y. M. C. A. is by some people associated with a "goody-goody" spirit or flabbiness of character. But the highest type of bravery was shown by a Y. M. C. A. man the other day, when Morrison, the chief gunner's mate of the "Missouri," dashed through suffocating gases and smoke into the powder magazine, risking his own life, but saving the ship probably from complete destruction. And it may be recalled that the first man to scale the wall of Peking was a devoted Christian member of the army association. The first shot at Manila was fired by a Y. M. C. A. man. Captain Hobson was president of the Annapolis Y. M. C. A. Admiral Uriu was once a member of this association. Christianity does not mean a lack of heroism.

Sometimes we feel it peculiarly disheartening to contemplate the equanimity with which good people accept the laissez faire policy of the worldly element in their midst. The question, "What can you do?" is as a mountain to stop all progress for people who have not the heart to try to find a way over, around or through the mountain. Pessimistic stand-patters are not very lovely people. But those who have the courage to try to accomplish something in the way of betterment in St. Louis may further the efforts of the W. C. T. U. in getting signatures to a petition that is being circulated with the object of enforcing the Sunday closing law. Some people who have these petitions do not seem to be aware of the fact that it is not merely church folk whose signatures are wanted. The idea is to get everyone who is in favor of decreasing drinking opportunities to express his or her desire. It is hoped that all petitions with a large number of signatures may be returned to Miss M. A. Metzger, 1023 Glasgow Ave., by May 8. Any one wishing petitions may be supplied upon application.

The death of the Russian painter of war scenes, Vasili Verestchagin, who went down with the battle-ship Petropavlovsk in the harbor of Port Arthur last week, is a blow to the cause of peace. His brush bore more eloquent testimony to the horrors and brutalities of war than the pen of even the most earnest of our peace advocates. His was the method of the realist. He put upon the canvas the scenes of the battlefield; he painted the wounded and the dying; he showed the grim and ghastly phases of war, which are better known by those who have seen service than by those who depend upon imagination and the tradition of the glories of war. Without moralizing or sermonizing or protesting—for such is the method of the artist—he painted the thing as so unutterably horrible that one could not choose but hate it. What Tolstoy did with the pen and over a wider field, that did Verestchagin with the brush. Von Moltke would not let his soldiers visit an exhibition of Verestchagin's pictures, on the ground that it would cool their ardor for their profession, and Emperor William, who is as keen an advocate of militarism as any one of our time, said that "the painters of pictures like these are our best guarantee against war." Was it a grim jest of fate that the painter should go down with the wreck of one of his country's war vessels? Or was it a fitting crown to his career that he should seal with his death his lifelong testimony to the awfulness of war?

Affairs in Colorado are in a bad tangle, owing to the strike of the coal miners and the steps which have been taken to repress it. Without any general proclamation of martial law, the control of affairs in the strike districts has gotten quite beyond the civil authorities, and the militia under the command of Gen. Sherman Bell has been called upon by Gov. Peabody to preserve order. For many weeks there have been strained relations between the strikers and the militia—as usual in such cases. As a measure ostensibly necessary to the public peace, Charles H. Moyer, president of the Western Federation of Miners, has been taken into custody by the militia. A writ of habeas corpus has been issued by the state supreme court, ordering the governor to produce the person of Moyer before that court. This the governor has refused to do, on the ground that there is a conspiracy to capture the prisoner. The labor leaders, many of whom are assembled in Denver this week to attend the quarterly meeting of the executive committee of the Federation of Labor, are denouncing the governor's act in unmeasured terms. John Mitchell, in particular, has felt justified in departing from his usual conciliatory policy so far as to assert, in a speech to the miners, that Gov. Peabody is "no friend of yours, no friend of government, no friend of law and order. I am against him."

Y. M. C. A.
Heroism.

The truth is that the governor has taken a very serious step in virtually suspending the writ of habeas corpus. The privilege of this writ is one of the bulwarks of free government and the federal constitution guarantees that it shall not be suspended "unless when, in cases of rebellion or insurrection, the public safety may require it." Even then, the suspension has always been held to be a legislative and not a judicial function. Judge Taney decided this point under the United States constitution in 1861 after President Lincoln had suspended the writ in certain districts to facilitate the capture of persons believed to be aiding the cause of secession at that critical time. And the act of Congress in 1863, giving the president the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus at his discretion, was a confirmation of the doctrine that the power resided originally in the legislative branch. The several states have, under their constitutions, the right to suspend the writ, but no state has ever done so except Massachusetts during the Shays' rebellion. Gov. Peabody has therefore taken a very serious step, and one which may involve him in trouble before the last of its consequences has been reached.

The New York Democratic convention was the first really important episode of the presidential campaign on the Democratic side. It resulted in the election of delegates instructed to vote for Judge Parker for the presidential nomination. David B. Hill led the Parker forces and the defeat of the Tammany forces was complete. The most that Tammany asked was that the delegates be sent to the national convention uninstructed, but this proposition was turned down by a vote of 301 to 149. The most skillful cross-examining has not succeeded in wringing from Mr. Murphy, the Tammany leader, a statement of his preference for the nomination since it has become evident that Mr. Cleveland was not to be considered. He held that the platform ought to be agreed upon first and the man found afterward to fit it. Theoretically, this is true. But the New York Democracy, knowing something of the possibility of a stampede in the convention, resulting from momentary enthusiasm over some eloquent speech, thought it safer to name the man first and let the character of the man be some indication of the kind of platform on which he is to stand. The platform adopted by the New York convention declares for doctrines that would be equally appropriate in a Democratic, Republican or Prohibition platform. The real issues are yet to be defined. But so far as New York is concerned, it is committed to the candidate who has been approved by Hill and Cleveland and denounced by Bryan and Hearst.

The Russians have found a new hero in the person of Admiral Skrydloff, who left St. Petersburg last week to take command of the Russian fleet at Port Arthur in place of the late Admiral Makaroff. It is to be noted that so far Russia has had to be content with heroes who are just about to do something, in the absence of the kind who have just done something. The first effect of Skrydloff's appointment is a request from Viceroy Alexieff that he be relieved of his command. It seems that the admiral and the viceroy are immemorial enemies and cannot forget their personal animosities even in the presence of a common foe.

The reports from the front, scanty and unreliable as they are, indicate that the Russians are conducting a forward movement in northern Korea, that they are leaving the flank and rear of their column unprotected, and that a strong Japanese force is attempting a flanking movement. Some of the reports claim that this is a Russian ruse to lead the Japanese on to a big defeat. Perhaps so. But if all of these minor Russian defeats along the Yalu and elsewhere are ruses, Russia will have to get a big victory soon or the fish will not be worth the bait.

Further reports regarding the destruction of the Petropavlovsk entirely dispose of the rumor, which came via St. Petersburg, that it was the result of an accidental explosion and in no sense a Japanese achievement. Admiral Togo's detailed report tells how a part of the Japanese fleet lured Makaroff's squadron out of the harbor and to a distance of about fifteen miles, then gave warning by wireless telegraph to the main body of the fleet thirty miles away to dash for the port and cut off the Russian vessels. The maneuver was unsuccessful, for the Russians got back to port before Togo's vessels could arrive, but in re-entering the harbor Makaroff's flagship struck a mine which the Japanese had placed in the channel the night before.

Another "accident"—and probably a real accident this time—occurred two or three days ago, when a Russian steam launch which was placing mines was blown up, with the loss of twenty lives.

The bargain has been closed by which the United States government becomes the owner of the real estate and all other assets of the Panama canal company. The officers of the company at Paris have executed the legal papers and delivered them to the representatives of our government. Actual possession will be given within a few days, as soon as the stockholders of the company have ratified the action of the officers, and the purchase price, forty million dollars, will then be promptly paid. The long delay is at an end. More than once during the past five years we, in common with all the other editors in the country, have announced that arrangements for the building of the canal had been almost completed and that within a few weeks, or months, the matter would be positively settled. But congress hung fire. The opponents of the canal project were incredibly fertile in excuses for delay. More than once canal legislation which would almost inevitably have been acceptable to a majority of both houses if it could have been brought to a vote, was crowded off of the calendar in the rush of the closing days of a congressional session. Then, when the Panama route seemed definitely abandoned and public opinion seemed to have settled upon the Nicaragua route as the only practicable one, there came the sudden reversion of sentiment and the awakening of interest in Panama which had hitherto been unable to live down the memory of its ancient scandals. Then came the canal legislation authorizing the president to buy and build at Panama; and the treaty which, at the last moment, Colombia refused to ratify. Again the pendulum swung toward Nicaragua but this was checked by revolt and recognition of Panama and the new treaty with that republic giving us all that we had asked of Colombia. The ratification of that treaty gave us rights of quasi-sovereignty over the canal strip for a sum of ten million dollars. The purchase of the assets of the Panama canal company for forty millions gives us property rights over the unfinished ditch, the railroad, the machinery, the buildings, etc. There is no reason now why dirt should not begin to fly as soon as the necessary measures can be taken for the proper sanitation of the canal territory.

We Are "Creed-Bound."

There is many a truth told in jest or in derision. When Christ's enemies said, "He saved others, himself he could not save," they unwittingly proclaimed a great truth. Their words had a meaning they did not dream of. A friend sends us a clipping from a Chicago paper containing a statement by Rev. John Thompson, of the Grace Methodist Episcopal church, which affords a more recent illustration of the same truth. Referring to the late meeting of the Congress of the Disciples of Christ in Chicago, he says:

The "Disciples of Christ" at their convention held in Hyde Park Baptist church expressed themselves, in favor of uniting all Protestant churches. I am in heartiest sympathy with their action and would work with all might to aid any movement in this direction, and so would thousands of ministers and tens of thousands of church members. Probably the two greatest barriers in the way are the conflicting views on "modes of baptism" and the theory of apostolic succession. What broad-minded man does not deplore the cleavage which "modes" of baptism have caused? To fight for a particular "mode of baptism" is to be pitifully creed-bound while professing to be creedless.

Attention is called to the last sentence in the foregoing statement, concerning which it is pertinent to remark, first of all, that the Disciples of Christ have no contention among themselves or with others about any "particular mode of baptism." Whether it agrees with us or not, the religious world ought, by this time, to know what our contention is as respects baptism, and to understand that it is not a "mode" for which we are contending, but the divine ordinance itself. We believe that the word baptism, like every other word in the New Testament expressing a divine command, conveyed a clearly-defined meaning to those who originally received it, and that it is within the bounds of present-day scholarship to know what that meaning was, and that knowing it, we ought to obey the command according to the intention of Him who gave it. This position is not difficult to understand, and when understood it becomes very apparent that the people who hold it are not contending for a "particular mode of baptism," but for the integrity of a divine institution.

According to Dr. Thompson, to contend for immersion as the baptism of the New Testament "is to be pitifully creed-bound while professing to be creedless." With two corrections, the above statement may be passed as true. We would strike out the word "pitifully" as being painfully out of place as descriptive of the sense of moral obligation to obey Christ, and we would also omit the clause, "while professing to be creedless"—a statement which does not apply to the people to whom he refers. The Disciples of Christ do not claim to be "creedless." They have a very definite and authoritative creed, concerning which Jesus said: "Flesh and blood have not revealed it unto you, but my Father which is in heaven." Not only do we gladly confess that creed—the Messiahship and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ—but we acknowledge that we feel bound by it to recognize the supreme authority of Christ in all matters of religion, and to yield unquestioning obedience to all His clear and explicit commands contained in the New Testament, our only rule of faith and practice. In that respect Dr. Thompson's statement is true; we are "creed-bound." But what is a creed good for if it does not bind those who acknowledge it to whatever is necessarily involved in it?

Christian baptism stands or falls with the authority of Christ. If He has instituted the ordinance, and the signature of His authority is upon it, we dare not reject it or substitute anything in its place. The consensus of unbiased Christian scholarship to-day has but one voice as to the meaning of that symbolic ordinance, which sets forth in its very form, the burial and resurrection of our Lord. Until scholarship gives a different decision we cannot do otherwise, so help us God, than to maintain the ordinance as He gave it to us, and as it was practiced in the apostolic church and for centuries afterwards. Our creed binds us to obey what He commands, to accept what He teaches and to seek to do continually what He would like to have us do. The only way possible to release our consciences from the sense of obligation imposed by this creed to maintain our present teaching and practice as respects baptism, is to show us that Jesus Christ did not command it, or does not require it to-day. Until then, we must remain "creed-bound" to our present position.

Was the Ideal of the Fathers Practicable? *

I.

Much depends upon what we conceive that ideal to have been and how much we mean by the word "practicable." What was the ideal of the men who inaugurated the religious reformation which we are pleading? It was not to establish a new church on a new foundation with new conditions of membership and new principles for the government of its members. It was not to consolidate all of the religious bodies of Christendom into one large ecclesiasticism after the manner of the Roman Catholic or the Anglican church. It would be easy to declare such an ideal as either of those impracticable and undesirable. The ideal of our fathers seems to have been rather to restore the original unity of the church, that which existed before the rise of Roman Catholicism and before the era of denominationalism. That was a brotherhood of local congregations having a common Lord, a common faith, a common basis of fellowship, a common hope, bound together by the tie of mutual love, and co-operating according to the measure of their ability for the extension of the one church of Christ, of which they were all members, and the triumph of the kingdom of God. It is important to bear this in mind, because uninformed people have pronounced our religious movement as utterly Utopian and impracticable because it was aiming to effect, as they supposed, the consolidation of all denominations into one large denomination, with its ecclesiastical courts and its gradations of officers. This was far from the thought or ideal of our fathers. Their ideal, rather, was that the churches, by virtue of having "one Lord, one faith and one baptism," should constitute "one body," being animated by the one Spirit and one hope, all working together under the power of the immanent God, "who is above all, and through all, and in you all."

In other words, their ideal was to reproduce the New Testament church, not with its actual imperfections in faith, in knowledge and in life, but the ideal church of the New Testament as indicated by the character and commands of Jesus Christ and by the teaching of His inspired apostles. They saw no reason why churches could not be established in the nineteenth century on the same foundation and with the same broad, catholic principles and terms of membership as in the first century. Who is there to-day that will deny this proposition? Is it impossible for us to ascertain with a reasonable degree of certainty what was the faith and the obedience required in New Testament times? This would be to hold the New Testament to be an unintelligible book. But granting that we can ascertain with reasonable certainty just what the New Testament requires in order to membership in the church of Christ, and just what is the New Testament basis of the church, is it desirable that we should conform to this teaching in our procedure to-day in the establishment of churches? This question will be answered in the affirmative readily by all who hold the New Testament to be an authentic and sufficient rule of faith and practice.

There is another question that insists on being asked in this connection. Did our fathers rightly interpret the requirements of the New Testament as to the unity of the body of Christ and as to the basis of that unity? This question, of course, is fundamental. It will not be denied that Jesus prayed for the unity of His disciples, even as He and the Father are one, in order that the world might believe. There are few now, and none perhaps whose judgment commands wide respect, who hold that such a union as Jesus prayed for existed at the beginning of the nineteenth century, or even to-day. There are those, however, who hold that denominationalism is quite consistent with such unity as Jesus prayed for. But even those who hold that view would strip our denominationalism of many of its characteristic qualities and practices in order to a realization of that prayer of our Lord. They would strip it of its sectarian spirit, its self-seeking, its disposition to put party interests above those of the kingdom of God, its exclusiveness, its bigotry and intolerance, and would insist that each denomination should give Christ the pre-eminence, and make the advancement of His cause the supreme object of its existence. But when you have stripped denominationalism of these undesirable and unscriptural characteristics, and practices, and have filled the various religious bodies with the spirit of supreme loyalty to Jesus Christ, there will be little left of our denominational divisions. Nothing will remain to prevent the fullest co-operation in the work of God. It is impossible to promote the co-operation of the different religious bodies without promoting their approach to that unity for which Jesus prayed.

It would seem, therefore, to be impossible to disprove the position taken by the fathers in this reformation, that the New Testament church was built upon the Christhood and divinity of Jesus of Nazareth, and that faith in Him, openly confessed, with the desire and purpose to live a new life, was sufficient to admit the confessor to baptism and to the fellowship of the church; and that this baptism was a burial in and resurrection from the water, symbolizing our Lord's burial and resurrection, and the believer's death to sin and resurrection into newness of life. The bond of fellowship thus formed was to be continued on the sole condition of maintaining a Christian character, under the illuminating and sanctifying power of the word and Spirit of God. This was their ideal as to how churches of Christ should be constituted, and they believed that if all the churches were established on, or made to conform to, this ideal, we should have a united church, in that each local congregation of believers would be in full fellowship with every other local congregation of believers, and there would be no denominational barriers or division walls to hinder their co-operation in the advancement of the kingdom of God.

Our World's Fair Pavilion.

The time has come for a plain word on this subject. Our national convention at Detroit endorsed unanimously a recommendation that we provide a building at the World's Fair to be a headquarters of our brotherhood during the seven months of the fair, and in which our colleges, missionary societies, and other public enterprises should make exhibits, and from which there should go out daily, by free distribution, such tracts as would set forth the principles and objects of our religious movement. Under the instruction of the convention the committee has made its appeal to the public for funds and has proceeded with the construction of the building. The building is approaching completion, but the funds to pay for same are not yet forthcoming. Not only is the amount of pledges short by at least $1,000, but the pledges which have already been made are not all paid, and in a few cases a plea of inability to pay has been entered. We feel that the honor of the brotherhood is involved in this matter, and that every public spirited member among us, having the ability to do so, should send a contribution at once to our treasurer, J. H. Allen, 104 South Main street, for this enterprise. The sum required is very insignificant compared with our ability, and there is no good reason that we can see for any delay on the part of the brethren in contributing the money necessary to finish the building. Of course everyone who became responsible for certain amounts at the Detroit convention is expected to see that the amount is raised and forwarded at once. We hope this word will be sufficient. It is something to be the only religious body represented on the World's Fair grounds in a separate building of its own, and it is an opportunity which we should properly appreciate and of which we should make the best possible use.

Questions and Answers.

I notice that E. S. Ames in the April 14 number of the Christian Century says: "Some people depend upon miracles. I do not deny the miracles, but my faith in Christ does not depend upon them." In your opinion does it not take faith in the miraculous, as it relates to Jesus, to be a believer in Jesus; in other words, is the agnostic attitude concerning miracles compatible with the Christian ministry? If you answer in the affirmative in what way does the position of the Christian Standard miss the mark?

Carrollton, Mo.

E. H. KELLAR.

It is quite possible, we think, for one to be a believer in Jesus, independent of His miracles. It is hardly possible, however, for one to believe in Jesus as He is presented in the New Testament, and deny His miracles. His whole life, including His advent, His sinlessness, His mighty works, His teaching, His triumph over death in His resurrection, is all pitched on the plane of the superhuman and the supernatural. It is one thing to feel that we might believe in Christ without His miracles, having once come into touch with His infinite grace and loveliness, and quite another thing to deny the credibility or reality of such miracles. The former of these is the position of Brother Ames, not the latter. Our esteemed contemporary seems to us to have "missed the mark" in not making this distinction, and in declaring non-fellowship with one who claims to be a believer in Christ, without any fair trial, and without sufficient grounds, and without the action of the church which alone has jurisdiction in the case.

How is it possible for a man representing a brewery and the immoral element in a community, to receive the hearty support of deacons and other prominent members of evangelical churches, as was recently the case in our community? CORRESPONDENT.

The probable reason is that these good people have divorced their political life from their religious life, and imagine that they are two separate and independent departments of life. They probably have yet to understand that the conscience, enlightened and purified by religion, is to guide our action at the ballot box and in the counting room as well as at church. There is no hope of lifting our political life to a higher standard, except as we can get men to put conscience into their political acts.

Editor's Easy Chair.

While down in the country recently, we went to sleep one night beside a small, quiet, prattling stream which ran along playfully in front of our cabin door, and waked in the morning to find a mighty current that would have floated a good-sized steamboat, covering all the valley, and carrying on its turbid, hurrying tide, rafts of driftwood which it had gathered up on its way. Ascending the stream the next day we saw the explanation of the phenomenon. There had been a great downpour of rain during the night over all the country drained by the stream, and there were innumerable rivulets and branches pouring in their contribution from every ravine or valley or depression on either side. It was Nature's lesson in co-operation. A few score rills and rivulets and branches, insignificant in themselves, flowing to a common center make a mighty torrent. We thought of it in connection with our May offering for home missions. Thousands of churches, scattered here and there, many of them poor, many of them in debt, many of them worshipping in halls or rude, temporary structures, and yet each of them giving according to its ability for the evangelization of America, and all these contributions sped on by the earnest prayers of the donors, meeting in a common treasury, will form a reservoir of power that will send out its life-giving streams through all the land. Shall we not witness this splendid phenomenon in our May offering?

Speaking of the country, a short tramp over the hills of the Ozarks shows how busy Nature's resources are just now in renewing the face of the earth. And this work is going on with the same care and diligence in the most obscure and out-of-the-way places as it is in the public parks of the great cities. The soft, velvety young leaves of the hickory are unfolding, the white bloom of the service-tree, the haw and the dogwood, breathe an odor as pure and sweet as that which came from the fabled garden of the Hesperides, and all this exquisite work of Nature is being wrought out where the eye of man would only by chance look upon and admire it. And here Nature teaches another lesson; it says to us, "Do the very best work that is possible to you, with the utmost painstaking care, no matter how obscure the place may be in which you labor." It is not simply the work that is wrought, objectively considered, that is of value, but the very doing of it, if done conscientiously, possesses an educational value for the doer, and perchance for those who may see it. But suppose no human eye other than that of the doer, ever beholds it? Rest assured the great Artist smiles his approval upon every piece of work, honestly, conscientiously and painstakingly wrought.

Has anybody ever done justice to our Missouri birds? If so, will he send us a copy of the work and we will give it extended notice. Do our public schools teach the children enough about the birds and the flowers and the trees and the rocks? In our little stroll through the woods, last week, we noticed wild canaries, flitting hither and thither like beams of sunshine, from tree to tree; the splendid cardinal, not inferior in glory to the Kentucky cardinal; besides others, beautiful in plumage and voice, which we could not even name; and the old familiar notes that all of us have heard along the creek in the springtime, when the haw and the dogwood were blooming. These birds add a great deal to our enjoyment of nature, and seem to get a great deal of enjoyment out of themselves. We ought to know more about them, and do what we can to preserve them from their enemies. At the root of a small tree we found a broken egg, and just above, in a fork of the tree, we found the nest that had been torn by the night's storm and bereft of its treasures. Here was a little tragedy in birdhood. A home was broken up and destroyed, and not without grief and disappointment to its humble owners. But, beyond a doubt, the faithful mates will build another nest and make it more secure. Another lesson here, but it is too obvious to need pointing out.

A brother who has learned that Christianity is life more than anything else, expresses his grief, in a personal letter, that brethren are so punctilious about matters of doctrine, so ready to condemn one who states a doubtful theological position, while they are so indifferent to others whose lives are lax in morals and barren of the fruits of Christian living. But this has been the weakness of humanity through all history. When Jesus, in his conversation with the woman at the well of Samaria, began to probe into the secrets of her life, she at once tried to divert attention by raising a theological question as to the relative merits between Mt. Gerizim and Jerusalem. That question was more interesting to her than the number of her husbands! Who of us has not known those who were quick to discern heresy in a brother's teaching, but exceedingly slow to detect it in their own living? We once wrote to one such critic: "When you pay your honest debts, and behave yourself so that your wife has no room for complaint, your criticisms will receive more consideration in this office." We do not need, perhaps, to lay less emphasis upon sound teaching—though perhaps we need a clearer understanding of what is sound teaching—but we certainly do need to lay more emphasis upon right living, and to be as zealous about the moral and spiritual life of our ministers and others, as about their orthodoxy. The Pharisees of Christ's day were fine illustrations of men who were zealous about hair-splitting distinctions, while their whole moral and spiritual attitude was wrong. We do well, still, to "beware of the leaven of the Pharisees."

Notes and Comments.

"We beseech you, brethren of the press, cease troubling our missionary societies," is the kindly admonition of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and it is very good, as far as it goes. But it overlooks the fact that brethren who are not of the press are doing some thinking on their own account, and are not waiting for the 'brethren of the press' to tell them what to do."—Christian Companion.

Nevertheless it is true, we believe, that "brethren who are not of the press" would never suspect the missionary societies of being responsible for any departures from the faith among us if it were not suggested by the press, even if they should hear of the alleged departures. It is easy to drop a seed of suspicion which may work injurious results to our missionary work, and it was to avoid this that our "kindly admonition" was given.

This is our last chance to stir up the churches on the subject of the May offering. We have had a good many notes of preparation sounding through our columns for weeks and now the time for action has arrived. It is exceedingly desirable both for the sake of the churches and the cause of American evangelization, that every congregation shall be enlisted in this divine enterprise according to the measure of its ability. Likewise and for the same reasons each individual member of every church should make his offering to this work. This is co-operation, it is union in a common work. We are persuaded that if our preachers everywhere will do their duty, the members will not be found wanting to any great extent, but will respond to earnest and loving appeals. Let all the offerings be accompanied with prayer for the blessing of God upon our evangelists who are laboring to evangelize our own beloved country.

The Journal and Messenger devotes an editorial to the address of Prof. G. B. Foster, D. D., of the University of Chicago, delivered at the Congress of the Disciples of Christ. It says that the Professor "brought down upon himself severer criticism than he has been wont to receive from his kind-spirited Baptist brethren." Referring to Prof. Foster's position that religious experience is now somewhat displacing the old argument for the truthfulness of the biblical record, in the new system of apologetics, the Journal and Messenger makes the point, that, valuable as religious experience may be "when in harmony with the word of God and confirmatory of the word of God, it is altogether valueless when in contravention with the word, or when seeking to amend the word." This is so manifestly true that we hardly think Prof. Foster would take issue with it. The issue is as to the apologetic value of religious experience as compared with the old method which sought to prove that the Bible was true. We see no necessity for pitting these two lines of argument against each other, seeing that they are mutually complementary. After all the gospel carries with it, when proclaimed in all its fullness, a self-evidencing power that, in every age, is the highest attestation of its divine character.

Defending a statement made recently in his paper that "the church was not built on Christ personally, but on the great truths concerning Him," the editor of the Christian Companion says: "It would be good rhetoric to say that the Democratic party was founded upon Thomas Jefferson, and no one would get the idea that the party was built upon Mr. Jefferson personally, but on doctrines that he promulgated." But the doctrines which Thomas Jefferson taught are quite independent of his personality, and if he were proved to have been an impostor and traitor instead of a patriot and statesman, it would not affect the party which endorses the principles which he taught. This is not true concerning Jesus Christ. If He be not what He claimed to be, but an impostor, then the church that is built on Him would fall to pieces. It is in this sense that the personality of Jesus enters into the foundation of the church as the personality of no other leader or founder of any religion or party enters into its foundation. We do not, of course, mean the PHYSICAL BODY of Christ when we speak of His person, but His divine character and official position, as the Christ of God. We should say therefore that Jesus Christ Himself, in His divine personality, is the foundation of His church, and that our faith in Him is personal, not doctrinal.

By F. D. Power

We are standing like the sentinel upon the rampart of Orleans. The walls had been breached and shattered. The people had been reduced to the last extremity. The old priest Anianus was praying in their midst. Presently the cry from the ramparts: "I see the rescue of the Lord!" Only a cloud far yonder on the hills. Nearer and nearer it comes. "I see the glistening of the spears! I see the waving of the banners!" The cloud draws near. It is the squadron of Theodoric. The people are saved.

In ten thousand centers to-day this scene is repeated. Needy, straitened, imperiled ones are calling for the rescue of the Lord. Ten thousand squadrons are marching to their relief. With the banner of Prince Immanuel floating on the breeze, they come from every quarter, bringing cheer and succor to them that are without the blessing of the gospel of Christ. All over the land the forces are stirring under the inspiration of the appeal: "Two Hundred Thousand for Home Missions!" Prayers are being said, and men and women shall be saved. Can any church, can any preacher, can any individual member of the body of Christ withhold his hand from this high service for God and home and native land?

So much depends upon the way we meet the demands of the first Lord's day in May. What meaning has our prayer, "Lord, send forth laborers into the harvest," unless we pray with our purses? How can we say, "Thy kingdom come," and ignore the call to extend the kingdom in the east and the west, the north and the south of our great land? What sort of patriotism is that which thinks only of territorial expansion, or military and naval successes, or material wealth and prosperity, or even intellectual greatness for America? George Washington had higher ideals. The true patriot seeks nobler things for the land he loves. America should have the best possible inheritance, and that is the pure gospel of Christ.

Who should give to the May offering? The people. Jesus sat over against the treasury and beheld "how the people cast money into the treasury." All the people. "Let every one of you lay by in store." Rich people and poor. "Many that were rich cast in much, and there came a certain poor widow and she threw in two mites." Both men and women are to give. Some think only of men as givers. Why, then, was Sapphira, as well as Ananias, doomed? No Christian, whether rich or poor, man or woman, boy or girl, can fail of this duty to the cause of Christ and remain guiltless. I once preached for a church where they gave poor people money to give back to the Lord's treasury because they said it educated them in the grace of giving.

What ought we to give to the May offering? "Give," said Christ, "of such things as ye have." "It is accepted according to that a man hath"—money, precious stones, houses and lands. How much profitless wealth people often bear about on their persons! The first thing given for America was a woman's jewels. Isabella pledged her crown and her pearls. Luther said to the costly medal: "What are you doing here? Come out and make yourself useful." Cromwell commanded concerning the silver statues of the apostles in the sanctuary: "Take them down and send them about doing good." Some think if they have no money they are not to give. Land, cattle, bonds, stocks, jewels, produce, farms, corner lots, they are always accumulating, but they never have money, and so are not called to give. "Sell that ye have and give," is good scripture.

How shall we give to the May offering? There are just two ways. One God likes and the other he does not like. "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver." We are to give not grudgingly, that is, in a grumbling, niggardly, reluctant way, but gladly, willingly, hilariously, with a swing and a cheer. "Every man as he purposeth in his heart," not thoughtlessly, carelessly, but with a great purpose; seriously, as Christian men to Christ their Lord; as sacredly as the woman poured out the ointment on the feet of the Master; royally, proudly, as men who esteem it an exalted privilege to share with their brethren all over the land in a high and holy service; generously, as followers of Him who, though He was rich, yet for our sakes became poor that we, through His poverty, might be rich; all together, as a united host.

Why should we give to the May offering? Because the law is "as ye have opportunity," and here is the one great opportunity of the year, presented to all our people, to give to the cause of home missions.

How much shall we give to the May offering? Two hundred thousand is asked; a quarter of a million would be all too little. Taking our membership as a round million of active Christians, this would be just one quarter of a dollar each. What is the Bible rule? "See that ye abound in this grace also." "Abound" is a splendid word. From ab, and unda, a wave; to abound is to flow over and beyond, as wave over wave, to give plentifully, beyond all bounds and apportionments and watchwords. "He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly." "Unto whomsoever much is given, of him much is required." "As God hath prospered."

We are having much trouble with Dives nowadays. One of the biggest questions of the age is, What shall we do with Dives? He is under indictment as a thief. Property, some say, is theft. No sane man believes this, but we do believe that men are stewards, that wealth is fiduciary, that every man is answerable to the command, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy soul, and thy neighbor as thyself," that not the safety of the man, but the safety of the people is the supreme law, that Dives must share with Lazarus in this world if he would have portion with him in the next.

Lazarus can be indicted also. Millions are poor not through any oppression of Dives. Gather up all the money that the working classes have spent for rum in twenty years, and I will build every man a house, and lay out for him a garden, and clothe his wife and children in the best, and give him a generous policy of life insurance. Lazarus might have to give. It was the man with the one talent who buried it. The widow gave two mites. God asks small offerings of the little churches, the humble gifts of those who have but little to give. The appeal is to rich and poor alike.

Why should we give to the May offering? God's honor requires it. Duty demands it. Gratitude prompts it. If it be true, as a member of Congress declares, that this republic is "the hoodlum of the world," and as one of our great metropolitan journals proclaims, that "the decline and fall of Congress may be explained in a single word—commercialism," all the more need of home missions. I went last week to address the Philadelphia C. E. union, which represents 33,000 young people, the largest in the world. In the Baptist temple were 3,000 enthusiastic young men and women pledged for righteousness. The next day, April 19, the 129th anniversary of the battle of Lexington, I stood in the old hall where the continental Congress met, where the Declaration was adopted and signed, where the constitution was adopted and signed, where Washington received his commission, and where the captured flags were brought from Yorktown and presented to Congress, and as I stood among these memorials and gazed upon the old liberty bell, I felt how precious is this land, how we should give ourselves as our fathers before us for its redemption. And we have the means. I strolled into the mint. Forty-two tons of gold were made into coins the past week, a work unparalleled in history. From Feb. 6 to April 16, $60,180,390 have been coined here in $20 gold pieces. Laid side by side in a straight line, these would reach 1,424 miles. We beat the world. Give the Lord his part. "Be a good man, dear!" said Scott to Lockhart, when dying. Be a good man. Have a hand in this offering. Two hundred thousand May first!

The Growth of the Exhibition Idea

By

PAUL MOORE

"Anon, out of the earth a fabric huge, Rose like an exhalation."

John Milton's lines have no reference to international exhibitions, yet they may fitly apply both to the first and to the last great exposition. It was in Hyde Park, London's most fashionable center, that was erected a huge building of iron and glass, where were brought together, for the first time for the purposes of competition, the various productions of the inventive genius and industry of nearly all the nations of the earth.

Hyde Park, where the women carry prayer books on Sunday morning and talk about some other woman's bonnet; Hyde Park, where Pepys loved to be "among the great gallants and ladies"; Hyde Park, where even under the sway of the Puritans the people went "a-maying" and where indeed "much sin was committed by wicked meetings with fiddlers, drunkenness, ribaldry," and where Cromwell's enemies lay in wait to assassinate him. This is the park where men have long , Marched rank and file with drum and ensign," where duels have been fought, and kings have flirted, and which is still the fashionable drive and promenade, as it is the scene of the great mass-meetings of London's starving poor, or of the demonstrations against or in favor of the British government's policy.

The exhibition idea is as old at least as the year of 1756. True, the productions of art and skill that were then and for some years after, collected and displayed in London for the purpose of stimulating public industry and inventiveness, were hardly more than "bazaars," yet so successful were they that the plan was adopted in France, and there continued long after it had been abandoned in England. When the first French revolution was at its height, the Marquis d'Aveze projected an exhibition of tapestry and porcelain as a means of raising funds for relieving the distress then existing among the workers in those trades. And he, like modern exhibition makers, had his trials; for, before he could complete his arrangements, he was denounced and on the very day on which his exhibition was to have been opened, he was compelled to fly from the vengeance of the Directory. But the idea had possessed the public mind, and a few years later, upon his return to Paris, the Marquis resumed his labors, and in 1798, succeeded in opening a national exhibition in the Maison d'Orsay and its grounds. It was entirely successful, and in the same year the French government organized its first official exposition of "national manufacture and the works of industry." Held on the Champ de Mars, around which were built the last two great Paris exhibitions, it was succeeded, three years later, under the consulate of Napoleon, by a second show, when more than two hundred exhibitors competed for the prizes of excellence. The next year a third exposition was held, the number of competitors increasing to upwards of four hundred. So great was the success of these shows that out of them was formed the Societe d'Encouragement, a society to which the working classes of France are largely indebted for their taste for the beautiful in art and for the cultivation of science as a handmaid to industry. The exposition of 1806 was still more successful than its predecessors; for while they had remained open only about a week this one was kept open for twenty-four days, the number of exhibitors arose to nearly one thousand five hundred and nearly every department of French industry was represented. Between 1819 and 1849 seven other expositions were held in France, all restricted to the one country's life and products.

During all this time exhibitions, consisting chiefly of agricultural implements, cattle, and local exhibitions of art and manufacture, had grown up in the large centers of England, and as early as 1829 the Royal Dublin society, possibly from the French sympathies of Ireland during the revolution, adopted the plan of triennial exhibitions. It was immediately after the French exposition of 1844 that a movement began requesting the British government to take up the idea officially. But the government, as usual, proved itself to be simply executive and did nothing. However, the idea of a national exhibition was fostered by the efforts of the Society of Arts, and in 1849, Prince Albert, consort of Victoria, who had devoted himself thoroughly to this object, made the happy suggestion of inviting the whole world to participate. Queen Victoria headed the guarantee fund with a subscription of $5,000, and on May 1, 1851, sixteen months after the issue of the royal commission, the first international exhibition was opened in Hyde Park, London, where that wonderful building, known as the Crystal Palace, made of over four hundred tons of glass and covering over thirteen acres of ground, attracted to itself the people of nearly all nations. It is a curious fact that Paxton's edifice realized in part the conceptions of one of the earliest poetical dreams in the English language. It was Chaucer, who before the year 1400 wrote:

"I dreamt I was
Within a temple made of glass,
In which there were more images
Of gold standing in sundry stages,
In more rich tabernacles,
And with jewells, more pinnacles,
And more curious portraitures,
And quaint manner of figures
Of gold-work than I saw ever.

Then saw I stand on either side
Straight down to the doors wide
From the dais many a pillar
Of metal that shone out full clear.
Then gan I look about and see
That there came ent'ring in the hall,
A right great company withal
And that of sundry regions
Of all kinds of conditions,
That dwell in earth beneath the moon,
Poor and rich.

Such a great congregation
Of folks as I saw roam about,
Some within and some without,
Was never seen or shall be more."

The "well of English undefiled" was a great seer, but he missed it when he wrote those last four words. The Louisiana Purchase was out of his ken.

The "World's Fair"—as it was properly called—was a great success, being open 144 days, having over 17,000 exhibitors, being attended by 6,170,000 people, and showing a profit of $750,000. And yet several times its success was in jeopardy. It was only at the eleventh hour that Paxton's design was accepted, after nearly two hundred and fifty others had been rejected. Then, too, there was an apprehension in some countries that England would reap all the advantages. But they finally came to agree with Lord Carlisle, one of the most enlightened men of his age, that "the promoters of this exhibition were giving a new impulse to civilization, and bestowing an additional reward upon industry, and supplying a fresh guarantee to the amity of nations. Yes, the nations were stirring at their call, but not as the trumpet sounds to battle, they were summoning them to the peaceful field of a nobler competition; not to build the superiority or predominance of one country on the depression and prostration of another, but where all might strive who could do most to embellish, improve and elevate their common humanity."

So obvious were the benefits of this celebrated exhibition that other countries fastened upon the idea themselves, and a great number of exhibitions, both national and international, have been held since 1851. Broadly speaking, they have been but the normal growth from that one conception. They mark the periodical advance in the arts, concepts, manufactures and products of the world. The fullness of their effects is still to be seen, but will not the dwellers within the Louisiana Purchase be ready, with Tennyson, to uplift a multiplied thousand voices,

In this wide hall, with Earth's inventions stored,
And praise th' invisible, universal Lord,
Who lets once more in peace the nations meet,
Where Science, Art and Labor have outpour'd
Their myriad horns of plenty at our feet."

He That Provideth Not For His Own

It might be difficult to find more flagrant manifestations of ill-breeding than are apt to be seen in the average Christian congregation disappointed in its expectation of hearing a favorite preacher, or annoyed at the introduction of an unwelcome subject.

The Rev. James Dale was impressed anew with that fact that morning in the church at Madison. He had watched the people while the pastor went through an obviously perfunctory introduction of "our brother, who is one of our most honored missionaries in the great west." He saw their surprise—evidently the pastor had not prepared them for his coming—perhaps had not dared to. He noted that surprise harden into a resentment that he could feel, as well as see. One woman left the house; a fine looking man directly in front of the pulpit ("Senator Stanton," the pastor had whispered proudly, as he came in) twisted in his seat with an ugly frown on his face, and ostentatiously consulted his watch; while the attitude of the whole congregation said as plainly as words could have done, "Well, we're in for it this time, and we must make the best of it; but you don't catch us this way again!"

All this the young man saw, and it was with a sinking heart that he arose to begin his address. What was the use? What chance had anything that he could say against such apathy, if not antagonism? For a moment he stood in silence, almost determined to give it up, and not attempt to speak at all. Then he gathered up the "notes" he had laid upon the pulpit Bible, placed them in his pocket, slowly buttoned his coat over them, and said:

"I had intended speaking this morning of the great problem of immigration; but I find myself in no mood to discuss it, nor should I judge that you are in proper mood to consider it. I therefore change my plan. My text is 1 Tim. 5:8: 'If any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel,' and my subject is the meanness, narrowness and cruelty of the churches of the eastern part of the United States."

The words were spoken slowly, deliberately, emphatically. Every one had the sting of a whiplash in it. The effect was electrical. No lethargy now. Senator Stanton started forward in his seat as though to speak, his frown of annoyance replaced by a flush of resentment. Some of the people were angry; some looked puzzled; but all were interested.

Mr. Dale waited until the rustle of excitement died away. Then, without allusion to, or explanation of, his strange accusation, he began to speak of the great west, its customs, conditions, needs, perils, life. With skilful hands he drew its picture; showing it not as the hysterical sentimentalist or dyspeptic moralist has painted it all too often, but as a man saw it who had lived in it, felt its pulsing currents, loved it—the west, many of whose faults grow out of its intense vitality and virility, whose lusts are often brutal because its blood is red; the west, that is neither denomiical nor divine, but always and everywhere intensely human. As he spoke, calmly enough, yet with a note of passion in his voice, they seemed to see and feel it all—the swirling of its opposing tides, the half-mad ecstasy of exuberance of life, the delirious sense of freedom from conventional obligations and restraints the almost limitless possibilities of wealth and power, and the ever present and potent temptations which grow out of and are inseparable from such facts and conditions. And more than one hearer in that quiet church moved restlessly, as though he felt the wind from the prairie blowing upon him.

"Into this west," continued the speaker, "your boys are coming. Sometimes you send them, sometimes they come without your sending. If a boy isn't doing well at home, you ship him 'out west' to try his fortune there. If he breaks the law in the east, the west offers him sanctuary under an assumed name. And not these alone, but many of your brainiest and most enterprising sons are coming to be the future leaders of the great states rising beyond the Mississippi. From all parts of the east they come. I am an entire stranger in Madison, and know nothing of your families or your town; but I venture a question: how many boys have gone from here in the last ten years into the region west of the Mississippi?"

It was a home shot. What about it, Deacon Smiley? What is the postmark on the letters that come all too irregularly, Mrs. Tait? Is New Mexico beyond the Mississippi, John Adamson? And why do you hang your head, Senator Stanton? Has he hit you? And are you thinking of Jack—your Jack, wayward Jack—of whose whereabouts you know nothing, except that he is "out west"?

"I used strong words a moment ago," went on Mr. Dale. "Shall I tell you what I meant? When your boys come west you expect the church and the missionary to look after them. Every man who has been on the field a dozen years could make a large volume of the letters he has received begging him to try to help and save the sons, brothers, friends, adrift in that great country. But do you realize at what odds we work? Take any one of our newer towns, for it is of frontier work that I am speaking this morning especially; take my own town for example, for it is fairly representative in every way. It is a little railroad town, the only one of any size in a radius of thirty miles or more. There are saloons and dance halls by the dozen, open all night long, and every night, and ablaze with lights, and gay with music and hilarity. A man need not drink or plunge into vice in them, unless he chooses to; he is greeted with boisterous welcome and show of good fellowship, whether he does or not. Your boy comes into town from the ranch or mine. He is tired in body and in mind, more tired still of the solitude and the lack of companionship characteristic of so much of the work of the west. He wants to get among folks—to touch elbows with his kind. Where shall he go? To church? Well, if he does, and it happens to be a night when the church is open (for remember that there is only one missionary to keep it open, and that he has appointments elsewhere, and that even a missionary must have some time for resting), he finds a small, unattractive, dimly-lighted room, with little that is cheery or homelike about it. There are no books, no games, no music except that of a more or less wheezy organ, nobody to welcome him, except a tired missionary.

"Now I say again, in view of all this, that the course of the churches in the east in withholding or stinting their gifts to home missions is narrow, mean and cruel. I quote against them Paul's word; they are neglecting to provide for their own and are denying the faith. Can you not see—will you not see—that this matter of home missions is literally a home matter? It isn't merely the Pole, or the Swede, or the Chinaman; it is the boy from your own village, from your own family, against whom you shut the door of hope by the withholding of interest and gifts."

Very serious had the listeners grown. With this new light upon them the obnoxious words seemed not so much a gratuitous insult as a valid indictment. They hadn't thought of it so before, but—possibly "providing for their own" meant something more than paying the salaries of the pastor and the quartette choir in Madison.

"I could tell you stories all day long," resumed the speaker, "of how your boys from the east are thrown upon us for help, but I will give you just one. About a year ago we found a young man who had been wounded in a saloon fracas and thrown out to die in an alley. We took him to my house, got the doctor in, washed his wounds and bandaged them and made him as comfortable as possible, though with little hope of saving his life. The doctor said he would probably die before morning. Next morning he was alive, but delirious, and for a fortnight he raved in the madness of fever. We knew nothing at all about him, except the meagre information supplied by one of his companions of the night before, that he was a cowboy on a ranch twenty miles away, and that his name was Jack—he had never heard any other. Singularly enough, in all his delirium the sick man never said a word that could give us any clew to his family or his home. There was no name on his clothing and not a scrap of paper about him by which to identify him. The only thing that even suggested any other life was a locket worn about his neck on a stout cord—a plain gold locket on which was engraved, 'Laddie from Mutterchen,' and containing a picture of a sweet faced lady and a lock of light brown hair."

Had Mr. Dale been looking toward the Stanton pew he would have seen that which would have given pause. The senator had listened with but languid interest; how did this story of a vulgar saloon fight concern him? But at these last words he started violently, the blood rushed to his face, then receded, leaving it pale as marble. That locket! How well he knew it! And the two words—they were their pet names for each other ever since the boy knew his German well enough to call her 'Mutterchen'—

"Little mother!" Thank God! Word from Jack at last—even though such a word! Anything was better than the bitter suspense!

By a strong effort he controlled himself and listened eagerly as Mr. Dale continued the story.

"It was a hard fight, and more than once it seemed that we had lost him, but gradually he pulled up. The worst thing about it was that at first he had no desire to live. 'Better let me go,' he said over and over. 'I've disgraced my family and I shall probably do it again. There's no place for a man like me but a pine box in six feet of earth.' It was hard to make him realize that there was any redemption for him in this world or the next. But when once that idea took hold of him he began to mend rapidly. He had a purpose in life now. It was to square himself and prove himself a man, and then to go home. Where that home was he would not tell me, nor would he divulge his name. 'Time enough for that when there is no stain on the name, and when my coming will not bring shame to the home,' he said. Of course we could not press him, so all the name we know is 'Jack,' or 'Mr. Jack,' as strangers and children call him.

"But if the fight with the fever was hard, it was nothing to that which came afterward when he was able to get about. His convalescence was long and tedious, and it was many weeks before he could do any work; and those weeks were weeks of battle against the devil within and the devils without. Old appetites surged within him; and Satan's servants, in the shape of saloon and dance hall keepers and the like, did their utmost to drag him down to the former manner of living.

Not without some losses was the final victory won; once or twice he went down under the assault, but in each instance turned back in shame and penitence; and for months now he has been living a steady, clean, Christian life. He is employed in a store at fairly good wages, and all his time outside of his business he devotes to the church and its work. We dread to think of the time when he shall leave us; we don't quite see what we shall do without him. But oh, the joy that will be in the eastern home when this prodigal returns from his wandering in 'a far country'!

"And this is the kind of work that your mission stations on the frontier are doing, or trying to do. But often they are handicapped and their efforts seem to go for naught, simply because they are so poorly manned and equipped—because the churches back here do not contribute liberally enough for their support. Now you see the reason for my text and for my first harsh sentence. I meant it to be harsh; I wanted to sting you into attention to what I had to say. I believe that something like this ought to be said. In view of the fact that 'your own' are out there, and that often the only religious influence brought to bear upon them is that of your mission churches, what else can be said of those of you who 'are not interested in home missions,' and whose gifts to the cause are less than the amount you spend for the gratification of the merest whim, and who have never a thought nor a prayer for the men and women who are doing their best to keep your sons and daughters from going down the ways of destruction? I leave you with the text and the text with you." And he closed the Bible and sat down.

It was a surprise to the pastor when Senator Stanton came to the pulpit directly after the service was over and insisted upon carrying Mr. Dale off to dinner; even offering to send him in his own carriage to East Madison for his evening appointment.

"Well, well!" said the minister to his wife on the way home. "Wonder what struck the senator this morning? Never knew him to take much interest in home missions or missionaries before."

It was a day of surprises. The evening service of the Madison church was the old-fashioned "prayer and conference meeting," and was usually attended by but a faithful few. Senator Stanton never came. He belonged to the great and growing order of Sunday Once-ers (may their tribe decrease) whose business of worship and service on the Lord's day is done up in coming to church once, leaving the burden and the responsibility for the evening meeting to rest upon the pastor and a handful of men and women who have somewhat better learned the meaning of the great word "obligation." But Senator Stanton was present to-night with Mrs. Stanton, who was something of an invalid, and rarely left home.

Scarcely had the meeting been "thrown open" when the senator was on his feet. "Friends," he began, "I have a confession to make. I've been converted. It's on this matter of home missions. As some of you know, I have never taken much interest in the subject; never thought much about it, in fact. Of course somebody ought to carry on the work, and I supposed somebody would. It wasn't my business. But I was wrong. It was, and is, my business. I've been converted, as I said, and I see things in a different light. Do you know what converted me? It was Mr. Dale's story of Jack this morning. Did you recognize the story, neighbors? Did you know it was my Jack—our Jack," looking down at the woman softly weeping at his side, "that he was talking about? Oh, we have been proud, wife and I; too proud to let you know our trouble. You supposed we knew all about our son—where he was and what he was doing; but we didn't. Mr. Dale brought us the first news we have had for many a long month. And what news it was! Jack's a saved man, friends! And he's coming home—coming home to his mother and me! And home missions has saved him! Do you wonder that I am converted? And now I want to bring forth fruits meet for repentance.

"I have a proposition to make. My boy isn't the only one out there; there are others who need help. I propose that the Madison church take a hand in this 'caring for her own business' by contributing $600 for the full support of a home mission station for the coming year; and here's my check for half of it."

And he stepped to the platform and laid it on the desk.

A moment's thrilling silence; then Deacon Smiley said, "Put me down for $100." And Mrs. Tait said, with the tears streaming down her cheeks, "I'll give $100." "$50!" "$50!" "$25!" No need to urge; the offerings came so fast that the pastor could hardly keep the record of them.

Then John Duncan said: "Friends, this ain't right. You rich folks are robbin' us poor ones. You all know me, an' how hard it is for me to get along; and prob'ly it'll cost me, an' others like me, more to give $5 than it will the senator to give $300. All the same, he hasn't any right to keep me from the blessedness of givin' what I can. Now, you want $600, an' already more'n that amount is promised. Where do we poor people get into this? Senator, you'll have to cut down your figures. Make it $200 instead of $300, an' let some of the rest of us have a chance."

"Can't do it," smiled the senator; "not a cent less."

"Then there's just one other way,"

A Plea For Utah By T. W. Pinkerton

For a number of years the American Christian missionary society has most generously supported the work of the church in Salt Lake City, and everyone connected with that work is most gratefully thankful. Without this help we could not have lived. The time has arrived, however, when the Home Board must undertake greater things for Utah or give up any hope of being reckoned a religious force in this state.

What are the facts? Utah is rich in its minerals. Millions have already been recovered, and there are millions more in sight. Her valleys are as rich as any in the world. The climate is comparatively mild. We have no extreme cold and no sudden changes. From my window I can see snow eleven months in the year; the summers, therefore, are never extremely hot.

The Presbyterians, Methodists and Congregationalists have churches and schools in many of the towns and villages of the state. The Baptists have a number of churches and the Disciples one. The Presbyterians have twenty-seven schools and academies and expend $40,000 in the state every year in support of their missions and schools. The M. E. church puts $20,000 into their missions and schools yearly. The Congregationalists have seven schools and their boards expend in Utah $17,000 every year. The Baptists are behind somewhat, nevertheless they are giving from $5,000 to $7,000 to the work here. The Disciples of Christ have one church in the state, no schools, and our board is able to give only a few hundred dollars a year for the work. If this be only a land of sage brush, why is it that the denominations spend so much money here, and have been doing so for years?

I am not making the plea that this is the only important field in the world, but I do insist that it receive the attention that its importance demands. If we had the men and money we could establish the cause for which we plead in Ogden and Provo City. We once had an organization in Ogden, but for some reason it failed. I know one man in Provo City who is willing to give five or six hundred dollars in an effort to establish the cause there. The church in Salt Lake City will never be much of a factor in the religious life of the city and state until we have a better house. We are utterly unable to build without aid from without. This is no place for small men. We must have men who are in demand where they are. The church here in the city is doing its best. If you knew all the facts you could not ask it to do more. We have two hundred and forty members, and last year the church gave $100 to home missions, $72 to foreign missions, $10 to church extension and $9 to ministerial aid, met all our obligations here at home and paid interest on a $4,500 debt on the building. The Bible-school gave $60 to foreign missions and $21 to home missions. There are not over ten men in the church who own their own home. I am alone in the state, so far as ministerial help is concerned. If the denominations are able to establish and maintain churches in the towns and villages of this state, we can do so. As I said in the beginning, if we are to become a factor in the religious life of this state the time has arrived when we must move forward.

God's seed will come to God's harvest.

HAS A SAY

The School Principal Talks About Food.

The principal of a high school in a flourishing California city says:

"For 23 years I worked in the school with only short summer vacations. I formed the habit of eating rapidly, masticated poorly which, coupled with my sedentary work, led to indigestion, liver trouble, lame back and rheumatism.

"Upon consulting physicians some doped me with drugs, while others prescribed dieting and sometimes I got temporary relief, other times not. For 12 years I struggled along with this handicap to my work, seldom laid up, but often a burden to myself with lameness and rheumatic pains.

"Two years ago I met an old friend, a physician, who noticed at once my out-of-health condition and who prescribed for me an exclusive diet of Grape-Nuts, milk and fruit.

"I followed his instructions and in two months I felt like a new man, with no more headaches, rheumatism or liver trouble, and from that time to this Grape-Nuts has been my main food for morning and evening meals, am stronger and healthier than I have been for years without a trace of the old troubles.

"Judging from my present vigorous physical and mental state, I tell my people Methuselah may yet have to take second place among the old men, for I feel like I will live a great many more years.

"To all this remarkable change in health I am indebted to my wise friend and Grape-Nuts, and I hope the Postum Company will continue to manufacture this life and health giving food for several centuries yet, until I move to a world where indigestion is unknown." ## Mormonism and Civil Government.

By Jas. W. Darby.

At this time, when the Smoot investigation is fresh in our minds, and while the index finger of religious sentiment is pointing at polygamy as a cloud hovering over our nation and blackening its otherwise fair escutcheon, it is well to take a glimpse of and learn to estimate the size and danger of a principle underlying Mormonism, wherever you find it. I have before me Orson Pratt's works. He says on page 41: "The kingdom of God is an order of government established by divine authority. It is the only legal government that can exist in any part of the universe. All other governments are illegal and unauthorized. God having made all beings and worlds, has the supreme right to govern them by his own laws and by officers of his own appointment. Any people attempting to govern themselves by laws of their own making, and by officers of their own appointment, are in direct rebellion against the kingdom of God."

Let us not be deceived, as many have been, by supposing that the foregoing has no reference to civil governments.

I quote again from page 50: "Among the vast number of national governments now upon the earth, where is there one that even professes to be the kingdom of God, or that its officers were called of God, as was Aaron? Human authority and human calling are the only powers which any nation professes to have."

Immediately following the above quotation we find the following: "But there are certain petty governments called churches, organized within these national governments, which claim divine authority and consider their officers authorized to act in the name of the Lord. But the great question is, have any of them been called as Aaron was?"

Then comes a strong condemnation of Roman Catholic and Protestant bodies because they are not authorized by new revelations, followed by this language: "Nothing is more certain than that the Church of God ceased to exist on the earth when new revelations ceased to be given. All the modern Christian churches who deny new revelation have no more authority to preach, baptize or administer any other ordinance of the gospel than the idolatrous Hindoos have; indeed all their administrations are worse than in vain—they are a solemn mockery in the sight of God. It is a grievous sin in the sight of God for any man to presume to baptize unless God has authorized him by new revelation to baptize in his name."

The Mormons are the only people receiving new revelation as referred to above. Though believing the Old and the New Testament of divine origin, the Brighamite and Josephite look upon their books of doctrines and covenants as the New Testament, showing the new revelations down to date. Mormonism, then, is the church or kingdom of God, and as the so-called man-made governments are all illegal, Mormonism should hold universal dominion. Our civil government should be sent to wreck and ruin and Mormonism established in its stead. Officers of Mormonism are the only ones "called as Aaron was."

Such was the theory of Joseph Smith, the prophet, the founder, when in 1843 he received the polygamous revelation to justify his licentiousness, practiced since before he left Kirtland, O., and defied all civil authority, and sent out his emissaries to advocate his claims to be president of the United States. When will we awake to the enormity of the situation? When will we come to know that there is a venomous c'aw in the great velvet paw? I will close by saying that Orson Pratt was an apostle among the Brighamites, perhaps the ablest of their writers, and truly sets forth the position of Mormonism toward civil government. His writings are still actively circulated.

He That Provideth Not For His Own.

resumed John; "we'll just have to take two mission stations instead of one, for we little fellows must have some share in the blessing; you can't shut us out!"

Ah, why not? In the enthusiasm of the moment the church leaped at the suggestion. "If you'll do it, I'll make my subscription $400," said Senator Stanton.

"Stop a minute," said the pastor. "Let us look at this matter seriously. We do not want to do anything on impulse that we shall be sorry for afterwards. Remember that home missions is not all. There are other objects for which we must contribute during the year; we must not become unsymmetrical and deformed givers; we must stand by every interest of the Lord's kingdom. If we take the amount we are promising from our gifts to foreign missions, or our state work, etc., we are making no advance; we are simply robbing one part of the work to support another. Let us act deliberately and thoughtfully; therefore, let it be understood that no other gift is to be lessened in order that this may be increased. Now we will assume that no pledges have been made, as yet. I will ask Brethren Davis, Stanton, Duncan and Brady to take slips of paper, and give each person present the opportunity of stating the amount that he or she feels able to give for home missions the coming year. I trust that we shall be able to reach the amount named. I hope that we shall have some large gifts; but I shall be disappointed if we do not have many small sums. Let even the children promise their dimes or their pennies. Now let us sing while this work is being done."

When the collectors had footed up their lists it was found that nearly $1,100 had been pledged.

"That is nearly enough," said the pastor; "the rest will come easily from some who are not here to-night, and who ought to have a share in the blessing with us. Now let us sing 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow.'" And they sang it as that much abused hymn is not often sung.

And so it is that the Madison church stands chargeable on the books of the home mission society with the expenses of two of its frontier mission stations. One church, at least, is trying to "provide for its own"—and for others' own.—Rev. J. K. Wilson, D.D., in Baptist Home Missionary Monthly.

CAME FROM COFFEE

A Case Where the Taking of Morphine Began With Coffee.

"For 15 years," says a young Ohio woman; "I was a great sufferer from stomach, heart and liver trouble. For the last 10 years the suffering was terrible; it would be impossible to describe it. During the last three years I had convulsions from which the only relief was the use of morphine.

"I had several physicians, nearly all of whom advised me to stop drinking tea and coffee, but as I could take only liquid foods I felt I could not live without coffee. I continued drinking it until I became almost insane, my mind was affected, while my whole nervous system was a complete wreck. I suffered day and night from thirst and as water would only make me sick I kept on trying different drinks until a friend asked me to try Postum Food Coffee.

"I did so but it was some time before I was benefited by the change, my system was so filled with coffee poison. It was not long, however, before I could eat all kinds of foods and drink all the cold water I wanted and which my system demands. It is now 8 years I have drank nothing but Postum for breakfast and supper and the result has been that in place of being an invalid with my mind affected I am now strong, sturdy, happy and healthy.

"I have a very delicate daughter who has been greatly benefited by drinking Postum, also a strong boy who would rather go without food for his breakfast than his Postum. So much depends on the proper cooking of Postum, for unless it is boiled the proper length of time people will be disappointed in it. Those in the habit of drinking strong coffee should make the Postum very strong at first in order to get a strong coffee taste." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

WATCHFULNESS.—
Luke 12:35-48.

(Temperance Lesson.)

Memory Verses, 1, 2.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when he cometh, shall find watching.

The Ministry in Perea.

Seven chapters of Luke (11-17) are occupied by a consecutive recita of a series of important discourses and parables which are not paralleled in any of the other gospels. Jesus had said his last farewell to Galilee, had journeyed down to Jerusalem to the Feast of the Dedication, and had then gone over into the country east of the Jordan. There he spent some time before returning to Jerusalem for the tragic events in which his ministry reached its climax and consummation, and in this period were spoken the discourses found in Luke 11-17. For the most part they were warnings against the shallowness and harshness of pharisaism, teachings regarding forgiveness and about faith as the true spring of right living, and warnings of the awful results which would follow from rejection of the truth. Altogether, they were messages in which can be seen already the shadow of the approaching end and the anticipation for the close of the earthly ministry.

True Treasures.

Jesus has been distinguishing between the things of only temporary worth and the things of real and permanent value (Luke 12: 29-34) and has been saying that the mere physical things are not the highest needs or the greatest values. Our Father knows that we need them, but he does not want us to devote our time to getting them. He wants us to lay up real treasure, spiritual treasure, in the kingdom of God. Those who have a treasure there are the ones whose interest will be there, and these are the ones to whom the exhortation to watchfulness is properly addressed. It is worth while for them to be ready for the coming of the kingdom at any moment, for they really desire its coming.

Faith and Faithfulness.

It is one thing to have an interest in spiritual and heavenly things; it is another thing to feel the absolute reality of those spiritual values so vividly that the present visible and tangible things are not allowed to obscure them. All Christians, even nominal Christians, believe in God and immortality and the spiritual world. In a vague and general way, even the most lax of them feel that these things give value and direction to life and that it is well worth while to have them in store as a last reliance in that dread day when earthly things shall pass away. But one might have this sort of belief and yet not have that vital and practical belief which means faithfulness day by day to the requirements of the spiritual life. And no faith is adequate which is not so vivid and so directly joined to the conduct of life day by day that the result is a constant readiness for the end and the judgment to come. The physical exigencies of the hour which seem so imperative must not be allowed to usurp an authority which is not theirs—not even for a single hour. Even to the professed Christian, the temptation can come to choose the worse when there is an alternative presented between, let us say, a profit of ten thousand dollars with a stain upon the character, and a loss with the preservation of one's integrity. And if the profitable sin be chosen it is because there was not a proper valuation of the spiritual treasure of character.

If one values spiritual treasures as the miser values gold, he will preserve them hour by hour, and not hold them merely as a refuge in the final day. Christian watchfulness must begin, then, with a sense of the value of the spiritual kingdom for which we are watching, and its practical result must be constant and habitual living in the light of the principles of the kingdom of God.

Midweek Prayer-Meeting.

May 4, 1904.

A PREOCCUPIED HEART.—

Jer. 17:9.

"The heart is deceitful above all things, and it is desperately sick: who can know it?" The change in the revised rendering by which the word "sick" is substituted for "wicked," while it may seem to soften the indictment against the human heart, carries with it the idea of a constitutional moral infirmity or depravity, which is common to the race. This must be distinguished from sin or guilt, which is never inherited. It is rather the proneness to sin, the weakness which yields to temptation, the moral infirmity which has an affinity for sin.

What the Heart Is. It is the source of conduct and character. "Out of the heart are the issues of life." Jesus taught that "from out of the heart of men evil thoughts proceed, fornications, thefts, murders, adulteries, covetings, wickednesses, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, railing, pride, foolishness: all these evil things proceed from within and defile the man." In this comprehensive sense the heart is the inner rational and moral nature. It may be a storehouse for all unclean things, or the source of high and noble thoughts, aspirations and desires. Which is yours?

A Change of Heart. What is meant by a change of heart? It is the change from the former condition mentioned above to the latter. It is the change from the love of sin and of whatever is impure or unholy, to the love of God and of whatever is true and pure and righteous. It is a change from hatred, envy and malice, to love toward all our fellow men. In its largest sense, it involves a change of thought, of affection, of purpose, and issues in a changed life. The "evil heart of unbelief" must become a loving, trusting, obedient heart.

How the Change is Effected. The heart preoccupied by evil thoughts and desires must be led to see the loveliness of Christ's character and the beauty of His life and teaching. He apprehends this by faith when the gospel is preached, and the vision of the purer and nobler life dries out the impure and ignoble by "the expulsive power of a new affection." As we drive darkness out of a room by bringing in a light, so we drive error out of the heart by bringing in the truth, and hatred by bringing in love. The parable of the sower (Luke 8:4-15) shows the important place which the word of God, the good seed, holds in this process of securing a good harvest from the soil of the human heart. We should seek to remove from the human heart all obstacles to the reception of the word of God and to its growth and development. It is only as the heart is occupied by the good seed, and cultivated, that it can bring forth fruit unto eternal life.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." To retain Christ in the heart is the only way to retain purity of heart and of life.

Oh for a heart to praise my God,

A heart from sin set free,

A heart that always feels the blood

So freely shed for me.

A heart resigned, submissive, weak,

My great Redeemer's throne.

Where only Christ is heard to speak,

Where Jesus reigns alone.

Prayer: Oh, Lord, wilt Thou come into our hearts with all Thy light and love and truth and drive out whatever of evil there may be therein and glorify our lives in Thy service, to the end that we may be transformed into Thine image. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

A Recommendation.

To Whom It May Concern:

It affords me great pleasure to recommend Miss E. Florence Llewellyn to evangelists needing a singer. She has been teacher of voice culture and choral singing in Texas Christian university, and her work has given good satisfaction.

She desires to assist in evangelistic work, and I believe her to be well equipped for that service. She is a fine soloist and understands well how to organize and conduct a chorus.

Her forte is in Christian songs. She will be ready for work early in June.

Sincerely,

E. V. ZOLLARS,

Pres. Texas Christian University.

North Waco, Tex., April 12.

Peculiar To Itself

In what it is and what it does—containing the best blood-purifying, alterative and tonic substances and effecting the most radical and permanent cures of all humors and all eruptions, relieving weak, tired, languid feelings, and building up the whole system—is true only of Hood's Sarsaparilla

No other medicine acts like it; no other medicine has done so much real, substantial good, no other medicine has restored health and strength at so little cost.

"I was troubled with scrofula and came near losing my eyesight. For four months I could not see to do anything. After taking two bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla I could see to walk, and when I had taken eight bottles I could see as well as ever." SUSIE A. HARTSON, Withers, N. C.

May 8.CROWNS TRODDEN UNDER FOOT.—
Isa. 28:1-7; Rev. 3:11.For the Leader.

The subject, "Crowns trodden under foot," suggests beauties of character degraded; possibilities of the heart blasted; the splendid powers of the individual disregarded, ruined, and trampled into the dust. In the first scripture lesson we have the crown of the drunkard spoken of. It is a crown of pride; a crown of vanity, for pride is a vain thing, and all the hopes and expectations of the drunkard are vain. They never reach realization. Like a far off scene on the horizon of him that travels over a western plain, which vision is always receding, the things that are to be in the drunkard's plans continue to vanish as he approaches. Only the evil, the thing he does not count upon, ever comes to realization. Crowns are made for the head, not for the pathway of the feet. Crowns are to be worn, not trodden upon. Crowns indicate power to be rightly used, and are not symbols to be trampled into the earth.

For the Members.

1. Our daily readings furnish quite a course of reading upon the evils resulting from the use of strong drink. Not only does the individual suffer, but the tribe, the province, the state, comes to naught. These readings also make it plain that in a plan such as God gave the people under Moses—and this was not His perfect plan—the people were taught to abhor the use of strong drink. What is more strikingly true to the experiences of the drunkard to-day than the description of the effects of wine upon man as given in the 23rd chapter of Proverbs?

2. It is, then, both revelation and experience that forbid the use of strong drink. Drunkenness has no endorsement in either book. Both the heart and the head condemn it. It is a thing that degrades crowns. Reason advocates when drunkenness enters the temple of the soul. Devotion dies, and the sacred fires go out under the baleful atmosphere of the product of the still. What is this but crown breaking? What is it but tramping upon crowns? It is not hard to show that it is folly. While one might contend that he did not see the folly of drink, yet he would at once admit the folly of him who would throw down the crown of a great kingdom for the temporary pleasures of a sensual and sinful life.

3. The use of strong drink tramples under foot the crown of purity. Purity of character and the constant use of intoxicating beverages are not characteristics of the same person. Liquor is not only the companion of those of lewd character, but it is the influence, the power, the damning thing that makes one impure. Harlots without wine are unknown to history. Prodigal sons who have not looked upon the wine when it was red are also unknown to history. Who would throw away a crown of purity if he were not under the delusive spell and the baneful influence of some evil power? Not one. It is strong drink that causes the young man to take off that crown and trample it into the dust. It is the same thing that will cause the fair girl to do likewise.

4. There are other crowns that this evil thing will cause us to degrade into the dust: (1) There is the crown of pure speech. Who has ever known a drunkard that has not thrown this crown to the earth. Vile language is often the result. Obscene language is another result. Profane language follows most readily. The mouth of him who uses strong drink is polluted. (2) The crown of integrity is broken by drunkenness. That is why the drinker is not wanted in the employ of men who have responsible places in the business world. He cannot be trusted. He has long since trampled upon his crown of integrity. He may still

ARE YOUR KIDNEYS WEAK?

Thousands of Men and Women Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.

The kidneys filter and purify the blood—that is their work.

Therefore, when your kidneys are weak or out of order, you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected, and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the great kidney remedy Dr. Kilmer's Swamp Root, because as soon as your kidneys begin to get better they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

I cheerfully recommend and endorse the Great Remedy, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, for kidney trouble and bad liver. I have used it and derived great benefit from it. I believe it has cured me entirely of kidney and liver trouble, from which I suffered terribly.

Most gratefully yours,
A. R. Reynolds, Chief of Police,
Columbus, Ga.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for many kinds of diseases, and if permitted to continue much suffering and fatal results are sure to follow. Kidney trouble irritates the nerves, makes you dizzy, restless, sleepless and irritable. Makes you pass water often during the day and obliges you to get up many times during the night. Unhealthy kidneys cause rheumatism, gravel, catarrh of the bladder, pain or dull ache in the back, joints and muscles; makes your head ache and back ache, cause indigestion, stomach and liver trouble, you get a sallow, yellow complexion, make you feel as though you had heart trouble; you may have plenty of ambition, but no strength; get weak and waste away.

The cure for these troubles is Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the world-famous new kidney remedy. In taking Swamp-Root you afford natural help to Nature, for Swamp-Root is the most perfect helper and gentle aid to the kidneys that is known to medical science.

How to Find Out

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on rising about four ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If on examination it is milky or cloudy, if there is a brick-dust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy for kidney, liver and bladder troubles.

SPECIAL NOTE.—So successful is Swamp-Root in promptly curing even the most distressing cases of kidney, liver or bladder troubles, that to prove its wonderful merits you may have a sample bottle and a book of valuable information, both sent absolutely free by mail. The book contains many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured. The value and success of Swamp-Root is so well known that our readers are advised to send for a sample bottle. In sending your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., be sure to say you read this generous offer in the St Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The Proprietors of this paper guarantee the genuineness of this offer.

have the desire to do the right thing. He may try at times to be true to his work. But he cannot. All his power is gone. He is uncrowned. By his own consent he is shorn of his strength. (3) There is the crown of the glory of the total abstainer. Who is like him? What is more to be desired than the manly look, the splendid body, the clear complexion of untainted health, the honest countenance, the full, steady eye of him who has his body as God gave it to him, free from strong drink?

Quiet Hour Thought.

My body is the temple of God. Does He reign therein?

(Swamp-Root is pleasant to take.)

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Swamp-Root—Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y., on every bottle.

Our Budget

—Now for that $200,000 for home missions.

—But remember that the money itself is not the largest part, but the sacrifices made in giving it, the prayers that accompany it, the joy it will bring to the workers, and above all, the good it will accomplish, are the chief considerations.

—St. Louis opens her gates to the world this week, and also the gates of the greatest exhibition of the world's progress in all history. The Fair opens April 30 and it will close on November 30. It will not be complete on opening day, of course, Fairs never are, but it will be sufficiently complete to afford abundant material for study and for admiration.

—We have already recommended October as the best month for visiting the Fair for those who can visit it but once. The Fair and the weather will then be at their best, and our great national convention comes in the middle of the month, so that it can be taken in during the same visit.

—Bro. J. M. Philpott has accepted the call to the temporary pastorate of the Union avenue Christian church, this city, and will begin his labors on Sunday, May 22. It is understood that if the relation proves mutually satisfactory, it will be made permanent.

—Finis Idleman has resigned at Dixon, Ill., to accept the work at Paris, Ill.

—The church recently destroyed by fire at Logan, Iowa, will be rebuilt without outside aid.

—J. C. Lemon has engaged to preach for congregations at Eldora and Garwin, Iowa, half time each.

—L. L. Carpenter will dedicate the new church at Byron, Ind., next Lord's day. H. Randall Lookabill is the minister.

—The Christian church, as well as the Methodist church, at Higbee, Mo., was badly damaged by the storm on Saturday night.

—Dr. W. T. Moore preached at Nevada, Mo., on Lord's day and gave his lecture, "John Bull in His Castle," on Monday night.

—The church at Van Wert, O., is now free from debt. H. E. Stevens writes that his flock is rejoicing at the cancellation and burning of the mortgage.

—Daniel Trundle, who has resigned at Springdale, Ark., is to preach at Wellsville, Mo., next Lord's day. Brother Trundle is a Missouri boy.

—N. J. Aylsworth's address is not Melrose, N. Y., as given in the present year book, but R. F. D. 9, Auburn, N. Y. Correspondents please notice.

—The women of the West Side Christian church at Springfield, Ill., where J. E. Lynn is pastor, have just installed their gift of a handsome new pipe organ.

—We congratulate Bro. Walter Scott Priest on the jubilee service in honor of the first hundred additions during his seven months' pastorate. That is a fine record.

—The work is progressing on the new Central church of Christ, the largest church edifice in Wichita, Kan., but owing to lack of material, the building will not be dedicated until possibly about July 1.

—The contract for the new building at Higgsville, Mo., where J. H. Coil is pastor, has been let to C. H. Meyer, of Corder, Mo. The building is to cost $14,000, which is indicative of a very promising field for future work.

—After June 1, Edward Wright, now pastor of the church at Waterloo, Iowa, will be associated with his brother, Lawrence Wright, of Jefferson, Iowa, in the evangelistic work. Bro. Edward Wright is counted a fine singer as well as a strong preacher.

—Our National Benevolent Association has just received $200 on the annuity plan from a sister who has previously given $2,500. For particulars relating to the association and the annuity method of giving, address Geo. L. Snively, 903 Aubert Ave., St. Louis.

Nailed to the Mast

—The Ohio state convention at Cleveland has been granted a one fare for the round trip plus 25 cents. The program for the convention is about complete and will undoubtedly be one of the very best ever presented to an Ohio convention. The time is May 23-26.

—Resolutions of the most cordial character were adopted by the Charleston, S. C., church upon Brother and Sister Fenstermacher's retiring from the admirable work they have done in this field. We hope to give some account of the new building in an early issue.

—T. R. Overton, of Albuquerque, N. M., suggests a territorial convention to be held this summer at some place to be selected. The time has come, he thinks, to make a great forward movement in New Mexico. He calls for organization and a territorial mission board.

—F. M. McHale, pastor of the Christian church at Herington, Kan., has been chosen to preach the baccalaureate sermon for the high school of that city, upon which occasion all the churches will unite. He will also preach the Odd Fellows' anniversary sermon on May 1.

—Chas. S. Medbury, of Des Moines, Iowa, is announced to be the chief speaker at the Peoria church annual banquet, which occurs this year on May 6. His subject will be "Secular Tribute to the Divine." Friends from Eureka, Washburn, Pekin and other suburbs are arranging to attend.

—T. J. Shuey, formerly of Rock Island, has located with the church at Abingdon, Ill. He writes under date of April 19: "We have located here and the work starts off in fine shape. We began by sending $59 to the benevolent association from the Sunday-school as an Easter offering. We are having large audiences."

—The church just dedicated at Charleston, S. C., where Brother Fenstermacher has been laboring, is the expression of a belief in the future of the city. It is a handsome building of medieval design, measuring 43 by 85 feet, with an adjoining room for use when desired. The new pastor, C. E. Smith, of Pine Flats, Pa., begins work next Lord's day.

—We regret to note that Herbert Yeuell, who has been working so faithfully at Uniontown, Pa., where he has had additions at nearly every service, has been suddenly called to London, England, by the serious illness of his mother. He left New York last Wednesday on the "Cedric." Bro. Garnet Wynne, of Bethany, will supply during his absence.

—A request has come to this office for information as to the probable number of long pastorates among us—say, those 10 years and upward. We could give only a partial list of such pastorates from personal knowledge, and we ask, therefore, for the benefit of this brother and other interested readers, and with a view of increasing the number of such pastorates, that those who know of such will report to us, giving name of preacher, church, where he served and the length of his service. We will ask our readers who may be able to do so to assist us in securing such information as will enable us to make an approximately correct list.

—Bro. W. M. Baker, minister of the Christian church at Meridian, Miss., writes us that there is a fine opening there for a druggist who is a member of the Christian church. The city has a population of 23,000 and is growing rapidly. Business men are needed in the congregation, which is very weak. Application may be made to J. M. McBeath, Ormond Building, Meridian, Miss.

—Edward B. Bagby, of the Ninth street church, Washington, has been unanimously called for another term of three years, and the congregation has decided to employ an assistant pastor. The membership of the church is 1,104 and there have been 19 confessions the past two Sundays, besides other additions. Brother Bagby has been with the church 13 years. It is the long pastorate that tells.

—A new club was recently launched known as the international travelers' club, with 10,000 or more members among litterateurs, publishers, educators, world travelers, and financiers in America, Europe and the Orient. The motto of this club is "No liquor, no gambling." Applications for membership are submitted to a board of approval, and the club is designed to promote the highest social, moral and civic spirit.

—The picture on page 506 of our last week's issue presuming to represent the features of C. B. Osgood was really a good likeness of James R. McIntyre, the living link evangelist of the Guthrie, Oklahoma, church. The cut came to our office direct from the home society, and Brother Osgood's name was written on it. Our printers naturally thought this sufficient verification. They cannot be expected to know personally all the good men in the world.

—Morton H. Pemberton, of Centralia, who is more widely known as "Rube," the lecturer and humorist, is to make the race for representative to the Missouri state legislature from Callaway and Boone counties. Mr. Pemberton is a member of the Christian church and is a son of Dr. Pemberton, of Auxvasse. He is a bright young man and will, we doubt not, be a worthy representative of any district that may choose him for its champion at Jefferson City.

—Bro. G. F. Assiter writes: "The current issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is worth its weight in gold." The particular issue referred to is that of April 21, but after all, there is not much variation in the value of the various numbers. We seek to put into each one the best possible material we can secure. If only readers would read, they would understand how much labor and thought are required to provide them their weekly bill of fare.

—Dr. W. E. Garrison, president of Butler college, is having a busy time with public engagements throughout the state where he has just gone into residence. He has been giving a number of public addresses, one of the most important being that at the annual commencement of the medical college of Indianapolis, when his subject was "The Opportunity of the Educated Man." President Garrison has been very cordially received in all circles of the state.

—"The Revelation Rearranged" is the way Bro. J. S. Hughes heads a note to us giving the information that he is rearranging the text of John's revelation, doing away with chapters and verses and putting appropriate headings to the paragraphs, so as to give his class a better understanding and higher enjoyment of the wonderful book. It will be furnished to any who may desire to engage in this study. Brother Hughes' address is 1203 Chamber of Commerce Building, Chicago.

—The Benevolent association of the Christian churches, of which Mrs. H. M. Meier is president, and whose headquarters are in this city, pledges $200 to the World's Fair pavilion of the Disciples of Christ, and expects to use the building for advertising its work among the tens of thousands of visitors who will call at the building during the progress of the Fair. This is a good investment and will yield rich returns, we have no doubt. See appeal elsewhere for additional funds to complete this building.

—G. W. Coffman writes that the statement in Brother Thompson's letter from Colorado, to the effect that he has withdrawn from the ministry, is not exact. He has merely gone on to a farm temporarily because there was not support for him in the church at Paonia.

—Bro. Baxter Waters, in an article appealing for home missions, received just as we go to press, uses words that many will re-echo: "In behalf," he says, "of our own America, her homes, her churches and schools, jealous for her spiritual welfare, and anxious for her sons and daughters, that they may walk in the truth, that they may all be taught of God; in behalf of her common people, her free institutions; in behalf of America, with all that she needs, and all that she is, I appeal to you."

—We regret very much to hear of the continued illness of Bro. J. V. Updike at Lima, O. Since the middle of February he has been unable to be up or attend to any business whatever. Entire rest has been prescribed for him. Brother Updike has found it expedient and indeed necessary to sever all his relations with the "Chicago, Texas Land & Lumber Co." Many of his warmest friends would have been glad if his name had never been associated with any stock-selling concern, for they feel that this has not helped Brother Updike. The prayers of the brotherhood are desired in his behalf, that his recovery may be speedy and complete.

—E. C. Browning, who has preached extensively in Missouri and Arkansas, and to some extent in Illinois and Kansas, wants to get into correspondence with some of the many people he has brought to the Lord. Many times he has immersed entire families, and now in his 68th year, while preaching as constantly as ever, he realizes that this activity cannot continue very much longer. At present he is working in the Arkansas mission field and has a longing desire to receive a message from those he has baptized, or from a relation in behalf of any who have lived and died in the Lord. Brother Browning may be addressed at 2000 Adams Street, Little Rock.

—H. A. Denton has accepted the call to Maryville, "the garden spot of Missouri." By the terms of his contract he must give three months' notice to the Warrensburg church, but probably the good people there will let him off some time in June. There is a membership of 900 at Maryville, and one of the best houses of worship in the state. The work at Warrensburg is very important and Brother Denton regrets leaving it, but he feels that apart from the promise of usefulness at Maryville, the time has come for him when "books, summer schools and other things that keep us abreast of the times are a necessity." He will leave Warrensburg in splendid condition.

—A local paper at Sloan, Ia., announces:

"With the hearty approval of their congregations, the pastors of the Methodist and Christian churches have arranged an exchange of union services. On the Sundays during Brother Boyden's attendance at conference, Brother Hodgkinson will preach in the Christian church at 11 A. M., and in the Methodist church at 8 P. M. When the Christian minister takes his vacation the Methodist minister will serve the united congregations similarly."

Concerning the above Bro. T. R. Hodgkinson asks, "Will this sort of 'federation' be allowed in this great free brotherhood?" We guarantee him immunity from any heresy trial provided he preaches a sound gospel to his Methodist brethren, as we are sure he will.

—Dr. J. E. Calloway, of Chillicothe, Mo., in renewing his subscription for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, makes it clear to us that he is one of those readers who have continued taking religious periodicals by reason of heredity. It is a great thing when young people of the household become attached to the paper for which their parents subscribe, and continue to take that paper, and let their children become attached to it. Dr. Calloway is now in his 68th year, and has been a member of the Christian Church since he was twelve years old. His father was Wm. D. Calloway, who became a Christian under the first preaching of Barton W. Stone in the early 30's. This old pioneer was a charter member of the Christian Church organized in 1837 at Versailles, near Eureka, Ill. He subscribed for and took all the leading Christian papers published in Cincinnati, Chicago, Oskaloosa, Indianapolis and St. Louis. We wish for Dr. Calloway that he may yet live long to continue as a stalwart of the Christian Church.

—"April 23 was one of the red-letter days for Sioux Falls, South Dakota, Christianity. We have a custom that would not be a bad thing for other cities. The missionary societies of the different city churches hold an annual union meeting consisting of a program and a social hour. This year it was the privilege of the Christian church to entertain this union missionary meeting. The program was made up of missionary addresses, music and recitations. But the most enjoyable and not the least profitable part is the social hour that follows, during which light refreshments are served. Most Christians are now longing for a larger fellowship, and this annual union meeting with its social hour affords such an opportunity. This social fellowship is one of the forces that is going to bring about the oneness for which we are praying."—E. A. ORR.

—There is a David R. Francis in the ministry who is as fine a looking specimen of physical manhood as he who is president of the World's Fair. Bro. D. R. Francis, of Sullivan, Ind., was a visitor to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST last week. He reports the work in southern Indiana moving along steadily, but says that the "antis" are the strong body in that section and that the Christian church with the broader outlook has to encounter a good deal of opposition both from them and from the denominations. Brother Francis is a Welshman by birth and was formerly a Congregationalist minister. Before that he traveled all through the west, being threatened with consumption. He loves evangelistic work and has a very strong desire to make a tour of his native land preaching and singing the gospel. Some day he thinks he will be drawn to engage in this work.

—The Jacksonville (Fla.) Metropolis says: "The growth of the First Christian church in the last few years, in this city, has been something unusual for religious bodies in Jacksonville. When Rev. J. T. Boone came to this city in December, 1898, there were about 100 members on the church roll of this organization. They were worshipping in a little wooden house, in an auditorium that seated 144 people, with the great mass of Jacksonville not knowing much about them. Since that time their membership has grown to over 500 names on the roll, with a handsome new church, not yet completed but still not far from completion; with a high standing in the community; with the kindest regard and highest respect of the entire city; a large congregation, with a Sunday-school second to none in the state, and in the van of every good work; and we think that we may justly say that this large result has been chiefly due to its pastor, Rev. J. T. Boone."

—"The writer was present at the dedication of the new church at Covina, April 10. The property is worth $12,000. The building is old mission style and is one of the most artistic buildings in southern California. The indebtedness was all provided for. The church extension loan of $1,500 was reduced to $1,000. The church in Covina is one of the best in the state. Only two places in the world ship more oranges than are shipped from Covina. The church is ten years old and has had but one pastor, J. W. Utter. Brother Utter has received frequent calls to other fields, but the people of Covina rise up en masse and say he must not leave. He is honored, respected and loved as are but few men. His power for good is felt throughout the state and beyond. The church in Covina observes all the missionary days. This church promises to be one of the great churches of the brotherhood."

the project favorably and have appointed a committee to secure from the state or the United States government a suitable location. We need a good church building at this popular resort, and Brother Kincaid is just as eager and persistent in trying to raise the money as he was when he started out on this difficult undertaking. We hope that he may be able to find some of our brethren with means who visit this place for their health, who will give him a large donation toward a work that could be made very useful and blessed. But money will be needed from the outside, too. Other religious bodies are planning great things, for they see the strategic importance of this field.

Ministerial Exchange.

Joseph Morris, of Highland, Kan., is at Milroy, Ind. He is open for engagements with churches near Indianapolis.

Churches may be put in correspondence with a preacher of experience and rare ability by addressing Box 188, Everest, Kan.

J. L. Fowler, of Greene, Iowa, closed his pastorate at that place on April 24. The church board of that place recommends him to any church in need of a pastor as being a true, loyal and faithful preacher, and capable of doing a great work for any church that may give him a call.

Wanted, a vigorous single preacher who wants to undertake a new, promising city mission at small salary and pursue studies in a leading eastern university. Address S. J. Corey, Cor. Sec., Rochester, N. Y.

I. H. Teel has resigned the pastorate at S. McAlester, I. T., to accept that at Canon City, Colo., same to take effect June 1. Applicants for the pulpit at S. McAlester should address W. S. Ambrose at that place.

Kansas Letter.

The first Lord's day in May is the day of days for the great brotherhood to remember our own country, and rally to the support of our home board in evangelizing in the waste places of our great land. We have now attended to the offering for foreign missions, and April and May should be given to the consideration of home missions. Do not allow the preparations for children's day to interfere with the offering, or weaken the interest in home missions. If for any reason your church cannot gather the offering on the first Sunday in May, take it up as soon after as possible. I appeal to the churches of Kansas especially. Brother preacher, lay this matter upon your own heart then upon the hearts of your people. The obligation to bring this subject before the congregation rests with you. No matter if some of the members are a little "touchy" about the matter, bring it up and take the offering anyway. Get what you can, and send it in.

The dedication of the new building at Dwight was on the first Lord's day in April. The house is frame, with entrance through the tower, with inclined floor seated with pews. Total cost complete, $1,500. Sufficient money raised on dedication day, with a small loan from the church extension board, will enable the brethren to easily take care of the property. The congregation had been meeting for many years in a school-house, so their joy can be imagined when they could truly say that they had a house of their own in which to worship. H. I. Bryant is the pastor. This is his second house this winter. He is doing a splendid work in this section of the country. Has a new church organization and house under way at Sylvan Park, in Morris Co., where we will dedicate before long.

The dedication at Dresden occurred on Lord's day, April 17. Perhaps no building represents a greater amount of hard labor and sacrifice on the part of a faithful few than does this one. The location is in the "short grass" section of the state. But so well was the work carried on, and the money so economically used, that there was an indebtedness of only $255 when dedication day arrived. This amount, and $25 more, was easily raised, and the house was set apart to the worship of Jehovah without a dollar resting against it. The building is a frame structure, 28x48 feet. It has inclined floor, and is nicely seated with pews, and cost complete, $1,908.23. Brother Wenchen is the pastor, and has been for two years. Charles Hoppas deserves honorable mention as one of the most self-sacrificing in constructing the building.

Nebraska.

The very first item of news for this week's letter, both in point of time and importance, is the fact that the offering for home missions comes the very first day of May. Every other interest can and should be sidetracked temporarily, while this great interest is given the right of way. Better lay some other train out for a week than to have a collision on the line. This is a big vestibuled train (no sleepers or dining cars) going straight ahead with mighty power, but stopping at every station to unload the bread of life where needed, and to take on supplies where there is abundance. Just now it is loading up, and the whole brotherhood should be at the station with their offerings ready to put them aboard and take the receipt from the general manager, B. L. Smith. From the very beginning, our work in Nebraska has been fostered by the society, and thousands of dollars have been expended here, resulting in the organization of many congregations and the support of many others. Even at this time our workers are helped by this means. Let us pass it on. The great masses in New England should hear the gospel as we are preaching it. The great cities are not half manned as they should be for our work. The northwest and west is largely virgin soil for our plea. We of Nebraska have been blessed materially; now let us bring in the tithes and an offering into the storehouse, that the land may be fed. Every preacher among us in Nebraska is expected to do his whole duty to this great work early in May.

Austin will be in a meeting at Geneva with Frank McVey as singer, beginning about April 28.—W. C. German and wife are in a meeting at Indianola. He has resigned at McCook. H. L. Denton has been called to the work at Rising City and Summit. Let us hope that this means the permanent growth of this work. Bro. W. S. Hayden is getting the work at Chadron in good order. They report progress and some additions.—Thirty-one additions were reported at Pawnee City where Simpson Ely is in a meeting with T. A. Lindenmeyer. This report was nearly a week ago. Doubtless there are many more. D. M. Sayles has located the half of his time at Shubert. The other half is given to Giltner. Melvin Putman and Emma Egbert have been at Cozad in a meeting. Have no report of results.

Convention of district No. 1 was held at Falls City last week and was a first-class convention. The other districts will have to work to keep even with this initial convention of the year. The program was excellent and the attendance was fine, while the weather was ideal. In addition, the Falls City people treated us with the largest Christian courtesy. Brother Holley, the pastor, is winning his way steadily.

Peru reports that they have money raised for a lot, and the workers are pushing toward a building. District No. 1, in connection with the state, will supply preaching there for the summer once a month. We hope to build a house in the meantime, and then keep a preacher on the ground.

The secretary dedicates the new house at Kingston on April 24. This is a faithful country congregation. Eddyville will be next in order in the matter of dedications. The secretary spent the two Lord's days, April 10 and 17, at Ord and Ansley. One confession at the former place, and one added from the Congregationalists at the latter. Board meeting at Lincoln this week. W. A. BALDWIN.

Los Angeles Letter.

Los Angeles has recently enjoyed a visit from one of the world's great preachers, Dr. G. Campbell Morgan. He spent two weeks in our city, preaching twice a day to audiences that tested the seating capacity of our largest buildings. He is carrying on in the United States the Northfield extension work as begun by D. L. Moody. He is really a great preacher, great in his gifts as a public speaker, great in his devotion to God's word and will, great in his mastery of audiences, great in his ability as an expositor of the word of God. I have heard no man among the denominations who has so charmed me by his comprehension of biblical knowledge as has Dr. Morgan. With but little instruction he would preach the biblical doctrines as pled for by our Father. If Dr. Morgan comes your way, do not fail to hear him.

The erstwhile famous evangelist, B. Fay Mills, has also been regaling our spirits in Los Angeles recently by dreamy discourses on such vital themes as "Ideals and Idols," "Men and Gods," "Culture and Emerson." His first few services were largely attended by those who heard him in his great meeting here twelve years ago and who were directed thither by curiosity to witness the results of the theological somersault he has performed. His congregations dwindled from the beginning and small buildings could accommodate the people who desired to follow his vagaries. He is a man without a message. He has no mission. He is a fading star. Ten years ago he was a great power. To-day he is a great failure. The reason is found in the fact that he has no gospel to preach. The world needs the simple plain gospel. It soon tires of negation. The world wants the simple story of the Christ. The presence in Los Angeles at the same time of Morgan and Mills and the audiences that waited upon their ministry is ample proof that it is the message of Christ that is all powerful and that draws people Godward and heavenward.

Southern California is the proud possessor of two more valuable church houses among our brethren. Both have been recently set apart to the service of our Christ. San Bernardino, under the leadership of J. R. Shie, erected a beautiful structure on a choice corner and well suited to their needs. Covina, which has had no pastor in its entire history except J. W. Utter, has set apart to the service of God a beautiful stone and cement building which will defy the wasting tooth of a century and will be a monument to Brother Utter's persistency long after his voice is stilled in death. It is a thing of beauty as well as of stability. As the years go by our churches are being housed in buildings worthy of them. Our cause is rapidly taking its place among the leading religious forces of this coast.

The First church continues to grow. There have been 55 persons added to her membership since Jan. 1, 1904, at her regular services. Many of these have been conversions. On Easter Sunday I preached my eleven hundredth sermon in the pulpit of the First church. This constitutes quite a record. Under these eleven hundred sermons thirteen hundred and thirty-three persons have been added to the membership of the church. I am preaching to larger congregations this winter than at any previous time in my long pastorate here.

During the month of May the general conference of the Methodist church will hold its quadrennial sessions in Los Angeles. Great preparations have been made for its coming. It is expected that this will bring at least 30,000 people to the angel city. The coming of this conference to Los Angeles has filled Los Angeles Methodists with great enthusiasm and there has been a general advance of their interests all along the line. The Methodists are a great people. We could learn many lessons from them, not the least of which is that of the power and effectiveness of organization.

Los Angeles grows most rapidly. The postal authorities report an increase for March, 1904, of 38 per cent in postal receipts over

March, 1903. This indicates the march of our progress. Our churches are growing. It is expected that the new mission on Bayle Heights will soon grow into a church and join the other co-operative forces of this city in an onward and upward growth. Los Angeles is a great and growing mission field. The field is white unto the harvest here. Pray that many may enter upon gathering it while it is yet day, lest the night shall come when no man can work.

The St. Louis Letter.

In the last letter we spoke of the great Fair as a kind of universal university, and that is just what our readers will find it to be when they get here. Hence it is important that each student in this great school shall have some definite plan of study in mind when he enters. This will be found necessary to save both time and muscle.

We must remember that the grounds cover 1,240 acres, and that there are buildings on the grounds that cover more than 25 acres. Think of going into a field of 25 acres filled with interesting objects from all over the world, and attempting to see them all.

There are about sixteen great departments here, besides a great number of special departments for elective study.

As in a great university, each one must understand that it is impossible for him to see and learn it all. Hence, he is compelled to select some special course of investigation as his specialty and pursue that, or he will find when the Fair is over that he has a general smattering of it all, with a definite knowledge of none of it.

The agriculturist will probably be most interested in the palaces of agriculture, horticulture and machinery. The miner will want to go at once to the palace of mines and metallurgy. The artisan will probably head for the palaces of manufactures and varied industries. The artist will think first of the great art galleries. The teacher and the student will feel most at home in the palace of education. The electrician will want to go immediately to the palace of electricity. The scientist will find interest in the departments of anthropology, electricity, forestry, fish and game, indeed in every department.

Thus it must be till every specialist has found the specialty for which he has come. Having done what he desires to do, or what his time will permit him to do, in his special department, each one will want to get a general knowledge of the whole Fair. He will need all of one day to see the grounds without pausing many minutes at any one place.

As all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy, the management has prepared a great many diversions for the recess hour. While the Pike will be looked upon as a place of special amusement, yet it is not without plan. Indeed to the student who attends the Fair to think and learn, the Pike will be a place of more than amusement. It is a general school. There the observer will be permitted to study the life of many nations, and many historical events will be illustrated in a marvelously interesting manner.

All Bible students, Sunday-school teachers and Christians in general will be interested in the Jerusalem exhibit, which claims to be a reproduction of the streets, buildings and customs to be seen in Jerusalem to-day.

It is impossible to mention in this letter all of the interesting things to be seen. We would recommend to those who are planning to attend the Fair, and who desire to get some permanent benefit from it, that they bear in mind that they cannot see it all. Hence they should plan a course of investigation; and when they get inside, go at once to their special department, as the student would go to his class room. When they get tired and want a little recreation, they may take a recess and dip into some of the many diversions at hand, and then back to their study till they have finished their special course.

We desire to suggest two general thoughts that may be helpful in a plan of study. We should keep in mind that this exposition seeks to show the marvelous development in all departments of life since the days of the Louisiana Purchase. It will be interesting and profitable to constantly contrast the then and the now. We shall have every means of seeing how the people lived and labored, and how they were equipped 100 years ago, as compared with how they live and do things to-day.

Another thought that should not be overlooked is the opportunity to compare and contrast the life and progress of other nations with that of America. We shall have their products before us to show wherein they are in advance of us and wherein we may teach them. Their exhibits will be found in the great palaces by the side of ours, so it will be easy to study them together. This study may be called the there and the here. With the thought of the then and the now and the there and the here as the starting point of our investigations, we are prepared to come out of our special departments of this practical university with very definite and useful information.

Letter from the Maritime Provinces.

A very important gathering took place in the city of Toronto during the first week in March, when representative clerical and lay workers of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational churches met for the purpose of considering the question of an organic union. This is the first time, as far as I know, that the question of Christian union has received serious consideration by representative religious thinkers and workers in this country. In the United States, Australia and Great Britain, tentative and sometimes successful efforts have been made looking toward the union of bodies having generic affinities, but now comes Canada with a bolder proposition contemplating not merely the union of a parent body with its numerous progeny, but the fusion into one organic whole of the parent bodies themselves. The initiative in this matter was taken by the Methodist church at the last general conference in Winnipeg, when a resolution looking to a closer affiliation of the Methodist church with other evangelical denominations was adopted with the unanimous approval of the conference. This tentative expression of Methodist feeling drew from the Presbyterian and Congregational churches at their general assemblies favorable responses, and resulted in the recent gathering in Toronto as before stated.

While I do not think that it is at all probable that any immediate practical results will follow, still this is an event of deep significance and well expresses the trend of religious thought and life in Canada. The remarks of some of the leading speakers on that occasion are worthy of careful thought, notably those of Principal Coven, of Knox college, and Chancellor Burwash, of Queens. Principal Coven, speaking for the Presbyterian church, drew his strongest argument for union from the prayer of our Lord that his disciples might be one. He confessed his adherence to Calvinistic doctrine, but in his opinion the Church of Christ was larger than any denomination and ought to be broad enough to allow scope for individual preference, both in doctrine and worship, sufficient to meet every reasonable need so long as what was fundamental to the Christian life was believed and taught. He distinguished between what may be believed and taught and what must be subscribed. Chancellor Burwash, speaking for the Methodists, said that it was the dream of his life that these three churches become one in organization and spirit. "The barriers," said he, "are breaking down. There is no insurmountable obstacle either in theology or in the organization of the denominations. The things upon which we agree are infinitely more important than those about which we differ. The bonds of our fellowship are stronger and more sacred than the points of our division."

When representative religious leaders, such as Principal Coven and Chancellor Burwash, express themselves in open parliament, we are safe in saying that such a union as contemplated is not an idle dream of idle dreamers or the wild fancy of the overheated imagination of young and inexperienced men, but is the sober thought of veterans in the Lord's army who have passed through many a theological battle and whose experience leads them to see the vanity and sinfulness of parleyism, and to conclude that there is something in religion of more value than opinions, and that there are some fundamentals upon which both Calvinist and Arminian may in harmony build a superstructure for the Lord.

It seems to me, in view of these facts, that the Disciples of Canada will have to look to their laurels lest they be outstripped in the race for Christian union by these older religious bodies whom some of us look upon as lost. However true the ideals of a Christian organization may be, if that organization ceases to develop in thought and practice to meet the ever changing conditions of life; if its leaders become narrow and circumscribed in vision from a continual viewing of one side

Cheap chimney, dear lamp. MACBETH.

My Index tells what chimney fits your lamp. If you use that chimney, you get perhaps twice as much light, and save a dollar or two a year of chimney-money, of truth, it defeats its own end, sounds its own death knell, and becomes in itself an obstacle in the way of accomplishing the very object for which it was created. The Canadian tendency of life is conservative, and it is no surprise to find representative men in our representative churches caring more for the shibboleth of a dead ancestor than for a present revelation of an everflowing spirit. The church that ceases to learn from and profit by the teachings of history and experience, and rejects the accredited results of scientific investigation, becomes as distinctly a sect as any that ever damned an infant or fulminated a bull.

The great Teacher informed the Jews, to whom were given higher conceptions of God and duty than those accorded to other nations, that, if they should become narrow in vision, bigoted in mind, refusing to be guided by the ever-coming spirit through the ever-widening circles of experience to the place of higher duties and greater blessings, these privileges would be taken from them and given to a people who would advance in thought and life, torchlike, to lead a world out of sin to righteousness. This principle has application not only to the Jew, but to every individual or company of individuals who may have some special message from the Lord to deliver. If the Disciples of Christ, to whom has been committed the essential message of Christianity, fail at this juncture to make themselves understood, or, misunderstanding their own message, become a sect among sects, the accomplishment of their high object will be removed from their province, and a people in preparation by the Lord will achieve the results that we vainly may have attempted.

We refer briefly to the work in the maritime provinces.

In Summerside, Prince Edward Island, with the assistance of W. R. Motley, of Montague, A. N. Simpson added seven to the church by baptism last month. No other additions have been reported from the island. There is no pastor at New Glasgow. The church there needs a man.

Coburg St., New Brunswick, reports no additions last month. J. W. Robbins, who supplied during the months of January and February, left for home in Harristown, Ill., March 20. H. Murray is at present supplying. They expect J. F. Floyd May 1. Coburg St. is unfortunate in having so many changes.

Douglas Ave., St. John, N. B., reports three confessions and baptisms during March. J. Chas. B. Appel doing the preaching.

Ralph Gebbie, Deer Island, N. B., reports one baptism last month. He collected $50 for foreign missions.

The work in Letete and Back Bay is progressing as fast as could be expected. Since my last report I have baptized three at Letete and one at Back Bay. This makes eight baptisms since coming here in January. Mascarene raised $10 45 and Letete $15 for foreign missions.

The report of the maritime missionary society shows a deficit of $12.63. Clarence Mitchell has been engaged as evangelist. He will begin at Halifax and Pietow.

There are no reports from Nova Scotia this month.

Indian Territory and Home Missions.

I do not believe our people have ever yet been sufficiently aroused regarding the importance, not to say the necessity, of home mission work. The work that has already been accomplished ought to be sufficient to arouse unbounded enthusiasm. Every year hundreds of churches are being organized and reorganized, and more than ten thousand souls converted by the men out on the "firing line." And these men could not do the work they are doing but for the support of the home board.

I have evangelized in the east, north, south, and am now in the west, and I know from personal observation that the home board has done and is doing a great work, and one that is going to last. And yet we are unable to enter one in twenty of the "open doors," or to answer more than a fractional part of the worthy and pressing calls for the gospel. If we should reach the $200,000 limit the first Sunday in May and the home board could afford to use half of the amount in the Indian Territory, it would scarcely relieve the strain or meet the demands.

Illinois Notes.

After seven weeks of sickness the writer is again in the field in the interests of Christian education. The Father is good to raise us up and we thank Him and pray for His blessing upon the work of Eureka College, which has been such a great factor in extending the cause which we love, and upon every one who shall lend a hand to enlarge its usefulness. It seems to me that if the Disciples in Illinois knew what training and culture and strength is constantly going out from Eureka college to bless the world they would soon furnish the money so much needed to extend and enlarge its work.

The cause of Christ in Danville is in a prosperous condition. The First church had many long years of struggle, poverty and hardship, until ten years ago S. S. Jones entered the field and found about 125 members. He cared for its interests about seven years, and left the First church with about 600 or 700 members, and organized a second church. Bro. J. W. Street is just closing a pastorate of two years in order to enter Eureka college. He is doing the wise thing, as many young preachers ought to do. The great demand for preachers makes it difficult to hold young men in college long enough to properly equip them for their most responsible work. He leaves the church united, with a strong membership and the Sunday-school in good order. J. H. Smart, of Waukegan, becomes his efficient successor.

The Second church of Danville was organized on the east side some four years ago. Bro. S. S. Jones, A. R. Spicer and Z. P. Coff have ministered to it; the last named is its present preacher who is carrying on a very successful work in a difficult field. The church has a good house, a membership of 165 and an enrollment of 150 in the Sunday-school.

The Third church is being built up under the care of S. S. Jones. He organized it about two years ago in a splendid part of the city. It has 250 members and a Sunday-school enrolling 200. They are about to dedicate one of the most beautiful and substantial church buildings that I have seen erected for the sum of $15,000. It is of Greek architecture, faced with fine pressed brick. The interior furnishes a large auditorium and rooms for all needed purposes, even to an elegant study. A bright future seems to be before the church.

A Fourth church, on Vermilion Heights, has just been organized with 57 members. E. M. Norton, who lives in the community, is caring for the young flock. Already plans are being considered for a house of worship. This part of the city is growing rapidly, and with wisdom and piety a strong church will be the result.

Westville, ten miles south of Danville, some years ago had a church of 300 members, but it became a great coal region; miners came in and the members moved out, so our house stands silent and alone.

Georgetown has one of the old congregations, has a beautiful house of worship partly paid for and a good Sunday-school. Bro. J. Z. Stiff, of Danville, is its minister. The town is growing and church work will doubtless prosper.

Fithian, ten miles west of Danville, has a good little church, but has been greatly weakened and discouraged by removals. E. M. Norton preaches for them every Friday evening, so they are living and keeping up the Sunday school. These changes try the faith of many and occasionally an organization is properly dissolved. But while two or three remain the Lord's supper ought to be spread every Lord's day. The few can read, pray, sing and worship the Lord together, and occasionally have the gospel preached, and save themselves, and often many more.

The church at Indianola was organized in 1900. It numbers about 100, has a good Sunday-school of 65 and a good house of worship paid for. It is without a preacher, but has a prospect of locating one soon. A. R. Spicer and E. M. Norton have been their chief ministers.

Sidell is not an old church but has 177 members, with a Sunday-school of 75. Sister Jackson, a recent Eureka student, is the energetic superintendent and president of the Junior Christian Endeavor. We are always happy to find our former students busy at the King's work. E. M. Norton is the energetic and capable minister. This is one of our strong churches.

The Oakwood church has had a hard struggle through poverty, deaths and removals, but has preaching when it can, and keeps up the Sunday-school and observes the Lord's supper each Lord's day.

The church at St. Joseph is about to employ a preacher after considerable effort. The removal of so many to the cities is making a hard time for the country and village churches. But if we can pour into our cities enough of godly families we may save them, but the work in the smaller places ought to be pushed. The church is doing a great missionary work that sends its members into the cities. The church in St. Joseph is no exception. It still has some splendid families, and will doubtless maintain the Lord's work as long as any are left.

From here our face was turned to Atlanta to the preachers' institute. It was refreshing and invigorating. The boys who were in college, it seems but yesterday, are now the strong men of the state, such as J. H. Gilliland, Pres. R. E. Hieronymus, S. H. Zandt, W. H. Cannon and Finis Idleman. Other strong preachers on the program were I. J. Spencer, W. R. Lloyd, O. E. Kelley, A. W. Taylor, et al. The institute showed very little of the shoddy, but much of the strong, solid and permanent. We have a company of great preachers in Illinois. J. G. WAGGONER.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Would you believe it? The recruiting campaign has more than tripled some of the Missouri Bible-schools, while others are just awakening to the advantages of the device, so that more than 1,000 buttons have gone out this week to an even dozen schools.

The offerings for our work must come in promptly now or you will receive "duns" beyond your expectations.

The latest statistics of the United States and Canada will be interesting, showing 153,246 in Bible-schools, an average of 85, while the great majority of the schools have less than 50, so that to make the work efficient it is advised: 1. That we encourage the better class of schools in all the states. 2. Lend a hand in increasing the averages, so as to bring up the attendance. 3. Make much more efficient our present study methods in all the schools. 4. Seek to make the entire church a school for teaching the word of God. 5. Make every possible use of all the "union" work, thereby keeping in touch with the very best and most advanced methods of the work over the country.

Higbee is one of the manifestations of what the right man can do, for the church and school had gone to its lowest ebb, with only a handful of ladies and one man in the Bible-school, S. E. Mars. Arthur Lindsay held them a meeting and then gave them regular work, and now they have one of the most interesting and efficient schools in Missouri. 1. There are two classes, large ones, of the older people. 2. The officers of the congregation are at work in the school. 3. Every teacher makes it in the way to be present on time and prepared. 4. The offerings of the school are far beyond the average of the state. 5. The school expenses are more than met by the school offerings, while the offering to our work marks a new record for Higbee, at which I rejoice. 6. The recruiting campaign will increase their numbers 100 per cent, making the outlook for the school very bright and all are to be complimented on it.

Wellsville is now much encouraged, and with the new minister the work will move after the old fashion, pushing to the front in good service for Christ.

R. B. Havener had just gotten the work in shape for the new school at Four Corners, Jasper, when called home by sickness, but Mrs. Etta Beamer does not allow a good thing to go by default, so the school is organized and our evangelists will open up another this week.

Armstrong has worked under the hindrance (serious, too,) of a "union" house, all of which will very soon be removed, as the others have built, and we shall soon be the sole occupants, which means a school with Christian literature and the whole truth taught by those anxious to bring light to the children. But the union plea has not hindered the co-operation of the church with us in this good work of Christ, neither has it hindered A. N. Lindsay from giving the people the gospel in plainness, simplicity and power, so that the fellowship has grown right along and the brethren "are talking" a new house.

"What is the special good in the home department?" asks a friend. 1. It materially increases the membership of the school, quite a gain in itself. 2. Increases the home's interest in the school and its work, another good thing. 3. Secures the homes and also home preparation of lessons, a most vital gain. 4. Adds very largely to the offerings of the school, always more than pays its way. 5. Quickens the interest of all the home membership in the general work of the church.

South Kentucky Christian Missionary and Sunday-school Association.

The thirtieth annual convention of this association will be held at Corydon from May 23 to 26. All devotional exercises will be under the supervision of R. L. Clark. Leonard Daugherty will conduct the music of the convention. The first three sessions of the convention, namely, Monday evening, Tuesday morning and Tuesday afternoon, will be under the direction of the C. W. B. M., and all who have attended our convention know that the ladies never fail to do their work remarkably well. We have some of the strongest speakers on the program that can be found in the brotherhood. Such men as A. McLean, George Gowen, G. W. Muckley and others of national reputation will deliver addresses. In addition to these some of our leading brethren in south Kentucky will also address the convention. -Corydon is a first-class place for a convention, and the brethren and the community in general are not only willing but anxious to entertain all who may be in attendance.

The usual reduction in railroad fare has been secured. We hope that every preacher in south Kentucky will call the attention of his congregation to the importance of attending this meeting, and endeavor to secure as large a delegation from his field as possible. We are anxious to pay every cent that we owe by the convention, and it will require a united effort upon the part of our preachers to accomplish this end. I know that times are hard in this tobacco district, which has greatly interfered with our receipts, but I also know that by a strong and enthusiastic effort we will be able to pay every cent that we owe by the convention.

Another matter to which I wish to call attention, namely, our books have to be placed in the hands of the auditor by May 15, so all remittances should be made prior to that time if possible. We have but a short time for work, so whatever is done for our association this convention year must be done quickly.

All money for our work should be sent to the undersigned. J. W. GANT.

The Hot Springs Work.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Brother Snively has been among us on an inspecting tour with a view to securing a site for one of their homes. Our business men have looked upon the project favorably and have appointed a committee to secure from the city or United States government a suitable location. The building of this home will bring happiness to the hearts of many of our people throughout the brotherhood.

Brother Snively is the right man in the right place. There was some opposition to the home's coming here from certain quarters, but his visit here removed this entirely, and now all our business men are greatly in favor of it and will aid in every way possible. A word about our building in a central location here. I fear you are classing this work with that of other places which wish to build. This must not be done. This is a mission field, a feeder of all our churches, and the whole brotherhood should join us in carrying this work forward to success. There were 12 additions last quarter. We paid $250 more on our lot. T. N. KINCAID.

Indiana Missionary Convention.

The state convention of the Indiana Christian missionary society will be held with the church at Lebanon May 17 to 19 inclusive. The first session will convene at 2:30 P. M. Tuesday, May 17. Prominent speakers will make the main addresses. The town of Lebanon, with its beautiful new church, bids us welcome. Half rates have been secured on the railroads from May 17 to 21, going and coming. There is interurban from Indianapolis also. No convention is more pleasant or helpful than the Indiana May meetings. Every church in the state should be represented. ALLAN B. PHILPUTT.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

A Texas leaflet, with a picture and description of the proposed school building at Monterey has come from Miss Bertha Mason, Texas secretary. I wish all could see the plain but commodious house as our board will erect it. I know Missouri's special gifts for the support of our missionaries there would roll steadily into the national treasury. Let us send our amounts soon. Cannot some auxiliaries exceed their pledge or apportionment? We shall fall short of our $2,500 in special work, otherwise; several auxiliaries have failed.

Several have asked when they must begin paying the five cents a month each member, for state work. The sooner the better, my sisters. Start at once.

Lebanon auxiliary is making Sister Emma Scott, a charter member of the auxiliary, a life member of the association.

TRAVELING TRIPPLY SAFE.

Again the Chicago & Alton comes to the front. This time it is an improvement in operation. The new plan has just been put in effect, and with its adoption the Chicago & Alton becomes theoretically at least, the safest railway in the world. The innovation consists of three specific safeguards against accidents, namely—usual telegraphic train orders, automatic electric block signals and "station block" signals. Heretofore no railway has ever applied these three precautions simultaneously. Some railways run their trains by telegraphic train orders; some abandon train orders and trust wholly to block signals, while other lines have a combined plan of train orders and "station block." The Chicago & Alton now combines the triple precautions, and in addition to train orders and automatic block signals, has established a complete system of "station blocks." These so-called "station blocks" are formed by a continuous service of telegraph operators—day and night shifts—at each station, providing by human power a system of signals which must corroborate the safety testimony of the automatic signals before the train may proceed. This trinity of precautions in train operation is so far in effect only upon the Chicago & Alton Railway, making that line, theoretically at least, the safest railway in the world.

Are you a Singing Evangelist? If you are we can supply you with appropriate music books for your work.

Remember we are headquarters for the books of Alexander Campbell. If you want to read the works of Alexander Campbell, send and get our catalogue.

If your Sunday-school needs Class Books, a Secretary's Record, Class Collection Envelopes, Treasurer's Book or Superintendent's Pocket Record, we can furnish all of these.

If you are expecting to organize a new Sunday-school, we shall be glad to send a full set of samples of our Sunday-school supplies from which you can select the needs of your new school. Write us for samples, and they will be cheerfully sent.

Our Popular Hymns No. 2, Living Praise, and Silver and Gold, continue to be the song books of the brotherhood; while Gospel Call No. 1 or 2, and the combined, are in constant demand, and will be for some time. Try them, and you'll use them.

The Pocket Record and Memorandum, by G. A. Hoffmann, seems to be filling a long felt want, or the preachers have long felt the want, but could not meet the price until this handy little memorandum was put to them at 50 cents, so that we will soon issue another edition.

Please Don't. We mean please don't send us your local check to pay for items which you may order. We are compelled to pay the St. Louis banks not less than 15 cents on every local check which we deposit. We cannot control this matter, and must pay the bank the 15 cents or more for collecting local checks. For instance if you send us a local check for $1.50, it costs us 10 per cent to collect it through our St. Louis bank. Will our friends kindly send us draft on St. Louis, New York, Chicago, Cincinnati or Philadelphia, or Post-Office Money Order or Express Money Order?

"The future, after all, will not usher in so great a change as some imagine. This mortal must put on immortality, but we will hold to the types of character which we have formed here. It may be that we take up our future life very much at the place where we lay down the present." Dr. W. T. Moore's very suggestive treatment of this subject in "Man Preparing for Other Worlds" (500 pages, crown, 8vo, $2), is but a part of an exhaustive analysis of the spiritual man's career. It is the most original book written on this subject.

Concerts for Children's Day should be ordered now. If you begin in time your Sunday-school can have ample time to thoroughly prepare the concert and thus render it in a more acceptable manner. "The Sunlit Way" is our new concert for 1904. It is composed of bright music and attractive recitations, exalting God the Giver of all good. The concert embraces 16 pages, and the price is 5 cents per copy, 55 cents per dozen, $4.25 per 100, all sent prepaid. Among other of our Children's Day concerts are "Beautiful Springtime," "The Glad Jubilee," and "Happy Voices." These are all with music, and the price is 5 cents per copy, 50 cents per dozen, $3.50 per 100.

The Bethany Christian Endeavor Reading Course Books should be read by members of the C. E. Societies. The books are worthy a place in the Sunday-school library, the private library, and in the homes of our church people. There are nine books in the series, and the low price of 35 cents each, postpaid, places them within reach of the many. The titles of the nine books are, "Concerning the Disciples," "Sketches of our Pioneers," "Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples," "A Guide to Bible Study," "Life and Teachings of Jesus," "Prophets of Israel," "Handbook of Missions," "Missionary Fields and Forces of the Disciples," "Heroes of Modern Missions."

Evangelistic

We invite ministers and others to send reports of meetings, additions and other news of the churches for publication in this department. It is especially requested that additions be reported as "by confession and baptism" or "by letter."

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

BEAUMONT, TEX., April 24.—Fifteenth day of Scoville and Smith at the tabernacle meeting. One hundred and two added; 40 today. Continuing; intense interest; 1,000 at men's meeting.—B. J. WAUGH.

ARKANSAS.

Springdale, April 18.—One added here last night.—DANIEL TRUNDLE.

COLORADO.

Boulder.—The Christian church of this city is enjoying a season of spiritual blessings for which all right thinking people will rejoice. S. M. Bernard, the minister, conducts a quiet morning service on Sundays at 11 A. M., the purpose of which is to give the people the in-filling of the Holy Spirit. A sermon is preached on one of the books of the Bible, telling the people what God's word says. This effort for spiritual blessing is not in vain. The prayer-meeting auditorium was crowded last Wednesday night with worshipers. The largest missionary offering in the history of the congregation was taken Sunday. Conversions are being witnessed at regular services. One of Boulder's brightest young ladies was baptized last night, and two middle-aged fathers have been recently converted and are awaiting baptism. Late comers were turned away Sunday night. The officers of this church realize that a great mistake has been made in building a church which holds only six hundred people. Since the above was published, a man sixty-three years old has made the good confession and been baptized, also a woman from Scotland has seen the light and obeyed her Lord in the primitive way.—Boulder Daily Herald.

FLORIDA.

Jacksonville, April 20.—We closed last Lord's day evening with 103 additions—about 80 by primary obedience. It was a glorious meeting throughout. The church is united and a power for good under the leadership of Bro. J. T. Boone. I go next to Orangeburg, S. C., where S. D. Colyer has charge. Bro. A. R. Davis, of Diamond, O., will sing.—JAMES SMALL.

ILLINOIS.

Greenville, April 21.—Last night Geo. L. Snively concluded a twelve days' meeting here with 38 additions. Fully 25 of these were heads of families, among them some of the most prominent people in the city. The house was crowded at nearly every service. The last two nights standing room was at a premium. A new era of prosperity for our cause has already dawned. Bro. J. F. Story is the faithful and efficient minister.

Mt. Pulaski, April 21.—Meeting starts off with good crowds, but the interest might be better. D. A. Lindsey, pastor, is preaching. He is all right. June of our term is not taken.—GUY B. AND MRS. WILLIAMSON, singers.

Alvin, April 18.—Two confessions at regular services at Bismarck yesterday. Reached our apportionment for foreign missions. Work prosperous.—C. T. GAUMER.

Chicago.—The Irving Park church gave a reception to their new pastor, John R. Ewers, Thursday evening, April 14. It was largely attended. Words of welcome were spoken on the part of the city ministers by Brothers Kindred and Campbell, and by local pastors by Brothers Haskins and Mainwaring of the Methodist and Baptist churches. Brother Ewers will remain in residence at the Chicago University for a time at least. The outlook is bright for the future of the work at this place.

Franklin, April 20.—Our meeting is twenty-six days old; 59 added so far. C. H. Burton is the pastor-evangelist. Fine interest, excellent attendance. We look for big results this week. I invite correspondence concerning future engagements.—JAS. S. HELM, singer.

Fisher, April 20.—Our short meeting following the dedication of our new church home resulted in nine accessions to the work. All were by confession and baptism except one reclaimed. Fifty-eight added in seventeen months.—S. ELWOOD FISHER.

Worden, April 23.—Our foreign missionary offering was $6.75, and our offering to the Benevolent association was $12.10. This does not appear to be much on the face of it, but there is a strong anti-missionary spirit to be overcome here.—WILL J. SLATER, minister.

INDIANA.

Richmond, April 17.—Our meeting with Bro. T. J. Legg as evangelist closed Lord's day, April 10, with packed houses and splendid interest. In all 72 have been added to the church; 34 by primary obedience; 30 by letter and statement; seven from the denominations, and one reclaimed. Since my coming here fifteen months ago to day, there have been in all 106 additions, fourteen confessions and twelve by letter not previously reported, while the Bible-school has increased forty per cent; a large intermediate Christian Endeavor society organized, and all departments have enjoyed a healthy growth.—J. J. WHITE.

Needham, April 19.—Meeting closed last night with 18 additions. Endeavor organized with 25 members. We begin meeting at Odon, to-night. Clarke and Stevens can be had for a few weeks' meeting. Permanent address, James K. Clarke, Kothe Block, Indianapolis, Ind.

Marion, April 21.—Work in the Tabernacle church here is moving nicely, nine in all have been received into the church since the first Sunday in April. This is a great field for young people.—W. S. BUCHANAN.

Hammond, April 18.—Forty-two additions at Hammond recently. Brother Shearer did the preaching. He is the kind of evangelist the churches need. We have had nine additions since, making 51 additions not reported. All departments of the work are in good shape.—C. J. SHARP.

Greencastle, April 22.—Allen Wilson and W. E. M. Hackleman closed a splendid meeting here Sunday, April 17. The reputation of these evangelists was well sustained. Number added, 102; the last Sunday, 23. Greencastle has not had such a meeting for years. The outlook for the future is very bright. There were 250 at prayer-meeting on Thursday night. Ten baptisms.—R. SELLERS, pastor.

IOWA.

Atlantic, April 18.—Closed a meeting last night in my home church, 52 additions.—W. B. CREWDSON.

Panora, April 19.—Chas. G. Stout has just concluded a four weeks' gospel campaign. There were 26 additions—three by statement, three by letter, one from the Christian connection, and 19 by confession. At the conclusion of the meeting the congregation gave the evangelist a reception.—J. IRVING BROWN, pastor.

Davenport, April 18.—Twelve additions since last report, and outlook promising. I start to-day to Indiana after my family, and soon we will be at home at 414 Kirkwood Boulevard, Davenport.—A. MARTIN.

Shenandoah, April 18.—One added yesterday from the M. E. church—a young man in college.—H. C. LITTLETON.

Keokuk, April 23.—Two added by letter last Sunday. More expected soon. Baptized one at prayer-meeting Wednesday evening.—J. W. KILBORN.

Irwin.—J. C. Jacobs has been here since December. Five additions. Audiences large. Planning to paper and paint church.

Rockwell City.—Nine miles southeast of here a church has been organized by J. O. Snodgrass. A new church house at the new town will doubtless be built ere long.

Des Moines.—Five confessions at Grant

Sutphen, April 18.—Nineteen conversions so far in meeting here, and several otherwise added, with a New Testament reading circle organized. All who will join the N. T. R. C. by promising to read through the New Testament at least one time within one year, please send their names to me. Edward McKinney, of Dorsey, Ill., is singing for me now.—THOS. J. EASTERWOOD.

Lyons, April 18.—Three confessed Christ yesterday at regular service.—GEO. E. LYON. Caldwell, April 18.—One added by statement yesterday.—LEE H. BARNUM.

Wellington, April 20.—Two additions last Sunday—one from the Methodists and one by primary obedience.—H. M. BARNETT.

Council Grove.—The following report from the church and pastor is a summary for the time from Jan. 1 to April 30, 1904: Number of additions by letter, five; No. by baptism, one; dismissed by letter, five; lost by death, two; No. of sermons preached, 27; amount of missionary money, $25; a three weeks' meeting by Brother Cornelius, of Hoisington, which gave us much encouragement. The work is prosperous and audiences are good.—D. S. DOMER.

MINNESOTA.

Eagle Lake, April 22.—One added by letter.—J. P. CHILDS.

MISSOURI.

Marceline, April 18.—One confession the second Lord's day in this month and five more last Sunday.—A. MUNYON, pastor.

Boonville, April 18.—Two conversions yesterday.—H. N. MCKEE, pastor.

St. Louis, April 19.—There were four accessions by confession at the Fourth church in this city last Lord's day.—E. T. McFARLAND.

Kirkville, April 19.—The Fair-green, Coffee-grove church is on the boom. Have organized three Sunday-schools and reconstructed one church. We will have children's day exercises at each of the four Sunday-schools. Our time is all taken. Truly the Lord has led us in pleasant places.—WM. MONDY.

Palmyra.—In the Brooks-Jones meeting there were 25 additions to the church. A splendid meeting for an old town like Palmyra. Brother Brooks captivated the town. His fearless preaching and social qualities are largely responsible for the success.—W. HENRY JONES.

NEBRASKA.

Red Cloud, April 21.—Work opens up encouragingly here. Have recently had two additions, one by statement and one by baptism.—E. C. DAVIS.

NEW MEXICO.

Roswell, April 22.—I am assisting Bro. C. C. Hill in a meeting here as soloist and leader of song. To date there have been five additions. Good crowds and interest. Brother Hill is getting this church in fine shape and is by far the best preacher in Roswell, as many have told me. Brother Hill will not use the "dry stall" baptism formerly used by some of our preachers here. He says, "They both went down into the water."—L. D. SPRAGUE.

NEW YORK.

Buffalo, April 18.—Yesterday a day of good audiences and interest. A fine young man confessed Christ in the evening. Z. T. Sweeney was with us April 10 and to a splendid congregation delivered an address that shall not soon be forgotten. Home missions next.—B. S. FERRALL, Jefferson St.

OHIO.

Collinwood, April 21.—The annual meeting of the Collinwood church of Christ was held Wednesday evening, April 20. Supper was served from six to seven o'clock. Encouraging reports were read from all the different departments of the church work such as evidenced a healthy condition of the church. The amount raised during the year for all purposes was $1,846.22. Of this $173.48 was for missions and church extension; $210 was raised in a few minutes for the payment on an indebtedness incurred by reason of an unexpected increase in incidental expenses. It was one of the best meetings held by the church in years.—D. R. KING.

Akron.—The Broad street church of Christ observed passion week as decision week in the Sunday-school. A. W. Place, of the Fourth church of Christ, gave a stereopticon lecture each night on the scenes of the corresponding day of our Lord's passion, illustrated by pictures by Tissot and other noted artists, followed by sermons by the pastor. There were 19 confessions and two by letter. One confession since the meeting. M. B. Ryan, of Glennville, was with us in a three weeks' meeting in February and did us great good.—G. W. MOORE.

Columbus, April 18.—Great day yesterday. Jubilee services in honor of the first hundred additions during the present pastorate of seven months. We had received 102, of whom 47 had been baptized. The house was crowded at both services and there were five more additions. The number of men in middle life among the 107 is remarkable. We have a fine start on the second hundred additions, which we hope to reach before the close of my first year. No church ever stood more loyally by a preacher than this excellent Central church. We have also paid off more than $500 of debts and raised more than $400 for missions.—WALTER SCOTT PRIEST.

Ravenna, April 18.—Nine received into fellowship since last report: five by confession and four by letter; 185 in Sunday-school last Sunday, being the largest attendance without an extra effort in many years. Twenty additions to the Christian Endeavor society.—M. J. HUBBELL, Sunday-school superintendent.

Mansfield, April 20.—Twenty-four added here since last report.—HOWARD CRAMBLETT.

Martins Ferry, April 20.—The first quarter of this year has shown most encouraging growth. Additions to the church 43; to the young people's mission band 75. The Christian Endeavor has just doubled its membership and the Sunday-school shows an almost equally good record, while attendance at prayer-meeting and Sunday services has multiplied fully threefold. Better still, the spiritual life of the church is showing equal growth.—G. F. ASSITER, minister.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Edmond, April 18.—The Minton-Stanley meeting is booming. Thirteen conversions to date. House crowded to its utmost capacity. Hundreds turned away.—W. M. HUNT.

The Natural Man and the Spiritual Man.

In the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of March 24, I notice what Brother Creason and yourself have said in explanation of that somewhat difficult and much misinterpreted Scripture, 1 Cor. 2:14: "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God," etc.

While, with Brother C., I appreciate as true all you have said, I do not think such to be the teaching of the passage in question.

I agree with Brother C. that we must interpret the passage in the light of its context; and I think he has correctly presented its general scope in his article. But, it appears to me, his conclusion fails to present the exact point in Paul's reasoning.

It should be observed that the terms, "natural man" and "spiritual man," stand in exact antithesis in this passage. The things that are affirmed of the "spiritual man" are precisely the things denied of the "natural man." If, therefore, we can definitely fix the import of the term "spiritual man," we shall easily discover the meaning of the term "natural man."

It is pertinent to inquire, first, what are "the things of the Spirit?" and, second, by what means have they been made known to the children of men?

As to "the things of the Spirit," the last clause of verse 9 declares them to be "the things which God hath prepared for them that love him"—things which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man."

As to the means by which they have been made known to men, Paul continues (v. 10), "But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit"; and (v. 13), "Which things, also, we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth."

Clearly, then, the "spiritual man" is one endowed with the "divine Spirit, that he may know the things of the Spirit of God and make them known to men in the words of the Spirit. Such was Paul and such were all the inspired apostles of Christ.

Follows it not, then, that the "natural man," as contradistinguished from the "spiritual man," is one without such endowment of the divine Spirit, and hence unable by the mere power of reason and the light of nature to discover the scheme of redemption in which the Holy Spirit, through the apostles, has revealed the rich provisions which God has made for those that love him?

The scope of Paul's reasoning, it appears to me, is to show the utter futility of human attainment and human reason to discover the wisdom of God as revealed in the gospel; and thus to demonstrate that our faith stands, not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.

Union of Christians—"How?"

The editorial in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of April 7, under the title "Consolidating the Churches," ought to be printed in tract form. There ought to be enough copies printed to give one to every member of the church of Christ and every member of every denomination.

About seventy-five years ago some true Christians decided, in the interest of peace and union, to make a bold effort to reach the goal toward which the sixteenth century reformers started—an actual return to the New Testament pattern of preaching and church building. They preached the same gospel the apostles preached on the day of pentecost. Such preaching had not been heard on earth for centuries.

There were men and women "not a few" who gladly received this same old gospel and "were obedient to the faith," the same faith which was "once for all delivered to the saints." Did their "obedience of faith" bring them into some one of the denominations? If so, which one? Which denomination brings in its members that way? These believers could not scripturally call themselves a denomination, not even the Campbellite denomination. Individually they were believers, disciples, brethren, saints, Christians. Collectively they could not scripturally call themselves anything less than the church of Christ.

In this return to the New Testament pattern of preaching and church building we find the scriptural solution of the problem of Christian union.

Keeping ourselves within scripture limits, we see but one plan of Christian union, and that is to gather all believers in Christ into the one body, the church of Christ; to gather converts from the world by preaching the gospel, and to gather from the denominations all Christians who are willing to drop all unscriptural names, doctrines and practices, and be Christians only.

It is not our mission as disciples of Christ to take a place as a denomination among the denominations, nor to pursue a noncommittal course that will lead people to think that we do not disapprove of denominationalism. It is not our duty to devise some plan of Christian union; the Lord himself has given the plan in his word. There are Christians, many Christians, our brethren in Christ, in the denominations; they are Christians, not because of, but in spite of, denominational names and peculiarities. We ask no such brother to give up his faith in Christ; we only ask him to give up the things that are unknown to the scriptures and to add to his faith the scriptural things that are carefully ignored by the denominations. We need more of the love of Christ, the love that will not leave a brother alone while he is in the bondage of denominationalism.

Brethren, is this ground too high and too holy for us to stand upon? The Christian's calling is a high and holy calling. What other position have we a scriptural right to occupy?

ALLEN HICKEY.

The Natural Man, Who Is He?—1 Cor. 2:14.

To justify Paul's affirmation of his not receiving the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned, it must harmonize with Paul's other teachings and the teaching of the apostles. Can it be done? I think it can. Peter declared: "God according to his divine power hath given us all things that are necessary to life and godliness." Paul says: "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth." To the Jew first and also to the Greek Jesus said, "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," that language must include Paul's natural man. But why preach it to a man who cannot know the things taught? And is it just to condemn a man who disbelieves when he cannot know the things of the Spirit or the gospel plan of salvation? The purpose of the gospel is to save men, it is the seed of the kingdom and possessed of divine wisdom, love and power preached or sowed to make believers. Is it a failure? No. "My work shall not return to me void or without results. It shall accomplish that whereunto I sent it." "It is a discernment of the thoughts and intents of the heart." The devil believed there was power sufficient in the word to make men believe or else he would not have snatched it out of the heart to prevent the sinner from believing. These things being true, how shall we explain the "natural man"? He represents the condition of all men before the plan of salvation was revealed to the world by the supernatural or inspired man—or the spiritual man. It, the plan, was yet incomplete when Paul taught this lesson—it had not yet entered into the heart of man, because the Holy Spirit had not shown it to him. And the uninspired man could not receive it or know its plan until revealed. The spiritual man is the "mesotees," the middle man, between God and the natural man, who could and did receive the things of the Spirit and preached them to all the world for their acceptance and salvation. There is now that the scheme of salvation is complete, no excuse for disbelief and no natural man, in Paul's sense of the term, except where there is no New Testament.

A Lament.

It is not often I find occasion to criticize anything in your truly excellent paper. My debt to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is very great, notwithstanding my subscription is paid ahead. My way of estimating things is largely due to the influence of your paper, so that as a rule whatever I see therein seems to me to be there almost by right divine. But now I confess I am stumped to know by what manner of means the second of the alleged "Two Poems" upon the front cover of a recent issue contrived to elude the literary sentinel and slip in. "The Philosopher." Gadzooks! The author must have been under the influence of "Science and Health" or had just heard some Campbellite preacher railing against "philosophy and theology" as opposed to primitive and pure Christianity. Surely he is wholly innocent of "logic," though he may have the "wheels" all right. I doubt whether he has the "chance sparks of sense and mother-wit" in sufficient quantities to "kindle the nations" and set the world on fire, though I am prepared to believe that all the wit he has, came from his mother. I can see no evidence that he has acquired any by original research.

Say, what did you print it for? Some preacher going forth from an English Bible course will proceed to annihilate all the philosophies and quote this poem (?) as a literary embellishment of his discourse. You will be to blame for this. If you print any more poems (?) like this, you can stop my paper. I won't stand for it. So there now, it's back up to you again already.

Yours in grief,

Independence, Mo. CHAS. M. SHARPE.

[Brother Sharpe's scintillant and illuminating critique illustrates the truth of the poem against which it is leveled. It is one of those "chance sparks" flung off from the wheel while he polishes his philosophical system. The outstanding truth which the poem embodied, and which was our reason for publishing it, is that the by products of philosophizing are frequently of more general interest and value than those results which the philosopher himself supposed to be of the first importance.—EDITOR]

The Edge of Things. By Elia W. Peattie (Revell).

A story of the far west, the plot concerning itself mostly with the occupants of two lonely sheep ranches in the plains of California. Dilling Brown, just from college and the east, settles in a deserted adobe house with two herders, a Chinese cook and a dog for companions. On inquiry he learns that the former occupants were a young girl and her brother, the latter having gone insane from the loneliness and desolation. How he is saved from a like fate and his quest of the girl, which takes him into the wilds of Alaska, make an interesting tale. Interwoven with this is the heart story of Papin (Brown's nearest neighbor), his adventures with the wily Lee Hung and thieving "greasers." It is, on the whole, well told, and makes a pleasant evening's reading.

Order No. 11. A Tale of Border Life. By Caroline Abbot Stanley (Century Co. 1904). That great national upheaval known as our civil war has begun in recent years to yield the best fiction which it has yet produced. "The Crisis," "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come," and "Order No. 11" are capable and praiseworthy efforts to give the younger readers of to-day a picture of the life and times preceding, during and immediately following the civil war. The last mentioned is fully the equal in literary merit of the two others mentioned, and we predict will prove quite as popular. The scene of the story is laid in Jackson county, near Independence, in the western part of Missouri, and the story is a faithful portraiture of the life in that section, and in many other parts of Missouri, just prior to the civil war, and of the terrible scenes which were enacted there during the war, and of the sad havoc wrought by the desolation of war. The author, Mrs. Caroline Abbot Stanley, whose picture we furnish herewith, possesses peculiar qualifications for such a task as she has undertaken in this book. Her father was a New Englander and her mother was a Virginian, and she is a native of Callaway county and familiar from her childhood with the scenes amid which the plot of her story is laid. She manifests keen insight into the characteristics of the people of the two sections, their faults and their virtues, and has shown the skill of the artist in the way she has grouped her characters, scenes and situations. It is a remarkably strong story, and those of us who have passed through such experiences as are therein narrated can testify to the truthfulness of the picture she has drawn. There were lights as well as shadows in those trying times, and there were heroes and heroines who deserved to be embalmed in literature for the nobility of their character. Mrs. Stanley has made a valuable contribution to American fiction, and has shown that the historical novel, though subject to abuse, has an important function in making live again, before the eyes of this generation, the stirring scenes and the heroic men and women of the past.

DILLARD.

Clarice, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Dillard, born Jan. 28, 1891, after three months' patient struggle with pneumonia and valvular rupture of the heart, died April 14, 1904, at Mexico, Mo. She was a member of the church, prominent in the Junior Band and Sunday-school work. She was bright, happy, energetic, and a favorite among those of her age and classes. Many floral tributes came to help cheer the sad hearts. Bros. Abbott and Surber, passing from the Missouri Lecture-ship, assisted at the funeral. The many friends of Bro. Dillard all over the state will sympathize with him and his family in their great loss.

McGHEE.

James McGhee, son of David and Pelena McGhee, was born in Tennessee, 1822, and died near Butler, Mo., March 2, 1904. He became a Christian in middle life, influenced by his wife Eliza, the mother of all his children, and who preceded him to the better home. He leaves a widow (second wife) and four children. The county paper said that "we will venture to say that his life has been such that he had not an enemy in the world." Deceased was the father of M. B. McGhee, a well known brother and minister now residing in Los Angeles, Cal.

PEDEN.

Melvin L. Peden, the estimable young pastor of the church at Gibsonburg, O., died of consumption, April 18. Bro. Peden was a young man of much promise, and much loved by his church and others who knew him. He leaves a wife and one little son. The funeral services were conducted by myself assisted by L. A. Warren, pastor of the Central Christian church of Toledo, and the Methodist Episcopal, United Brethren and Evangelical pastors of Gibsonburg.

STEWART.

William J. Stewart was born in Nashville, Tenn., June 9, 1833. He removed to Madison county, Mo., in 1853, which he made his home until his death, which occurred April 7, 1904. He was married Jan. 10, 1861 to Miss Sarah Counts, who, with three children, survives him. Bro. Stewart became a member of the church of Christ at Higdon Chapel in Madison county, Mo., in the spring of 1865, and when called home and for many years before, was one of the elders of that congregation. Bro. Stewart was one of the oldest residents of this county and was esteemed by all who knew him. He was a very influential and useful citizen, and as a slight token of their estimation of him, his fellow-citizens had honored him with many of the minor public offices. While at the time of his death he was engaged in farming, for many years he was a teacher, both in the public schools and of music. He was an earnest, faithful follower of his Master, and his taking away will leave, in the congregation of which he was an elder, a vacancy that cannot well be filled. It is sweet to be able to pass away as our brother at the end, to be able to face the grim enemy without a fear or a tremor, to look upon death, not as a calamity, but as only an opportunity to pass higher, to meet not the black darkness of night, but the roselate glow of the eternal morning. During the last few months of his life, he was a great sufferer, but in all these months, he never complained, but bore his sufferings patiently, meekly and with the fortitude of a true soldier of the cross. At the funeral services the choir sang, by request of the family, A. J. Buchanan's beautiful

A MILLION FROM A MILLION LEAVES A MILLION MORE.

That is to say, a million dollars from a million disciples for Home Missions would not impoverish, but enrich. Every heart would be rich toward God. Every contributor would be confident of treasure laid up in heaven. The cause of Christ would be set forward a decade. We ought to average one dollar a member for Home Missions.

We are asking for only $200,000 this year to answer the appeals which already amount to double our spendable income of last year.

The Legend of the Snowdrop.

By Agnes W. Storer.

A garden lay bare, and brown, and cold,
One day when the world was not as old
As the world we know to day.
Flowers were snug in their warm earth-bed,
Dreams of summer in each pretty head,
Sweet dreams of the month of May.
One stalk was there without a flower,
Little green leaves its only dower,
And it sighed for blossoms gay.
"I will go seek me bright petals fair,
Brave I will be to do, and to dare,
Through the earth I'll push my way."
So up through the earth so hard and brown
It pushed, to what once was flower-town,
All on that cold and wintry day.
Brown ghosts—the flowers bright last year—
Stood stiff and rustling in ranks so sere,
No petals to give had they!
The poor little stalk with bare, green head,
Almost discouraged, quite faintly said,
"Oh, where are the flowers gay?
I'll unfold my leaves and look around,
Perhaps one sunbeam can yet be found
To warm me with his bright ray."
Now the sun that day was not in view,
But silver-lined clouds of dark gray hue
Dropped snowflakes to earth away.
The green little stalk stood brave and straight,
Wondering what was to be its fate
If the cold white snow should stay.
But two soft snowflakes in pity fell
On its poor bare head, and hid it well,
As they close together lay.
"We will take care of you, dear, wee thing,
Keep you quite safely until the spring!"
So the snowflakes white did say.
And while they lay on the small, green stalk,
Jack Frost passed by, just out for a walk,
On that cold, late winter's day.
He saw the snowflakes together lie,
And, pausing, breathed o'er them—like a sigh—
"May you thus forever stay!"
Next morning a wonder did appear,
The snowflakes were petals white and clear,
Set in ordered, fair array.
The little green head was now the heart
Of a lovely blossom, set apart
As herald of spring's first day.
And that is how the first snowdrop came,
And its namesakes now look just the same,
Demure and sweet, although not gay,
As in the garden, bare, brown and cold,
They grow each spring, if the world is old,
The world that we know to day.

The Passion Play of the Ancient Penitentes.

By Henry Greenwood.

In several localities in Colorado and New Mexico it was once the practice to literally nail the hands of the acting Christ to the timbers of the cross, but the Catholic priests of this generation put a stop to that. There is no doubt that people have died from the tortures of the Passion Play. Only two years ago the government Indian agent in the San Rita mountains reported several deaths among the Penitentes, because of poisoning by the cactus thorns and the dreadful lashing the men had endured in the hour of their fanaticism. The Penitentes believe that no death is so exalted as that caused by participation in the acting of the travail of the Lord.

After the first half hour of noise and flagellation about the cross at El Calvario the excitement dies away. The crucified man, whose arms and legs are now black under the bonds, must be suffering indescribable pain, but he only exclaims occasionally in Spanish, "Peace, peace, peace," while the Penitentes who have had no part in the self-abnegation and punishment prostrate themselves silently about the cross. A motion of the hand from the piper, and the spectators bow their bared heads in reverential attitude.

Save for the hysterical sobbing, moaning and suppressed sobs of the women, there is now not a sound. The weird pathos of the scene is indescribable. The clear, mellow afternoon sun of that region pours down. The picture of that great rude cross, bearing a semi-nude, blood-stained, agonized man stretched upon it; the groups of barefoot, weeping, disheveled men and women all about; the solitude of the rugged, barren hills, backed by mountains towering in untellable sublimity, is one that will long abide with even the most prosaic or hardened onlooker.

As the sun slowly descends behind the loftiest mountain peaks, and the first shadows of twilight are thrown across the valley of El Verde, the piper rises to his feet, and blowing a long, harsh air upon his flute, leads a procession of the people back to the village. Some of the leading Penitentes remain behind, and when the spectators and others have gone away, they lift the cross from the earth and lower its burden. The cords of cowhide are removed, and the pseudo Christ, who is now probably unconscious from long and dreadful bondage, is lifted from the timbers.

Following the biblical narrative of the scenes on Calvary, the body of the actor is wrapped about with a mass of white fabric, and is carried to a dugout cave in the hillside near at hand. Several women in black serapes, with tearful eyes, who have been appointed to impersonate the Marys and Marthas, follow some distance behind, all the time violently weeping and lamenting.

In the cave the bleeding and tortured body of the chief actor is nursed to strength. If the man is of endurance and rugged physical strength he will probably be ready to go home to his family in the evening, conscious of having made ample atonement for long years of sin.—The Pilgrim.

When Miss Edith Wyatt was at Bryn Mawr college she was known as "the girl in the cheering-up business." Homesick girls, discouraged girls, girls who were behind in their studies and tired students went to her for a bit of sunshine and encouragement, and they always found it. She radiated cheerfulness. There is a great opening in the "cheering-up business." There is plenty of room in it for everybody, and it does not interfere with any other vocation. Make it a hobby, if you want to be happy and successful. You may do more good in it than in your regular vocation, and it may be the best investment you ever made. Try it. "Keep the brightest trail," said an Indian, when asked by Bishop Baker, in pioneer days, the best route across the plains to the Rocky mountains. This was good advice before the railroads were built; it is just as good to-day. It may be applied universally. Keep the brightest trail this year. Leave the dark, gloomy, subterranean passages. Leave gloom, anxiety, worry, and discouragement behind. Face the sun.—Success.

The Child Eternal.*By Irene Fowler Brown.

I heard their prayers and kissed their sleepy eyes,
And tucked them in all warm from feet to head,
To wake again with morning's glad sunrise—
Then came where he lay dead.
On cold, still mouth I laid my lips. Asleep
He lay, to wake the other side God's door,
My other children mine to love and keep,
But this one mine no more.

Those other children long to men have grown—
Strange, hurried men who give me passing thought,
Then go their ways. No longer now my own,
Without me they have wrought.
So when night comes, and seeking mother's knee,
Tired childish feet turn home at eventide,
I fold him close—the child that's left to me,
My little lad who died.

*Harper's Magazine.Taking Out Christianity.

Norah had a model village, and she never tired of setting it up. "What kind of a town is that, Norah?" asked her father. "Is it a Christian town or a heathen town?"

"Oh, a Christian town," Norah answered, quickly.

"Suppose we make it a heathen town?" her father suggested. "What must we take out?"

"The church," said Norah, setting it to one side.

"Is that all?"

"I suppose so."

"No, indeed," her father said. "The public school must go. There are no public schools in heathen lands. Take the public library, too," her father directed.

"Anything else?" Norah asked, sadly.

"Isn't there a hospital over there?"

"But, father, don't they have hospitals?"

"Not in heathen countries. It was Christ who taught us to care for the sick and the old."

"Then I must take out the Old Ladies' Home," said Norah, very soberly.

"Yes, and that Orphans' Home at the other end of that town."

"Why, father," Norah exclaimed, "there is not a good thing left! I wouldn't live in such a town for anything! Does knowing about Jesus make all that difference?"—Selected.

A Railroad Ambulance.

On every large railway system there is a train not scheduled on the time-card, but just as essential to maintaining the service as any of the limiteds or locals. It is a passenger train, but the passengers pay no fare. It consists merely of two or three freight cars and a caboose, yet when it starts over the road everything else on wheels must give it precedence. If the president himself is en route in his special of private cars, he must take the side track until it passes by. As Kipling puts it:

Oh, the Empire State must learn to wait,
And the Cannon-ball go hang,
When the West-bound's ditched,
And the tool-car's hitched,
And it's way for the Breakdown Gang!

This special train has been dubbed the "Wrecker." Really it is a relief train, ready to respond to any call for aid in case of accident.

The man who would be a wrecker must have what his fellows call "grit," must be quick-witted and quick-motivated, and must be an expert machinist. It is not an easy task for the wreck master to select a force having all these qualities, and his gang are picked men from the best on the company's pay roll. And size counts for much also. Two or three little men are valuable, for there are many nooks and corners in and under the torn and twisted cars where they can work with hammer and wrench, where a big man could not move. For the same reason a few left-handed men are desirable. If a railroader has ever been a sailor, he is given preference in selection, for there are so many ropes and chains to be fastened to the wreck to pull it apart that the seaman's knowledge of knot and splice is of much value.—Booklovers Magazine.

With the Children

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

The Green Witch.

CHAPTER VIII.—CONCLUDED.

George got his hat, and without further words followed Spot to the stable. He stood in the street until the son of his employer appeared riding one of the carriage horses at a cautious walk. It was dark, and the barn stood between them and discovery from Mr. Stoner's house. Spot rode up beside the fence, and George mounted behind him. They left town on the road that led in an opposite direction from "Hobbs's Addition." They faced the north, and the frosty air stung their cheeks. After about a mile's progress between well-kept farms, Spot turned the horse west just as the moon rose. They entered an extensive wood. It looked wild and beautiful in its autumn dress, with the moonbeams bordering the crimson mantles with silver. The barbed wire fence on either hand, and the rough, ill-worked road, were the only evidences of the domination of a civilized race. Spot's fancy, fertilized by highly-seasoned fiction, put crouching savages behind the thickets, and charged each sudden sound to a fleeing moccasin.

"If you fall sick," said George, "I shall not ride, for I wouldn't take anyone's horse without his knowledge."

"Oh, very well," said Spot shortly, "this way is about as good as the main road, anyhow."

"You mustn't get sick," George said with decision. "I don't like this business. I don't like mysteries. It isn't that I mind walking so far,—I'd walk twice as far to help you out of difficulty. But not knowing what your trouble is, and what it means when I write your name—"

"We mustn't talk," said Spot. "If we are overheard and it's found out who I am, and that I am riding to the cattle-shed when I was ordered to walk,—it would just end the whole thing, and me with it."

"Then why didn't you walk?"

"Because it's pleasanter to ride. But keep still. And keep your eye open for landmarks so you won't lose your way if you have to come alone in the dark."

The wood was left behind and they entered the open prairie. Then came a second wood, wilder than the first, and in its midst Spot checked the horse and, dismounted. George followed his example. Spot fastened the horse to a tree and said, speaking in a husky whisper, "You stay here. I'm going to the cattle-shed. It's right over yonder on the other side of that tall oak. You mustn't come a step nearer, or you might be seen. The bargain is that I come alone, or anyone I get to come for me, he must come alone. If they find you here with the horse, don't tell that I came with you. But if you'll keep real still, there's no danger of your being caught."

The expression "being caught" affected George as disagreeably as any incident of the night's adventure. He was left alone. The moon seemed to stare down upon him and wonder what he was doing there. The horse stamped restlessly. The air was filled with a continuous murmur, which came from the right. After waiting a long time, as it appeared to him, he crept to the edge of the thicket and looked in the direction of the melancholy sound. It was caused by a waterfall. Before him stretched an open space, sloping down to a creek. A shelf of rock ran across the stream and over this the water splashed, falling about six feet. In the clearing the autumn leaves lay drifted. Near the margin of the stream a dead sycamore lay prostrate, its bare limbs tortured into strange shapes. George was reminded of the "Green Witch." Was this the waterfall, and this the log where she had sung her incantations? The place was about five miles from town—just the distance at which Bill Klupertack had discovered the girl. George stared as intently at the place as the moon stared at him; but nothing save the splash of waters and the stamping of the horse broke the silence till Spot's return.

"It took you a long time to write your name," muttered George reproachfully.

"But I had to circle about and pretend to be walking from town," whispered Spot. "I hate pretending as much as you do. Oh, if a fellow could only be straightforward and frank and open!"

They mounted the horse and returned home without incident.

Bertha Beesley, Moselle, Mo.: "My school was to have closed Friday, March 25. On Thursday afternoon I walked home with one of my pupils, intending to spend the evening with her. At 7 P. M. it began to rain, and I had to stay all night. Friday morning it was still raining. There was a creek between me and the school-house, and I couldn't cross it, as it was now a river, swollen by rains, and carrying logs, fencing—everything it found in its course. About 9 A. M. the rain grew lighter, the creek subsided, and about 1 we were able to cross it on horseback. No one had been to school on account of the streams. I had another to cross before my boarding place was reached. My horse did not know the banks very well, and slipped and entangled herself, but I kept my presence of mind and didn't scream; she finally scrambled out. Papa drove 17 miles to reach me that day, but the streams delayed him till 7 in the evening. So I didn't teach the last day—the only day I missed. Our return trip was none too soon, as the river submerged part of the road a few hours later. I like 'The Green Witch,' and wish there were more boys like George in reality as well as fiction. But I hope there are few girls like Flora. How shall we wear our colors? As college colors are worn? The colors are old gold and pale blue, are they not? I hope to meet many Av. S. members at the St. Louis Fair, (Yes, old gold and blue. Wear 'em so they can be seen—outside. As to whether there are few or many girls like Flora Stoner, I'd like to have the opinion of our members. As I understand Flora, she had a good heart, but thought more of appearances than she ought. George Clayton was quite a model boy when we last read about him, but perhaps you'll find before we are done with him, that he had some weaknesses like the rest of us. Indeed, if he was always good, I'd cut him out of my story; I'd know he wasn't sure enough.) Ada Miller, Rich Hill, Mo., orders a gold Av. S. pin. Please remember it takes some time for me to get them from New York to you. I don't carry Av. S. pins in my pocket, because I might get robbed, the world is so bad. Vessie Porter, Hiawatha, Kansas—the town, I presume, was named after the song, so it must be a new thing—has 30 little chickens and gets 80 eggs every day, so they must have some old ones about there, too. She says: "I am going to raise some turkeys this summer, so if I do, you" (namely J. B. E. and not the Av. S. members) "must come and see me next fall and we will eat one; but I musn't count my turkeys before they are hatched." If Vessie can't hold a better hand to turkey than I, I'm afraid we two couldn't accomplish a whole one. She bakes bread, pies, cakes, and when she was 11, kept house two weeks while her mamma was away visiting. J. Claude Callaway, Marshfield, Mo., is not a member of the Av. S., but sends 10 cents for Little Joe. He says, "I am nine years old and have a calf, two lambs and some guineas. I hope to be able to do more for Little Joe some time." Well, many a person is nine years old and only has one lamb, to say nothing of a calf. M. J. O'Dell, of Lebanon, Mo., recently visited St. Louis and intended going to see Little Joe, but the death of a relative prevented her visit. Miss O. B. Willan, Sunnyside Farm, Morgantown, Ind., though not a member of the Av. S., sent a dollar as an Easter offering for our little orphan down at St. Louis. What a pleasant name for a home! Helen Ross, Independence, Mo., says they have a debating society at school, which they find very helpful. Different ones debate each time, and they have a nice time in it. She likes "The Green Witch," and is interested in the green witch herself. The gripe has done one good thing. It kept Mary Huffaker at home (Lexington, Mo.), so she was able to write out her Av. S. reports, which school and music had interfered with before. She likes "Green Witch" better than "The Runaways." Donnie Swift, Billings, Mo., asks what has become of Gussie Torren. Has anybody seen her? Jessie V. Underwood, Boyd, Ore., thinks I misunderstood what she said about the new coat with the nine fur tails, but I didn't—I was just joking. When she wrote, she had been having a sleigh-ride. When Edna Bear, Iberia, Mo., wrote, snow covered trees and fences, and she thought it a good time for the great Av. S. sleigh-ride. However, as that was in January, likely enough every flake has melted by this time. By the way, I've just run across a letter by Helen Ross, which hasn't been printed.

Helen Ross: "My first letter in 1904! I am going to write the first to you. I wish the whole Av. S. a happy new year. I wish all of us success in our undertakings, but especially success to Little Joe! I am glad we adopted an American orphan. I hope the Av. S. had as merry a Christmas as I had." (This sounds a little behind the time, but it will do just as well for next Christmas.) "I have read another of your books, 'The Dread and Fear of Kings.' I advise the members, if they want to read a good book, to read this one. I liked it fine. I got it out of our public library." (I think the reason this letter wasn't printed sooner, modesty shrank from this mention of my novel. However, there it is, and so you can go and buy it if you want to; it costs $1.25.) From Nebraska comes a dollar for the Av. S. orphan, signed "A Well-wisher." Edith E. Catlin, Decatur, Ill., writes, "I hasten to send something for the orphan before the fund is all raised. I wish I could send more, but every little helps." She sends a quarter, and is not a member, but always reads our page. From Chicago comes a dollar—no name given. Ruth Sampsel received Christmas "a pair of kid gloves, a big sack of candy and a severe cold." They now have a rural free delivery a mile from the house, "much handier," she says, "than 8 miles to town." Warrensburg, Mo. Manie Bayless, Mulkeytown, Ill., has barely been able to do her Av. S. reading lately. We hope by this time she is strong again. W. G. Mershon writes from Nashville, Tenn.: "When at home I live only three blocks from our Orphan Home, and will go some day and see our orphan. I inclose 25 cents to help take care of the baby. I suppose it will be necessary to raise the $50 each year, so you can count on me for a small amount." (Good! I wish the members would get to thinking about next year's fund; I don't mean to send the money now, unless you feel like it, but just get to thinking about what you'll send. It comes lots easier when you've thought it over and just let it soak in your mind.) Idelpha A. Peacock, West Sebewa, Mich., is 16, has belonged to the church four years, and teaches the infant Sunday-school class. She would like to correspond with some of the members. She likes Michigan. She says, "It is a pretty good place to live in. Last winter floods from snows were all over the state. In many cities people had to row to their place of business. But this has not happened in many years; don't get a wrong impression of the state." (Certainly not. One could just lay in a skiff with the spring provisions and be ready.) "I send two new names—my friend, Jessie C. — Waring, and my cousin, Clarice I. Goodemoot." I do wish I could print the rest of these letters on my table.

YOU ARE TO BE THE JUDGE

It Was True
12 Years Ago

And it is True Now

Read What a Michigan Man Says to Prove It

HERMANVILLE, MICH.—I had been pronounced incurable of Bright's Disease by three eminent physicians, when I commenced using Vitæ-Ore. I weighed about 100 pounds, but in three months I weighed 145 pounds and was well and hearty. Have not suffered with my kidneys since, and it was twelve years since I first used the V.-O. I am now fifty-six years old and believe I am good for thirty years yet if I can have V.-O.

W. H. NORCROSS.

NOT NEW, BUT TRUE!

Daniel Webster once said about a certain political proposition, "There are lots of new things about it and lots of true things, but the trouble is that the NEW things are not TRUE and the TRUE things are not NEW."

Thirty days' trial—the proprietors take all the risk—you have nothing to lose! You are to be the judge.

You have seen it before—all of you have. It has appeared in this paper a dozen times a year for a number of years. You have all seen it, even though you may not have answered it. It is not new, but it is all true. You have but to write, to send for it, to direct that it be sent to you—and it is sent to you. No questions, no quibbling, no money. If you want to pay for it, all right. If you don't, you don't have to. Enough are satisfied, enough want to pay, enough do pay to make it pay the advertiser, to make its fame grow from year to year like a green-bay tree, and it is because it is all true. The claims for Vitæ-Ore are not new, but they are all true. Your fellow-readers who have sent for a package and tested it have proven this. Its history is an open book that all may read, and all will find it all true.

If you are sick and ailing, no matter what the trouble may be, if you need help, if you want help, here is the help for you. How can you, in justice to yourself and your family, your friends and the world around you, refuse to accept? How can you refuse to be helped to the help you want? Remember, we take all the risk! You are to be the judge. IT IS ALL TRUE!

SENT ON 30 DAYS' TRIAL READ THIS SPECIAL OFFER!

WE WILL SEND to every worthy sick and ailing person, who writes us, mentioning the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, a full-sized $1 package of VITÆ-ORE, by mail, POSTPAID, sufficient for one month's treatment, to be paid for within one month's time after receipt, if the receiver can truthfully say that its use has done him or her more good than all the drugs and doses of quacks or good doctors or patent medicines he or she has ever used. Read this over again carefully, and understand that we ask our pay only when it has done you good, and not before. We take all the risk; you have nothing to lose. If it does not benefit you, you pay us nothing. We give you thirty days' time to try the medicine, thirty days to see results before you need pay us one cent, and you do not pay the one cent unless you do see the results. You are to be the judge! We know that when this month's treatment of VITÆ-ORE has either cured you or put you on the road to a cure, you will be more than willing to pay. We know Vitæ Ore, and are willing to take the risk.

What Vitæ-Ore is: Vitæ-Ore is a natural, hard, adamant, rock-like substance—mineral—Ore—mined from the ground like gold and silver in the neighborhood of a once powerful, but now extinct, mineral spring. It requires twenty years for oxidation by exposure to the air, when it slacks down like lime, and is then of medicinal value. It contains free iron, free sulphur, and free magnesium, three properties which are most essential for the retention of health in the human system, and one package—one ounce—of the ORE, when mixed with a quart of water, will equal in medicinal strength and curative value 800 gallons of the most powerful mineral water drunk fresh from the springs. It is a geological discovery, in which there is nothing added or taken from. It is the marvel of the century for curing such diseases as Rheumatism, Bright's Disease, Blood Poisoning, Heart Trouble, Dropsy, Catarrh and Throat Affections, Liver, Kidney and Bladder Ailments, Stomach and Female Disorders, LaGrippe, Malarial Fever, Nervous Prostration and General Debility, as thousands testify, and as no one, answering this, writing for a package, will deny after using. VITÆ-ORE has cured more chronic, obstinate, pronounced incurable cases than any other known medicine, and will reach such cases with a more rapid and powerful curative action than any medicine, combination of medicines, or doctors' prescriptions which it is possible to procure.

Vitæ-Ore will do the same for you as it has for hundreds of readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, if you will give it a trial. Send for a $1 package at our risk. You have nothing to lose but the stamp to answer this announcement. We want no one's money whom Vitæ-Ore can not benefit. You are to be the judge! Can anything be more fair? What sensible person, no matter how prejudiced he or she may be, who desires a cure and is willing to pay for it, would hesitate to try Vitæ-Ore on this liberal offer? One package is usually sufficient to cure ordinary cases; two or three for chronic, obstinate cases. We mean just what we say in this announcement, and will do just as we agree. Write to-day for a package at our risk and expense, giving age and ailments, and mention the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, so we may know that you are entitled to this liberal offer.

Not a Penny Unless You Are Benefited

Sent Always by Mail. We Pay the Postage.

This offer will challenge the attention and consideration, and afterward the gratitude, of every living person who desires better health or who suffers pains, ills and diseases which have defied the medical world and grown worse with age. We care not for your skepticism, but ask only your investigation, and at our expense, regardless of what ills you have, by writing to us for a package. Address

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumphs speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

HYMN OF THE WEST.

By Edmund Clarence Stedman.

[Official hymn of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, sung for the first time at the opening ceremonies by a chorus of 500 voices.]

O Thou, whose glorious orbs on high Engird the earth with splendor round,
From out Thy secret place draw nigh
The courts and temples of this ground;

Eternal Light,

Fill with Thy might

These domes that in Thy purpose grew,

And lift a nation's heart anew!

Illumine Thou each pathway here,

To show the marvels God hath wrought

Since first Thy people's chief and seer Looked up with that prophetic thought,

Bade Time unroll

The fateful scroll

And empire unto Freedom gave From cloudland height to tropic wave.

Poured through the gateways of the North

Thy mighty rivers join their tide,
And on the wings of morn sent forth
Their mists the far-off peaks divide.

By Thee unsealed

The mountains yield

Ores that the wealth of Ophir shame,
And gems enwrought of seven-hued flame.

Lo, through what years the soil hath lain

At thine own time to give increase—
The greater and the lesser grain,

The ripening boll, the myriad fleece!

Thy creatures graze

Appointed ways;

League after league across the land
The ceaseless herds obey Thy hand.

Thou, whose high archways shine most clear

Above the plenteous Western plain, Thine ancient tribes from round the sphere

To breathe its quickening air are fain;

And smiles the sun

To see made one

Their brood throughout Earth's greenest space,

Land of the new and lordlier race!

The Fifty-eighth Congress will have two claims for remembrance in history: it enacted the necessary legislation for the isthmian canal, and it succeeded in getting through with its work and adjourning its long session at a remarkably early date. On Thursday, April 28, with none of the rush and flurry which usually characterizes the closing days of congress, the session came to an end. The appropriation bills had been all disposed of. The only matters left unsettled were affairs which both sides were entirely satisfied to leave unsettled for the present, such as the Philippine bond bill and the confirmation of Dr. Crum. Not since the first generation of our government's life has congress reached such an early adjournment. Nearly always the session lasts until it seems fairly dissolved by the heat of tropical midsummer Washington. Not within half a century have both houses failed to be on duty to receive the June brides who flock to the nation's capital. The date of adjournment of recent years has averaged about July 15. In 1888 the session continued until October 20, thus making a record for lateness as the present congress has for earliness of adjournment. The possibility of this early dispersion arose from the unusual promptness with which the committee on appropriations did its work. The motive of the early adjournment was undoubtedly the desire to get in a full season of campaigning before the November election.

Adjournment

Congress is playing hookey. A glance at the achievements of this congress and at the unfinished business on its calendar does not give the impression that it adjourned because there was nothing else to do. There were never more unsettled questions awaiting the action of congress. If the purpose of that body is deliberative and legislative, it might profitably have spent two months in considering some of these pressing problems. If its function is chiefly political, and the business of its members is to make campaign speeches, the adjournment was timely.

The record of this congress includes some important measures. The Cuban reciprocity bill, passed at a special session, was both wise and just. The canal legislation is the real monument of this congress. Not much else of real importance has been done. The questions left untouched—matters upon which there was real need, or at least widespread demand, for legislation—include the tariff, the currency, the Philippines, the merchant marine, and various industrial and commercial questions such as the eight-hour bill, and the anti-injunction bill, and the proposed legislation against the paper trust. Even the committees on privileges and elections did not finish their work. Butler's contest in the House, the movement against Smoot in the Senate, and the official fate of Senator Burton, are all unsettled. Congress could not have been sighing, like Alexander, for other worlds to conquer and other fields to explore. But it ran up against some hard problems and shrank from taking them up on the eve of a presidential election. It is another evidence of the disturbing influence of our too frequent elections. The legislative and executive departments are half the time either recovering from a campaign or preparing for one.

$781,574,629 is the sum appropriated by the session of congress which has just closed. Setting aside $83,000,000 for interest on the public debt and sinking fund, there remains about $698,000,000 to pay the expenses of the general government for the twelve months ending June 30, 1905. Congressman Livingstone (Georgia) characterized it as "a congress that had done nothing but spend money." The appropriations are $28,000,000 more than those of the previous session, but are less than the estimated revenue for the year by $40,000,000. Most of the increase is in expenditures for the army and navy, and when compared with the budgets of six or eight years ago, the increase in these items is very striking. Including pensions, the military appropriations amount to $387,000,000, or nearly half of the total. Whether or not these expenditures are excessive and extravagant is a question with two sides. Mr. Hemenway has pointed out that, vast as are these appropriations, the United States is the most cheaply governed country in the world, the annual per capita cost of the government being only $7.97, while in New Zealand, which is at the other extreme, the cost is $30.38.

The sinking of a Japanese transport with the loss of nearly two hundred men by capture and an equal number drowned is a break in the series of Japanese successes. The transport, which was neither a large nor a swift boat, was apparently without escort or protection. Russian torpedo boats of the Vladivostok squadron found and destroyed it. Those who were drowned had refused to surrender, and went down with the ship. The episode shows only that the Japanese had grown somewhat careless in their confidence that they controlled the sea, and that the Vladivostok squadron is not quite a negligible quantity.

It would be a good thing if both Russia and Japan could unite in saying, "Let us have peace." But it is only natural that the war party in Russia will not want to come to any terms until that country has done something to show that it is a great power. All has gone against it in this war and it is humiliated. Now the Japanese have added to their sea renown by making a brilliant advance across the Yalu river. The Japanese preparedness has proven of great value to them; not less valuable, indeed, than their sound strategy. They can fortify the banks of the river and have the co-operation of the navy. Another fierce battle is hourly expected. If anything really decisive happens it may lead to peace, but we are not hopeful that this will come in the near future.

Part of the labor has been crowned with the laurel. There was no hauling down of the Tricolor to be replaced by the Stars and Stripes. Yet there was much about the ceremony on Saturday last when the Louisiana Purchase Exposition was declared open to the wide, wide world to remind one of that day when Napoleon threw away and the United States reluctantly accepted a province which has become of such priceless value that no monetary value would ever give France the right again to unfurl her flag in the old Place d'Armes of New Orleans. About 200,000 people, representing all quarters of the globe, entered the gates of the St. Louis World's Fair to assist in opening the exposition that is to commemorate the ceding of a territory that vies with the Roman Empire in extent and natural capacity. And it is a pleasure to find that the exposition is in grandeur, beauty and comprehensiveness adequate to the great occasion which commands it. Every state and territory in the union is represented, and sixty foreign governments have sent their contributions to complete its perfection. Early on Saturday the crowds began to gather and it soon became apparent that the transit companies were able to handle them with facility. It was an ideal day. A whole army of men had been working up till the moment of the opening of the gates in clearing away rubbish and putting the finishing touches to the exterior picture. One of the disappointments was that the exhibits were not complete, and though many are in their places, it may be a month yet before everything is finally adjusted. But outwardly the fair is almost perfect. The event that held thousands stationary in the grounds was the waiting for President Roosevelt at Washington to touch the button declaring the exposition open to the world's inspection. It was just one o'clock when the chimes in the German building rang out the joyful news, at the conclusion of a lengthy program in which the exposition officials and various men of eminence had part. Hundreds of flags were unfurled, the water flowed down the cascades and the wheels began to revolve in machinery hall. The World's Fair was open.

Revelations in the Smoot investigation reveal a Mormon solution of the "eternal servant question." It appears from the evidence of one of the witnesses that Apostle Taylor had five wives, four of whom did not assume his name. Two of them acted in the capacity of servants to two of the others. They were the mothers of his children, and while supported by him were presumably not "on wages." This kind of a servant arrangement avoided any "giving notice," too, for the law of his church, as well as the law of the land, gives no encouragement to a quitting at the sweet will of the servant. Unfortunately for the Apostle, however, his "servant" wives are not recognized in this country either by law of the land or of God. That being so, it is very doubtful whether the Mormon solution of the servant question will meet with favor. Especially would it be looked upon with distrust if the apostle got what he richly deserves—a good casting.

The hunt for "easy money" has once more ended in the hanging of the hunters. No murderers ever more richly deserved their fate than the "car barn" trio who have in Chicago paid the penalty for their crimes. It is positively known that they were implicated in eight murders; it is suspected that many more deeds of darkness have been done by them, though the boast of one of them that he had killed twenty-four men may be put down to conceited bravado. But they were brutal, hardened criminals, the product of laziness and the passion for having money to spend without working for it. Having once put lead in a man to get his gold, they never afterward hesitated to kill any man who stood in the way of their desires.

There never was the slightest doubt of their guilt, for they themselves had confessed it. And yet the state was put to great expense and the people to a long delay by the pettifogging methods of our courts. Had these criminals been tried at the Old Bailey in London their sentences would have been determined and executed within a period of three weeks, probably.

"Mamma, do you remember that verse I found last Sunday, 'I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you'?"
Such was the remark of one of the children of Mrs. Larabee, to the wife of the murdered missionary after the tragedy became known. When the children have such faith in the loving Father it becomes grown people to hold up their heads and be courageous. And missionary heroism is not on the wane. Set upon and murdered by a band of outlaws on his return from escorting the teacher of his children on a three days' journey from Urumia, the Rev. W. B. Larabee's body was badly mutilated. But hardly is the news of the murder authenticated in this country when a brother of the missionary volunteers to take the vacant place, and the widowed wife says, "God is very close to us, and oh his help is so real and wonderful, and as I realize more and more what he is to me, it makes my whole heart yearn to teach this people of this poor wicked land to know him." Here is true resignation, here great missionary heroism.

St. Louis was treated to a fine display of the red man at the opening of the World's Fair. But "The Indian Business." a matter of far more importance to St. Louis and the other big cities of the state than the Indians who are in evidence in or around the Pike are the political "Indians" who have carried things with such a high hand in past elections. Mr. Folk, it is pleasing to find, in the very midst of his successful canvass, has made an unequivocal pronouncement as to his attitude to these political bullies. To a reporter at Clarksville he said:

"The politicians of our large cities should not wear the uniform of policemen. The cities must be given more home rule and less police rule. The voters of the cities should have the right to correct civic evils by the ballot.

"I propose to put a stop to the 'Indian' business in St. Louis and Kansas City. Every Democrat, whether he be for or against the machine, every Republican, every populist, every man of every party and of no party, shall have the right to go to the polls and vote just as he pleases, without interference and without being slugged by a lot of ruffians.

"I propose to make the ballot in St. Louis and in Missouri honest and fair and free, so that all may vote according to the dictates of their own conscience."

That is the ideal. Is there any man, of whatever political faith, who is not debased, who is not in favor of such a program?

Was the Ideal of the Fathers Practicable?*

II.

But, admitting that this ideal is scriptural, it remains to be asked if it be practicable. If this means whether it be practicable to establish churches to-day on the New Testament basis already mentioned, the question is answered in the thousands of local congregations which have been established and are existing to-day as local, independent but co-operating churches, growing in numbers, in spiritual power and fulfilling the purpose for which the church was established in the world. But if the question as to the practicability of the ideal mean whether we shall be able to make the whole religious world see and approve that ideal and conform to it, so as to actually bring about the unity of the entire church, that is another question, and one which we are not called upon to answer. There enters into such a question the element of the human will, of the voluntary action of free men and women, and no one can dogmatically affirm any event that is dependent upon this uncertain quality. We need not, however, give that broad meaning to the term. We should say that the ideal of our fathers is practicable if, tested by actual experience, it has proved successful, and, if it can be shown that conformity to that ideal involves no surrender of conscience or of truth, and hence that all who believe on Christ may, if they so desire, unite and come into practical fellowship on such a basis.

It would be easy to point out some misconceptions of what the ideal of our fathers was, that are wholly impracticable. For instance, the conception of our plea held by some who claim to believe in it, that it allows no room for differences of opinion on controverted Biblical questions, but that there must be unanimity of sentiment on questions of historical criticism, is wholly impracticable. Those who hold that dissent from a certain theory of inspiration once held by most Christian people, is essential to the faith which qualifies for baptism, have wholly departed from the spirit of the movement, as our fathers conceived it, and hold to an impracticable theory.

Again, those who pervert the meaning of the motto adopted by our fathers, "Where the Scriptures speak we speak, and where the Scriptures are silent we are silent," so as to make it teach that we have no liberty in Christ to adopt any means, methods or instrumentalities for the advancement of the kingdom of God not specifically taught in the Bible, hold an utterly impracticable scheme of reformation of which the best that can be said about it is, that it lacks the very means of self-propagation and is doomed to ultimate sterility. This theory of our plea so confuses matters of opinion and methods of work and worship with things which are vital and fundamental as to make it impracticable both as a basis of union among ourselves and with others. Only division and strife can issue from such a conception of Christianity.

Finally, those who conceive the ideal of our fathers to have been realized, so far as the ascertainment of truth is concerned, and who regard any further advancement in the knowledge of God's revelation or in the application of its truths to present-day conditions as disloyalty to our plea and a departure from the teaching of the fathers, hold an impracticable and untenable ideal, as history abundantly proves.

These misconceptions have led to such divisions among ourselves as to cause many onlookers to doubt the practicability of the ideal we have in view. But as long as the great majority of our brethren are true to the principles of unity we have mentioned, and the tendency is toward a more general recognition of such principles, it is unfair to charge the ideal with being impracticable. Reasoning in that way, we might say that the decalogue itself is impracticable, as it has been and is ignored and violated by many. Christianity is not impracticable because impracticable men have misconceived and misrepresented it. Nor is the ideal which our fathers had in view proven to be impracticable, because impracticable men have loaded it down with impracticable theories and faulty practices. It can only be proven impracticable by showing either that it cannot be practiced or that when it is practiced it works disastrous results.

But there is one essential condition without which the ideal of our fathers cannot prove permanently practicable. The unity enjoined in the New Testament is "the unity of the Spirit." There can be no vital union, no union that will be able to stand the test of conflicting opinions and interests, that is not produced by the Holy Spirit. Any decadence of the spirit of unity will be sure to be followed by division and strife. One of the great dangers which confronts us is that while maintaining the external ideal of unity, we shall lose the spirit of unity and so fail to make practical the ideal of our fathers. No one can read "The Declaration and Address" of Thomas Campbell, and the earlier documents of the reformation, without feeling the throbbing pulsations of the spirit and desire for unity, and peace among the churches. They were weary of party strife and controversy, and longed for the unity and peace and brotherhood of the primitive church. We cannot be loyal to the ideal of our fathers unless we maintain the same spirit of unity, and seek to deepen continually the spiritual life of our members. It is only as we rise above the carnal and fleshly, into the region of the spiritual, that we can maintain "the unity of the spirit" and make vital and practical our plea for the unity of a divided church.

Belated Baptist Criticism.

A friend sends us a copy of the Baptist Record of Pella, Iowa, containing an article by Rev. D. M. Stiles entitled, "Sound Without Substance." This title expresses the writer's estimate of our editorial in the anniversary number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, on "The Religious Reformation We Have Advocated." The chief grievance which our Brother Stiles seems to feel is that a large number of the truths and principles stated are those which Baptists endorse and advocate. Our brother seems to think we are claiming a monopoly of these truths; but bless his dear soul, nothing could please us better than to know that the whole religious world endorsed them and were zealously advocating them. We have never felt the slightest desire to minimize the great work wrought by our Baptist brethren, and their splendid fidelity to many of the great cardinal truths of the New Testament through centuries of misrepresentation and often of persecution. We gladly bear witness to the work they have done and are doing in behalf of our common Christianity. We only regret that so splendid a body of Christian people should be so misrepresented in their spirit by such criticism as this article contains.

Among other statements is the following, which indicates sufficiently the spirit of the writer:

But where can there be found a body of Christians that have so persistently labored for division as have these Campbellites? The Campbellite movement was a division to begin with; and ever since, the churches that claim to be its followers have continually sown the seeds of discord. The Campbells split off from the Baptists, who, if this editorial is correct, have always taught, in the main, exactly the doctrines so strenuously advocated by this journal for forty years. How, then, has it striven for "union"?

Not to refer to the discourteous use of nicknames, which cultivated Christian people have long since abandoned, why should our brother be willing to make a public statement that so contravenes the facts of history? Why the Campbells and their brethren "split off from the Baptists," ought to be known by our critic, if he has ever read the history of the case. The particular Baptist Association with which the Campbells were connected in the beginning of their reformatory work, was unprepared to accept some of the leading principles of reformation which they taught, and it was in the interest of peace and unity that they separated from that association and united with another where their principles were accepted. Baptists ought to be able to appreciate this fidelity to honest convictions, as most of them do. The truths which made the Campbells unwelcome among the Baptists, then, would be readily tolerated to-day in any enlightened Baptist community. We are not criticising the Baptists of to-day for the fact that their brethren nearly a century ago were unprepared to accept principles of reform which subsequent experience and testing in the crucible of controversy have demonstrated to be true. But on the other hand, the Disciples ought not to be reproached for a division which was not of their seeking and which they could not avoid.

Quoting our statement that the Old Testament "contains much that is helpful and instructive to-day, but that we must look to the New Testament to know what is required of us under the reign of Christ," our critic remarks: "The statement as printed looks quite harmless, and would scarcely arouse suspicion, but the Campbellite ministers and teachers frankly state that the Old Testament has served its purpose. It is, therefore, useless to present day believers, and in consequence is practically discarded." It is wholly unnecessary that we should point out how unjust and untrue this statement is, and we only refer to it to again express our regret that this sort of spirit should have outlived its day and should manifest itself in any part of the great Baptist family. It is not in this spirit that we are to promote the unity of those who hold to the "one Lord, one faith, and one baptism." We sincerely hope our brother will grow in breadth of vision and in catholicity of spirit until he shall be able to rejoice that others not of the Baptist fold hold and teach so much in common with them.

World's Fair Tract Distribution.

One of the chief purposes to be subserved by the erection of our World's Fair building is to make it the center for the free distribution of such tracts or booklets as will set forth clearly, courteously and forcibly the principles and objects of the current reformation. The committee having this matter in charge feel deeply the importance of this feature of the work. They are selecting a number of tracts suitable for such use, are preparing some, and solicit suggestions from brethren as to what tracts they would recommend. Of course they must be brief, not only for the sake of economy, but for the sake of having them read. There must, of course, be wise discrimination, not only in selecting tracts to be circulated, but in the manner of their distribution. These points guarded it would be difficult to exaggerate the possibility of good from this sort of missionary work.

We should have a tract fund at once to supply this demand. We are sure our publishing houses will co-operate in furnishing such tracts as may be selected at cost for this purpose, but they cannot be expected to bear the entire burden of such free tract distribution. No doubt the missionary societies will set apart such sums as they may feel able to appropriate for this work, but in addition to this there should be a general fund to be used by the committee for this purpose, and we earnestly solicit donations from liberal-hearted brethren who realize the magnitude of this opportunity and who believe that we should make the best possible use of it. We should be glad to receive cash or pledges for this purpose from such brethren, and due acknowledgment for same will be made in our columns.

Questions and Answers.

A believer in modern miracles relies upon John 14:12 where, Christ declares that he that believeth on him should do greater works than he had done. What did Christ mean when he employed this language? Did he not refer to moral and spiritual achievements, rather than to miracles in the physical realm?
Jos. Lowe.

Our querist has indicated the true explanation of the passage. The apostles did no greater physical miracle than the raising of the dead or opening the eyes of the blind, but, armed with the gospel which Christ's death and triumphant resurrection enabled them to preach, they were to accomplish, and did accomplish, works far greater in the sight of God, in the way of moral and spiritual transformation, than all miracles performed by Christ. Those who claim to work modern miracles, and base their claim on this passage, should be able to actually perform greater physical miracles than those wrought by Christ. Such men exalt the physical above the spiritual, which Christ never did.

What do you understand to be the plan of salvation as revealed in the Bible?

A DISCIPLE.

The Bible discloses what it calls the "eternal purpose" of God, which was to bring all men to the knowledge of himself and of salvation, and to free them from the dominion of sin and bring them under the dominion of truth and love. His method of realizing this purpose seems to have been his self-revelation through holy men of old who spake as the Spirit gave them utterance, but especially in Jesus Christ in whom the fullness of the Godhead dwelt bodily. This revelation of God in Christ, who, by his incarnation and life, and especially by his death, revealed the Father and his infinite love for men, was designed to awaken a response in the human heart that would bring men to repentance and faith and obedience. The divine method also involved the preaching of this gospel to all men in order to the obedience of faith among all nations. Those who hear and heed this gospel and yield to its tender appeals, accepting Jesus, the Son of God, as their Savior and Lord, are promised salvation from both the guilt and power of sin, and redemption from the power of death to an endless life.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, DEAR BROTHER:—Upon reading your reply to my query concerning Brother Ames and miracles, in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of April 28, I perceive that I did not make myself clear in my question. Will you pardon me and let me try again?

1. In your opinion, can one be a true preacher of the gospel and not only not deny, but not affirm the miraculous as it relates to Jesus, both as to the miracles Jesus himself did, and his advent and resurrection also?

Of course "it is hardly possible" (quoting your words) "for one to believe in Jesus as he is presented in the New Testament and deny his miracles. His whole life, including his advent, his sinlessness, his mighty works, his teaching, his triumph over death and the resurrection, is all pitched on the plane of the superhuman and the supernatural." My question is, is it essential in the gospel ministry to affirm the superhuman and the supernatural?

2. You say, "It is one thing to feel that we might believe in Christ without his miracles . . . and quite another thing to deny the credibility or reality of such miracles." Did not Paine, Renan, Ingersoll et al. believe in Christ without the miracles? Let us not forget this difference and distinction: Brother Ames does not deny miracles, Renan et al. do deny miracles. The question in my mind is, are not Renan and Ames alike in their faith, although not in their denial?

E. H. KELLAR.

Carrollton, Mo., April 28.

1. We cannot better answer this question than by quoting from our editorial paragraph, on this subject, in our "Easy Chair" of April 21: "Any preaching that omits or minimizes the presentation of the facts of Christ's miracles, of his unique advent into the world and his pre-existence 'in the form of God' before he 'emptied himself' and 'was found in fashion as a man' must be only a partial gospel, lacking some of the essential elements which have made the gospel of Christ a conquering power in the world." One may preach much that is true and beautiful and helpful and omit these supernatural facts, but he cannot preach the gospel of Christ in its fullness and original power and omit these facts. Of course to omit the resurrection of Christ is to nullify the whole gospel.

2. No; the men mentioned did not believe in Christ at all in any true or New Testament sense. They denied the miraculous because they denied the supernatural or superhuman in Christ. They did not believe in the possibility of miracles. Brother Ames has positive faith in Jesus as the Son of God and the Savior of the world, and believes in his divine mission and in his power to transcend human limitations in his works and his teaching, and this faith is such as to have led him not only to acknowledge him as Savior and Lord, but to dedicate his life to the ministry of his word. It is very great injustice to compare the faith of such an one with the infidelity or rationalism of such men as "Paine, Renan, Ingersoll et al."

Editor's Easy Chair.

April 30. A glorious day—cloudless skies, vernal breeze and a bath of welcome sunshine. A city of ivory palaces crowning the timbered hills and far stretching glades of Forest Park. Immense throngs of humanity out of every kindred, tribe and tongue, thronging the newly-made thoroughfares of the Ivory City. A vast concourse of people gathered in St. Louis Plaza fronting the great Louisiana monument, listening to the strains of patriotic music and waiting for the procession of dignitaries to arrive. Oratory, music, the pressing of the magic button by the chief executive at Washington, the unfurling of flags, the outpouring of the water down the cascades and into the lagoons, the whirl and roar of machinery, and resounding cheers from the multitudinous throngs, and the Louisiana Purchase Exposition was open to the world! And these were the impressive words with which President Francis, after the pressing of the button, formally opened to the public the greatest universal exposition in the history of the world:

"Open ye gates. Swing wide ye portals. Enter herein ye sons of men and behold the achievements of your race. Learn the lessons taught and gather from it inspiration for still greater achievements."

What a transformation a century has wrought! If it had been given to one of the principal actors in that historic scene of a century ago in which the sovereignty of this vast territory was transferred from France to the young republic of the West, to have had a vision of this opening day, what must have been his unbounded wonder and admiration! Instead of the small trading village he would have seen here on the banks of the Mississippi the magnificent metropolis toward which the eyes of the world are turned. Instead of the wild, virgin and unknown wilderness stretching from the Mississippi westward, he would have beheld a vast domain of fertile soil, of cultivated farms, of beautiful homes, of flourishing towns and cities, dotted with school houses and church buildings, the abode of a fair civilization, forming a mighty galaxy of free commonwealths, sharing in the freedom, protection and honor of a common flag. He would have beheld here, on the outskirts of the city, these mammoth palaces filled with the products, inventions, with the arts and sciences and other evidences of the marvelous progress of the race. He would have seen here, where was then but the savage wilderness, the representatives of all the civilized nations of the world, bringing hither their best products in every department of human activity in friendly rivalry and helpful competition. But when he had seen all that splendid vision, enraptured as his soul must have been, how little of all of it could he have told to the people of his time, in any language then known to men! And how little the people would have believed it, even if he had been able to tell them what were to be the achievements of a century!

But if it were utterly impossible for the people of a century ago to foretell or even imagine the developments of a century of progress, is it not equally impossible for us of to-day to foresee, even in dimmest outline, what are to be the developments of the coming century? No one supposes that humanity has reached the goal of its progress. Not only is civilization to advance, but there is every reason to believe that it is to advance with accelerated motion. Just as the last century has witnessed greater progress than perhaps all the preceding centuries, so it is reasonable to infer that the twentieth century is to witness a correspondingly greater development along all the lines of human advancement. Nor can the wisest tell just in what direction there will be the greatest development, nor along what lines of investigation there will come the greatest light. No doubt the most astonishing discoveries, inventions and improvements will be made not only in the material realm, but also in the moral and religious life of mankind. How foolish it is, then, for men to say that this or that reform is impossible! Impossible to-day, perhaps, but probable enough to-morrow. Men say Christian union is impossible. Yes, perhaps it is in our present state of mental and spiritual progress; but it does not follow that it will be impossible or impracticable a few years hence, when we shall have advanced to a higher stage of religious development and have learned to "put away childish things." With God all right things are possible.

If such be our ignorance concerning the developments of a century, is it strange that we do not know all about the future life, and just what heaven is to be? Is it not evident that, not only is man unable to foresee the conditions of the future life, but it would be impossible for God to reveal to men, in the language of earth, the real glories and splendors of "the new heaven and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness"? Men often wonder why God has not told us more about our future abode. But we could not understand it, if He should describe it to us. Our earthly vocabulary contains no words adequate to describe the spiritual universe, nor are we sufficiently developed, as yet, to comprehend or appreciate the indescribable beauties and unimagined splendors of that perfected City of God, whose fair outlines are only dimly foreshadowed by symbols in God's revelation. Into that glorious city the nations of the earth will bring their choicest treasures, their noblest productions, and we shall have, in deed and in truth, a universal exposition of all that God has wrought through the agonizing centuries of human conflict in a redeemed world and in a glorified humanity. But as to the precise nature of that spiritual transformation which man shall undergo in being fitted for that spiritual home, we are compelled to say with the beloved John, "it is not yet made manifest what we shall be." Nor do we know the exact nature of the employments and enjoyments of that future state, but we believe they will be just such as will accord with our renewed nature and spiritual capacity.

Notes and Comments.

In a recent address Lyman Abbott said:

There is a spirit in man which sees the spiritual. I see, said Paul; come, you can see. God in the souls of men enables them to see. The old prophets had the power to perceive the vision, and power to awaken others to see it. As cog to cog so truth fits to the human soul, and the soul sees the truth because it is made for it and needs it.

It is this fact, and this alone, that makes preaching worth while. The truth of God finds men in their deepest consciousness and vindicates its claim to men's faith and obedience. And then, the more spiritually-minded men become the better able they are to discern and appreciate spiritual realities.

Minor questions must be held in abeyance to more vital ones. Many years ago when there was a desire and effort on the part of some to declare Bro. M. E. Lard an alien because of the pamphlet he published giving an interpretation to the word "aionios" which was not generally accepted among us, instead of devoting our attention to the error of his exegesis, we made it the occasion rather of emphasizing Christian liberty as a condition of maintaining our plea for Christian unity. "Aionios" could wait until this vital principle was emphasized. So now the question of the correctness or incorrectness of certain views which Dr. Ames has expressed, is not so vital to the integrity of our plea as this principle of Christian liberty. We do not need, we trust, to say that no "modern view of the world" or of the Bible that lowers Christ one whit from His exalted position or that detracts from His imperial authority, can have our sympathy or approval. The miracles, the supernatural birth, and the pre-existence of Christ constitute, in our judgment, a part of the New Testament record of Christ, and neither of them offers any difficulty to our faith. But we can conceive that men equally loyal to Christ may hold a different estimate as to the place which these events occupy in Christian evidence. But these differences in opinion as to the evidential value of these facts as producing faith in Christ, must not be exalted on either side to a question of fellowship.

The Duty of the Church In an Age of Reaction*

By F. B. Meyer

The churches of this country are called upon to-day to face issues as momentous and urgent as any that presented themselves to our forefathers. The crisis is urgent because of the many and unmistakable signs that the Christian church is on her trial. A revolution is in the air, and is slowly, inevitably, mightily affecting all human societies; and the question of questions for us all is how far we can allow that revolution to work itself out independently of us, or whether we can supply the key to its solution, give it a Christian interpretation, and meet it with enlarged and truer conceptions of Jesus Christ.

What are the main duties to which we must address ourselves during this age of reaction?

In the first place our churches must give more attention to the religious training of the young, whether in homes, Sunday-schools or elementary schools. There is abundant need for the pastor's Bible class. The most cultured and efficient workers among us must be told off to provide for the careful instruction of the young in the formularies, principles and histories of our churches. The tendency, which is too rife in certain localities, to attract numbers and raise funds by objectionable methods should be rigorously repressed. At any cost we must increase the efficiency of our Sunday-schools and heighten the standard of teaching.

We must not be afraid of politics. We use that word, not in the party sense, but as including those great general questions which concern the health and well being of the people. How can we deal effectually with the evils of drunkenness, iniquity, gambling, overcrowding and the shameful monopolies which overshadow the lives of millions, if we only alleviate individual cases and forbear to touch the dark and putrid sources of these polluted streams? It is only through corporate action that the citizens of any locality can combine for dealing with the abuses that haunt our streets and lurk in the very structure of our homes, and it is in my judgment an enormous wrong to our neighbors and an act of treachery to God to withhold ourselves from public service.

We must keep the spiritual aspects of our work well to the front. Great and absorbing as our interest in public questions may be, we must never allow them to divert us from the main object of our existence—ingathering the lost to Christ. Nothing would more quickly save our country from low ideals and miserable compromises with wrong than a genuine revival of religion induced by the preaching of the gospel of God's grace. Every great revival of religion has issued in social and political reconstruction. On the authority of history and economics we base our contention that society can only be saved through a great revival of the religion of Jesus Christ. We must endeavor to secure a higher standard of Christian living among the members of our churches. Some weeks ago I was speaking with one of the leaders of the working classes—a man universally respected for his honesty of purpose and straightness of speech. We were speaking of the alienation, be it less or more, of the working classes from our churches, and he said: "Your power with working men depends on whether you are prepared to put in practice the Sermon on the Mount." I think that there is much to ponder in those words. It is not enough that beautiful churches should arise in city and village, that mighty conventions should assemble and disperse, that vast sums should be contributed for missionary purposes. In spite of all this, if we are not breathing and reproducing the spirit of Christ we may be cast aside, as Judaism was, to make way for a religion of sacrifice, of the Cross, and of redeeming pity.

No quarter must be given in our churches to the covetousness which fattens on the proceeds of the sweater's den or draws rents from unsanitary property, or builds up fortunes at the cost of purity and sobriety. We must have no complicity with the proceeds of the liquor trade, as though its enormous wrongs on human society could be condoned by its liberal gifts to our coffers.

A new hope is beginning to stir the world. Men are coming to feel that rivalry and mistrust, competition and covetousness, are not the natural but the unnatural conditions of society. Men are groping, often blindly enough, after the brotherhood which will make the good of each the good of all. It is becoming apparent that the true law of society is not competition but co-operation, not individualism but altruism, not in rivalry but in combination, not in seeking one's own but each other's good. The watchword of the coming age will be not the old cry of rights, but the new one of duties—not the rights of capital or the rights of labor, but the duty of every man to minister to his brother.

The question is whether the churches appreciate this spirit and are prepared to make the sacrifices necessary to lead men forward into the new age of which the dawn is already on the sky. Will they go on preaching a theology, or preaching a living Christ? Will they quote the past or make the present Pentecostal? Will they profess the teachings of Jesus or live them?

It is my fervent belief that if all Christian employers would deal with their employes not as hands but as souls; if all Christian households lived strictly within their means—where possible paying cash; if all Christian purchasers would pay a fair price, such as would admit of the payment of a fair living wage; if all endeavored to obey the apostolic injunction, "owe no man anything"; if the churches as a whole took the right attitude to great public human questions, such as war, the liquor trade, the housing of the poor and the destruction of slums; if the law of love were in all our lives and on all our lips; if covetousness and uncharitableness were deemed deserving of severe measures of church discipline; if we were our brothers' helpers, of whatever race; if the strong helped the weak, the wise the foolish, the healthy the infirm—then would break out, in our time and land, one of the mightiest revivals of religion the world has ever witnessed.

Why can we not inaugurate such a movement here and now? We have preached Christ long enough; let us begin to live him down to the jots and tittles of his demands. The resolve might cost much, but it would awaken the profoundest enthusiasm. In all this, lastly, we must seek and obtain for ourselves and our churches a closer fellowship with the spirit of Jesus Christ. In the meanwhile nothing can rob us of our hopes. If there is an appearance of retrogression, it is only as when, in the advancing tide, a wave retreats for a moment, to return with added velocity and force. The commotions and upheavals of our times resemble those of geology, each of which introduces some higher stage of being. These are the throes of travail that usher in the reign of the Son of God. He is leading on the ages and He cannot fail nor be discouraged. He has staked too much on the redemption of this world to draw back. How long the process of redemption will take we cannot tell, but in the golden future, and that, perhaps, not very far away, the listening earth shall again hear the angels' song of "Glory to God in the Highest," as they go on to announce that the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our God and of His Christ, and that He shall reign forever.

As Seen from the Dome

By F. D. Power

This time the vision takes in the Daughters of the American Revolution. Molly Stark and Molly Pitcher would have enjoyed the scene could they have looked in upon this handsomely gowned gathering in their thirteenth continental congress. The Maharajah of Cawnpore or even General Miles would have grown green with envy at the sight of the gorgeous apparel and splendid decorations of some of the fair women. Martha Washington, Abigail Adams, Dolly Madison and the rest would have been bewildered indeed amid the flash of electric lights, the glitter of diamonds, the wealth of silks and ancestral laces, the fluttering of many flags, the riot of roses and ferns and carnations, and all the brilliancy and beauty, and parliamentary and political performances of their posterity. It is just too lovely for anything to watch the doings of the Daughters.

Mrs. Fairbanks presided, and did it well. It is not an easy contract by any means to direct in good order an assembly of one thousand patriotic women, all of whom are bent upon saying something and doing something. The time of meeting was the anniversary of the battle of Lexington, April 19, and the president-general recalled that action and the discomfiture of "the erstwhile proud grenadiers" by the embattled farmers. The membership in good standing was reported as 40,264. There are 687 chapters, 30 national officers, 47 state regents, and 687 chapter regents. These with 273 delegates form the voting membership of the congress. Since the last congress, 4,747 members have been added, 39 of whom "real daughters" of soldiers who served in the war for independence, venerable women, to each of whom is "presented a souvenir spoon ornamented with the insignia of the society." Four hundred and thirty Daughters married during the year. The leading feature of the congress was the laying of the corner stone of the new continental memorial hall. This has been the dream of the Daughters since their beginning. It was to be a monument to the men who made the republic. During all these years money has been coming in, and nearly $100,000 is now in sight. Not far from the white house, in full view of historic Arlington and the Virginia hills and the Potomac, as it winds its way toward Mt. Vernon, a lot has been purchased for $50,000, and $350,000 is to be put in the hall. It is to be of marble, with a reception hall for the Daughters that will accommodate 5,000, and an assembly room for 2,000. Even now no theater in the city will meet the wants of the congress and their receptions go away beyond the capacity of the Corcoran art gallery. And as the social functions are the great feature of the D. A. R., they must provide sufficient room for themselves. The United States congress will be allowed to make an appropriation. In a bleak March atmosphere which tried these good women almost as much as Valley Forge tried their forefathers, the corner stone, with song and prayer and oratory and music and masonic ceremonies, was safely laid. Their annual reception followed, and they got down to business.

One of the chief purposes of the Daughters is to mark historic places. The question of demolishing certain houses on Lafayette square in this city, was up, and it was said it involved the destruction of a house in which Dolly Madison once lived. A member from New York grew very emotional, and cried with outstretched arms of appeal, "Destroy the home of Dolly Madison? No!" Another proposition was to bring the remains of John Paul Jones from France to this country, and congress was urged to make the necessary appropriation. A fair daughter from this city made the point that Jones was buried under a block of buildings in the city of Paris and wanted to know how it would be possible to reach him. Nothing however is impossible to the Daughters, and it was decided to make the effort to return the hero's bones to America. Jones, it will be remembered, went into the American navy from Virginia, and after the revolution was made rear-admiral in the Russian navy and died in Paris. He was really a Scotchman and his name was John Paul.

Another feature of the D. A. R. is its annual election. In this, the women are an objectlesson to the men folks. Fourteen general officers were chosen. The ballots were carefully folded, and the Daughters in Indian fashion filed up the center aisle to the stage, and deposited them in a big box which was jealously guarded by four women. Then twenty-two tellers took them in charge, and sat up all night to count them. The purity of the ballot-box was never more certainly secured.

Still another matter of vital moment with the congress, was the manner of wearing the badges. This came up in the form of an amendment to the constitution. The ladies did not seem satisfied with this instrument, and all sorts of changes were proposed, most of which, after endless discussion, were defeated.

The regulation touching the wearing of the badge, however, was too important to be disposed of after that fashion, and it was finally decided that the emblem of the society "shall be carried on the left breast, except by members who are or have been national officers or state regents, who may wear it suspended from the ribbon around the neck." It was explained that some sacrilegious members of the society have been in the habit of using the emblem as a belt pin, others as a hair ornament, and still others on their backs as a skirt-fastener, all of which was out of keeping with the honorable esteem in which such a badge should be regarded. One Daughter thought it humiliating that the members of so great a body must be told where to wear their badges. Another suggested it would require some courage to walk up to a member of the D. A. R. and correct her for not having her badge in the proper place. A Massachusetts sister said less than a year ago she had done exactly that thing, and she "wasn't so very bold at that." The vote was taken in great good feeling, and now the Daughters are taught how to bear their badges in an orthodox and daughtery way.

Of course the Daughters called on the president. To the number of nearly 1,500 they invaded the White House. The chief magistrate did not appear at the great reception given the Daughters at the art gallery nor at the corner stone laying and a New Jersey delegate wanted to know why. This inquisitive sister went along with the rest to the White House, and ventured to ask: "Mr. President, why didn't you come down to see us lay the corner stone of our memorial hall?" "It was impossible for me to come," said the commander of the rough riders, showing his teeth. "Why, don't you know, Mr. President," said the lady from darkest New Jersey, "that you would not have been here if it had not been for the heroes who fought and died to establish this government and in whose memory the hall is being erected?" The hero of San Juan hill remarked he would like to present her to Mrs. Roosevelt. "Do you know," said our New Jerseyite afterward, gravely, "I believe he did that just to get out of answering my question."

I was in to hear the decision of the Roberts-Huey case. It is the cause celebre of the D. A. R. The women were voting, and the so-called administrative factions led by Mrs. Donald McLean and Mrs. Fairbanks were struggling for the mastery, and the vote was 176 to 171. There was a buzz, buzz, buzz over the whole house. Finally the decks were cleared for action, and Mrs. Coleman of Chicago as the Togo in command led the attack. It was still, absolutely still, in the room for the first time since the congress had been in session. "Shee-shee-shee!" could be heard all over the hall, and then a painful silence, and the history of Mrs. Thomas Roberts and Miss Harriet Baird-Huey of the Quaker City came to the front with the committee's finding of law and fact and its recommendations. It was an awful mix-up—this Roberts-

"The Dangerous Cronje"

An Interview by
"Our Special Commissioner"

"Victoria was the best queen that ever was on earth."

So spoke the hero of Paardeberg as I talked over with him the situation in South Africa. For General Cronje, one of the most distinguished of Boer leaders, has put real war behind him and come to the World's Fair city to play at war. And this fine testimony to the greatness of the queen against whom he fought with all the resource and determination that has been characteristic of those in whom the old Dutch blood flows is but an evidence of a change of heart that promises much for the future of the country that has been devastated by war as few countries have been. It was to determine, if possible, the Dutch feeling with regard to the future of South Africa that I sought an interview with General Cronje. And it was a great pleasure to find that, although he is possessed of much of the sternness and immobility that one might expect from his upbringing, he at the same time is fully aware of the importance of the "reconstruction" and the necessity of all races in South Africa working as harmoniously as possible to the one end. When I asked him what the Dutch opinion was regarding the present king, he shook his head and replied very briefly: "The people don't say anything about the king." But he made it very emphatic that they loved the late Queen. Personality has, no doubt, counted very much in this war. Many people believe that, had the negotiations been carried on by any other persons than Paul Kruger and Joseph Chamberlain, the ultimate resort to arms might have been avoided, for both men were of the most determined type and believed their own way was the only way to solve a difficulty.

General Cronje is not a man of large frame; rather is he under the medium size. A straggling, dark gray beard, rather shallow complexion, but an eye that is full of fire when he is interested in his subject—in outward appearance there is little about him that one would associate with a leader of people. Yet Cronje has been a marked man for many years in the Transvaal. He was born in Cape Colony in 1836, but it was not until 1881 that he first came into contact with the British. That was the time of Majuba, the great event which many people think was responsible for this last war; for there it was that Great Britain found a terrible defeat at the hands of the rude farmers, to avenge which was the watchword of a certain jingo element in the British army ever afterward. In 1896 again Cronje came before the notice of the world when he caught Jameson in his raid. "Minister of death, the dangerous Cronje" Sir Arthur Conan Doyle has called him.

"Was there any real hatred of the English people?" I asked the general, through Mr. van Pittius, his adjutant, who courteously acted as interpreter, Transvaal Dutch being a little beyond me.

"No," he replied, "we lived with the English as best we could. There was no real antagonistic feeling, at least in the government. Of course on the part of certain individuals there may have been."

"Then what was the real cause, in your judgment, of the war?"

"The real trouble was the question of the Outlanders' vote. Some of the Johannesburg people were not satisfied with the government and did not want to keep to the law. They insisted on a three years' residential qualification, while the Dutch wanted no man to vote who had not been in the country for fifteen years and held property."

"But was it not a fact that there was a large element of the Dutch who were opposed to President Kruger's views on this subject?"

"Not a very large element. Transvaalers were very united on this question."

"Was it not true that in the recent elections there had been a large vote cast against President Kruger?"

"That did not mean that the people were opposed to him. It was our method. There must be several candidates, and Kruger had, roughly speaking, half as much more support than any other candidate."

"But there was a feeling in America and in England that war was brought about by the officials."

"That was not the case. The old people did not want war. It was forced rather by the young people, so far as the Dutch were concerned. They felt that they had given way to the English every time and that there was no use in doing it again; that the time had come to make a stand."

From this brief expression of his views it would seem that the old Transvaaler thoroughly believed in the justice of his cause and was still convinced that the Dutch were hardly treated by their British foes.

Cronje will live in history for his great running fight which culminated in his surrender at Paardeberg and his removal, like Napoleon, to the island of St. Helena. Those who recollect the vivid newspaper accounts of that terrible bombardment can readily picture the scene through a phrase recently used of a big American city when criticised by a certain divine as "hell with the lid off." Lord Roberts, with all the skill of a born strategist, and with nearly seventy thousand men under his command, had brought the Boers to a halt in their desperate effort to escape from the English lines. One hundred British cannon were turned upon the Boer laager and shell after shell of the deadly lyddite was hurled at the Dutch. When I asked General Cronje how he felt amid this rain of deadly explosives, he shrugged his shoulders and smiled and met me with the very pertinent question as to how I thought I would feel. It was not very pleasant, he admitted, especially as he had women, children and wounded with him in the encampment. He confessed that he had no personal hope that he would be able to get through, but he did expect that he might get some assistance from the outside such as would enable him and his followers to break through the British lines at some one point; but the firing of his wagons and equipment, the concentration of the English batteries on any gun which he dared to fight, showed him that he was hopelessly outnumbered and that the chances in his favor were almost nil. He readily gave a fine testimony to the bravery of the English soldiers and to other admirable qualities. One thing he emphasized which may minimize some criticisms of the Boer troops. The British, he said, were "under orders." When they were told to do a thing they did it or would make an effort, but the Boers were not so much "under orders"—a man felt more freedom to do as he pleased.

"Have you any complaint to make of the way the Boer prisoners were treated by the British?"

"No," he said, "generally speaking they were treated very well, except under some special circumstances."

But I was more interested in the general's view of the present situation in South Africa than in things that have transpired. The war is over, and we have to deal now with the results of the war. When I asked him what was the present situation he replied that the greatest part of the burghers are glad to go back to the country and have been doing their best to start anew. "They are all right now," he said. "Some, of course, will never be thoroughly satisfied, but most of the people want to get back to the farms and go on with the old life as nearly as they may."

"Will the two peoples weld?" I asked.

"That I can't say. All I know is that the Dutch do not speak now about the vote. They do not trouble themselves as to the governmental aspect. They are an agricultural people, and if they can resuscitate the farm life and the British will keep their promises, I do not anticipate any trouble."

"Is there any probability?" I asked, "that there may be formed in some separate portion a Dutch state of 'disgruntled people'?"

"No, I do not think so. Every man will want to stay on his own farm."

"Then they are satisfied to be under the British flag?"

"I will not say that they are satisfied, but they do not hate the flag. There is no animosity, but the British must fulfill their promises made at the time of subjugation. This they have not done as yet. They have not paid out the money that is needed to put the people in a position to become self-sustaining and satisfied again. I have nothing special to say against the laws that the British are enacting."

"It is the common belief, Gen. Cronje, that the Boers are a very religious people. About what percentage of them would you say are really religious?"

"Oh, about one-half, more or less," replied the general. "But at Johannesburg there were thousands of strangers who knew nothing about God and his law."

"What was the effect of the defeat upon the religious convictions of your people who used to go into battle with prayers on their lips, according to the reports we have received?"

"They never believed in any such thing as 'the God of battles' in the sense that some people have credited them. They prayed, but whenever they were defeated they felt that they were being punished for their sins. The people are just as religious as ever, and the war has not made them lose their convictions in this regard."

"Did the Dutch ministers take any prominent part either for or against the war at its outbreak?"

"Yes, they were all against it, but when the war was on they did all they could to encourage a good fight."

As to the present proposals of mine owners to introduce Chinese labor, General Cronje said that this is entirely unnecessary, for there are more laborers now than are needed, and it is merely the companies' ruse to get cheap labor and to increase their mining profits.

General Cronje met Mr. Chamberlain in January, 1903, when there was a conference between the colonial secretary and some of the Boer leaders. He expressed to me the opinion that Mr. Chamberlain seemed a good man, yet he has not fulfilled his word given to the generals, or at least the orders he was supposed to have given had not been fulfilled when Gen. Cronje left South Africa, and the general expressed himself as being very sorry that Mr. Chamberlain had not kept his word, for he believed this would do much to pacify the country.

Every foreigner who comes to America has to answer the question how he likes this country and its people. I could not avoid the reporter's usual question. The general, as might be expected, expressed his appreciation of very much that he had seen. "It is," he said, "a very nice country, and pretty, too, and so are its people."

"What, more than anything else, impresses you in America?" I asked.

The answer was worth our pondering. "Most of the people seem to be more for the world than anything else," he replied, emphatically. The thing that seemed to impress him most after this was the street railway system. "The cars are always full of ladies and gentlemen and are brilliantly illuminated at night." We are not surprised that one who has lived in the veldt the greater part of his life, where pleasure of travel is measured by the gait of a pony or a trek of oxen, should be impressed by transit that some of us think is neither speedy nor luxurious enough.

As for opportunities in South Africa for young Americans, the general believes these are good. They will be more welcome among the Dutch than young Englishmen, and yet, "It depends altogether," he said, "how a man behaves himself. We do not care particularly what his nationality is."

Something Lacking.

By F. M. Wiley.

A great many members of Protestant churches, and especially of those of our own "faith and order," seem to be sadly lacking in reverence for the church and its services. On Sunday they come into what they should regard as the house of God and talk, laugh and visit as if it were an ordinary secular place and occasion. In many of our churches there is a surprising amount of noise and confusion until the service actually begins. And after the communion which, if properly observed, is a solemn and impressive service, bringing vividly to mind that awful tragedy, the frightful death of our Lord and Savior on a Roman cross, the benediction and— presto, change, the organ strikes up something lively and loud, and every one is talking and laughing, as at the close of a concert or lecture!

We have ridiculed the staid and solemn demeanor of the Puritan and the Quaker, and have laughed at their worship as gloomy and depressing. But have we not gone to the opposite extreme of levity and lack of reverence? In most of our churches the pastors and elders make little, if any, effort to educate their people in this matter, to impress on their congregations, and the children of their Sunday-schools, that the church house is a sacred place, solemnly dedicated to the worship of God, the preaching of the gospel of Christ and the observance of his ordinances, and is to be treated always with reverence and respect; that nothing is to be allowed therein that is not in harmony with these objects.

In many of our churches the service is not what it should be, and does not, as it should, reach the heart, the emotions of the worshiper. Our early leaders—great men though they were—in trying to get away from the "sects" made the mistake of the Puritan who stripped his religion of all beauty because beauty was entwined with the ritual against which he had revolted. In our anxiety to be "ferocious" anything which the "denominations" did we have made the mistake of rejecting much that was good and helpful, beautiful and inspiring. In the matter of a service that has dignity and beauty, the power to touch the imagination, kindle the faith, cause us to "lift the heart and bend the knee," we can learn very much from the great historic churches.

We are continually urged to be "sociable," and so we should be. But the Lord's day, and the meeting for public worship and the communion is not the proper time and place, though after the service a kindly greeting and a cordial invitation to strangers to come again is, of course, to be commended. For the morning worship at least, we should try earnestly to leave the world and its affairs outside the church doors, go quietly to our seats, and try to put ourselves into a devotional state of mind, and become worshipers indeed and in truth.

Reverence is not characteristic of our time. The iconoclast is abroad. As between the scientist, the joke-writer and the cartoonist there is not much left that is regarded as sacred. So the need is urgent that we teach with all the emphasis we can, and especially by example, that the church house is something more than the school house or the public hall; that its services are not for the entertainment or information of the people, but to give new strength and courage to those who are trying to live the Christian life and to induce others to accept the gospel of Christ.

The greatest danger to the church and its services is from indifference. Few people are hostile to Christianity, but millions are indifferent. Let us earnestly "think on these things" and urge them upon the attention of all. Let us go into the house of the Lord with joy, but not with hilarity. Let us enter into his courts with gladness, but with reverence, and so learn to worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness, in spirit and in truth.

Degraded Criticism

By William Durban

Before plunging into the momentous new topic on which I am about to write as my theme in this article, I must say a little concerning a painful personal matter. Several times in treating things English, I have described the work and career of Pastor George Rapkin, minister of our church of Christ at Alvanley Place, Birkenhead. This highly esteemed preacher is at this moment the subject of profound anxiety in our whole brotherhood, especially in his own congregation and his family. He last year organized a party of about fifty excursionists, whom he personally conducted up the Rhine and into Germany. His management of the delightful tour gave such satisfaction to the party, consisting chiefly of friends in Birkenhead and Liverpool, that he was arranging a similar scheme for this season. With the view of making certain preliminary conditions, he went across to the continent during the last week in March, but after landing at Antwerp sent word to Mrs. Rapkin that he was unwell and depressed. He complained that his head "was on fire," and that he had lost his bag. His wife, anxious and alarmed, hurried over to Antwerp. He had mentioned in his letter that, though ill, he was going on to Cologne. But neither at Antwerp nor at Cologne could she find any trace of him. Mrs. Rapkin is a German, and as her home is at Wesel, near Cologne, she naturally supposed that her husband might have taken refuge there, with her family, in his indisposition. All search was vain. The English and continental police are endeavoring to track our brother, but we have no news whatever up to this moment.

Brother Rapkin is a man of versatile ability. He is a powerful speaker and a very effective preacher. Born in the west of London, he was a member of a Roman Catholic family, but early in his youth came over to Protestantism. He was for several years a noted worker in the Salvation Army, in which he was appointed statistician. In this capacity he travelled all over the country, and he also was for a time stationed in Holland. Our own work attracted his open and unprejudiced mind and captivated him. He was baptized at West London Tabernacle by G. T. Walden, now of Sydney, Australia. George Rapkin came into our ministry in a romantic manner. He was very familiar with the beautiful seaside town of Margate, and undertook to raise a cause there, in the first instance, at his own charges, gaining his subsistence as best he could. But this undertaking soon developed into a success which needed that the Christian Association should take up and consolidate the results. In the preliminary struggle, Mr. and Mrs. Rapkin and their children endured great privation and literally lived by faith alone. Their heroism attracted sympathy and brought adherents to our cause who would probably never have joined us otherwise. The chapel at Margate was built, the cause established, and after a time George Rapkin was invited to remove to Birkenhead. He is an enthusiastic Bible student, and as he has travelled much in Bible lands, he is especially a most enlightening lecturer. We had little expected that amongst the mysterious disappearances chronicled from time to time would be that of our Birkenhead pastor. He has been singularly successful in that town in gaining the confidence of the young people, as I myself have proved by observation on my visits. His Bible class for young men and women last year was quite a little college, and the papers sent me by a number of them in connection with my own Bible correspondence work, under the auspices of the Christian Association, have given me constant satisfaction. George Rapkin has made for us a splendid cluster of Bible students, some of whom are likely to be heard of in our work in the near future.

A Canon's Vagaries.

I now turn to the wider national field. The sensation of the hour in the religious world is the extraordinary escapade of Canon Henson, of Westminster. This broad-minded and highly esteemed dignitary of the Church of England has created great difficulties for his own communion by his persistent fraternization with Non-conformists, his advocacy of Christian union, and his opposition to the schemes of both the high churchmen and the government for the enforcement of the obnoxious Education acts. His sympathies are entirely, for instance, with the "passive resisters." This attitude in one whose voice is frequently heard in Westminster Abbey, and who is vicar of St. Margaret's, the church attended by members of the House of Commons and for a long period the scene of the ministry of the late Dean Farrar, is peculiarly embarrassing to the great majority of what are called "churchmen." But for a full century Westminster Abbey has been the head-center of the Broad Church, through the influence of Stanley, Kingsley, Alford and Farrar, and now Canons Wilberforce and Henson are the two leading spirits there. Canon Gore, now bishop of Worcester, was when in power at the abbey a "high broad." He was "high" in ritual, but "broad" in doctrine, as he still is. St. Paul's Cathedral is the traditional high church shrine. Thus the two metropolitan cathedrals represent two different schools. Where then does evangelicalism come in? Where indeed? It has no august headquarters in London, but is represented simply by certain vicars and rectors in their own parishes. High church and broad church are met together, and attitudinarianism and latitudinarianism have kissed each other. Low church is "low down."

Canon Henson has astonished the churches and the nation by a sudden new departure. He lately opened fire on his old friend and colleague, Bishop Gore, because that prelate had rebuked a certain obscure vicar for the crude expression of certain views on the subject of the virgin birth. But last week there appeared in a magazine article from Canon Hensley Henson's pen a most terrific onslaught on the Old Testament. The canon is this week being discussed in newspapers all over Britain. He has perpetrated an outrage. That is my own verdict, so far as I have any right to any individual opinion. Even the secular journals of all shades of opinion express astonishment. Because Canon Henson never allows himself to be interviewed, all sorts of representative men are being asked for their sentiments in reference to his latest performance.

A Pulpit Revolutionist.

In his startling article on the "Future of the Bible," in the April number of the Contemporary Review, Canon Henson says: "The Christian church has definitely entered on one of those recurrent times of transition in which the Christian religion is correlated with accumulations of new knowledge and qualified for a new lease of beneficent activity in the world. . . . The present indiscriminate reading of the Bible in public is an extremely perilous proceeding." What Canon Henson roundly asserts is that many of the narratives of the Old Testament are "incredible, puerile and demoralizing myths and fables." He considers that the church should not be rigidly restricted to the public reading of lessons from the Bible alone. Why should not other literature be used for reading in churches?

It is singular that this attack on the Bible should be made, in one of the most influential of all quarters, just after the jubilant celebration of the British and foreign Bible society, and the publication of the two magnificent volumes commemorating its work done in all parts of the world during the century of its existence. But the canon is exciting a storm of derision. The daily papers are girding at him sarcastically, while shoals of letters in protest are being sent to the various editors. His inconsistency is glaring. For instance, he draws diametrically opposite pictures of a laity accepting what is read from the lectern "as in some way divinely true," and of a congregation moved either to trouble or to contempt by the "absurdities and the moral crudities of the older books of the Bible." In a splendid leading article the Pall Mall Gazette takes the canon severely to task. It reminds him of a fact of which he seems to be strangely oblivious for a man in his position, that the lectionary of the Anglican church consists of carefully selected chapters, instead of being "dangerously indiscriminate," as he describes it. The editor of this influential London evening journal says: "We are not of those who believe in treating the B'ble as though it were a self-appointed instrument of conversion, on the medieval principle of 'opus operatum.' But we do believe that the work accomplished by the Bible in the history of the Christian church is incalculable. The Bible is the book of the church, the handbook of Christian people." And the editor goes on to upbraid Henson for "deserting the outposts of the citadel of Christian truth because enemies have attacked it."

It is saddening to note that Christianity is being betrayed in the house of Christ's friends, and that it needs to be defended by those whose proper business is with other concerns. Truly the signs of the times are such as to produce a sensation of bewilderment in many earnest souls.

The Christ Motive

BY CHARLES LOUIS LOOS

The supreme motive of Jesus in this world was, and ever will be while the present order of things endures, "to seek and save that which was lost." The salvation of the human race, temporal and eternal, with all that this involves; the rescuing of the souls and lives of men from sin; the regeneration and elevation of humanity to a life of purity, holiness and happiness—this is the purpose of God in Christ here on this earth.

And the church is the embodiment of Christ, "his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all." So also is the individual Christian man the disciple, i. e., the follower, the imitator, in the great object of his life, of our Lord. His work must be continued by us, in us, and through us, to the end of time. This impulse must fill all our minds and hearts, must be the sovereign inspiration of our lives. To this end we must live and labor. Until we have realized in our convictions, our deepest consciousness, and our actions this sublime truth, we have not yet learned to know what it means, what it is, in its full reality, to be a Christian.

That the world immediately around us, our own land, our homes, our kindred, our friends, our neighbors, our fellow-citizens, should most directly and most powerfully attract our attention and excite our interest and activity, must at once win the full conviction of every thoughtful Christian man. We must feel the deepest concern for those who were born with us, who are living immediately with us, whose graves will be by the side of our own, and who in the last day will rise from the dead and stand in the great judgment with us. No argument is needed to enforce this with intelligent men.

And what wonderful opportunities our country affords for the preaching of the gospel successfully to the world!

Here is the assembling of the nations of the earth; not only of the enlightened and civilized of all Christian peoples, but here are also the numerous representatives of the most powerful heathen nations—the Chinese, the Japanese, the Hindoos are not absent, and the numbers of these are increasing every year. In the United States we can preach to multitudes of all the nations of Europe.

And from these "strangers within our gates" a constant tide of communication is going forth with their fatherlands. The Catholic and the wide-awake strong Protestant churches are preaching in many languages, and often with great effect, to the populations of the United States.

And this is the freest country on the earth. We can without let or hindrance preach the word of life to all; nothing in our laws or institutions prevents this. And then the immigrants from other lands soon learn here the principles and habits of freedom of thought and speech in religion as in other things; they will in time, in spite often of early prepossessions, become accustomed to hear with good will the voice of a free gospel. There is growing up in the bosom of the Roman church an American catholicism, which is daily gaining strength in liberal thought, and is filling with dismay the Jesuitic and Dominican parties.

And let us never for a moment or anywhere forget in our home missions that a special and great task and a task that should ever fill our souls with the holiest enthusiasm and zeal, has in the providence of the Most High been placed in our hearts and hands: the striving for the restoration of primitive Christianity.

That our exalted plea for the apostolic doctrine and practice in the church will be heard by Americans—but also by others here—is historically demonstrated. More than a million stand to-day in this land as the enlightened, convinced, earnest adherents, representatives and advocates of primitive New Testament Christianity.

It is evident that the United States, because of its general enlightenment, its freedom of thought and action, its great example of unrestrained religious liberty, and its marvelous power of religious growth, is in the providence of God the land above all others for the victorious preaching of primitive Christianity. Not to see this is to shut our eyes to the most obvious historical facts; not promptly and joyfully, in all devotion and zeal, to lay hold of this opportunity which God himself has so manifestly offered to us, is to reject the proffered hand of God, and to sin grievously against him.

And America, the United States, has become the pathway to the nations of the farthest east. China, Japan, the Oceanic Archipelago, will hereafter best be reached from our western shores; they are daily coming more and more under the influence of this land of God's providential great purposes.

Let our American missionary society, therefore, be clothed with mighty power to do effectually its share in executing God's great purpose in this land of the greatest religious opportunities on the earth.

NOT ON MEAT

Man Couldn't Regain Strength Until He Changed to Grape-Nuts.

It's a common joke to say, "He eats so much it makes him poor to carry it around," when speaking of some thin, scrawny fellow who eats as much as a horse, but it is frequently true if the food is not the kind the body calls for.

A person might eat a ton of improper food and never get an ounce of nourishment from it but put them on a Grape-Nuts diet and four teaspoonfuls of this food (which is all nourishment) quickly brings pounds in weight and a fortune in health and strength. This has been proved over and over.

A German woman of Chicago gives an instance in her own family. It's briefly told but the truth is there: "My husband lost his left hand in an accident and lost a terrible amount of blood, kept getting weaker for five months and finally got a terrific cough. He would eat big meals of meat and potatoes to get well, but didn't get any good from them. Finally I persuaded him to try Grape-Nuts food and from a skeleton of 83 pounds he soon regained his normal weight of 207 pounds and is strong and well and declares he wants no other food for the main part of his meals.

"As for myself my flesh was flabby, I tired so easily and my memory was so poor I could keep nothing in my head, but after three months of the Grape-Nuts diet I gained 12 pounds, my flesh is hard and firm, I am stronger and my memory has improved wonderfully. I keep a candy store, but I sell Grape-Nuts, too, for I think it is the best thing to give the children." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Room for Both

By S. W. Traum

Conservatism assails progressiveness because it sacrifices safety to swiftness. Progressiveness grows impatient at conservatism's torpidity and immobility. The one wants to make men safe and strong; the other wants to keep them moving. The one says, "You are a bigot"; the other says, "You are a skeptic." Each thinks his own position right and consequently looks upon the other's condition as distressing. Says one: "See, every step you take is beset with danger! Leaving our old landmarks we are sure that you are wrong and ere long you will be lost." And the other replies: "We have no disposition to be merely safe; there is yet more land to be possessed. It is true that possibility of mistakes threatens—this is inevitable to enterprise—but even mistakes are preferable to doing nothing."

This much in general. Comparison might be almost indefinitely prolonged. The one says: "You are a Jew afraid to leave your place of safety in Egypt and brave the desert for Canaan." The other replies: "You are a Jew who, being so desirous of getting to Canaan, will push out into that trackless desert without a guide. If your bones finally bleach on the desert's sands, it will but serve you right for such reckless abandon." They look at each other in amazement—the one surprised at the other's recklessness and the other amazed at the strange paralysis that has seized his brother. The one shuts himself in his little circle and says, "Let me be safe," and the other, unbridled, is willing to descend to the bottomless pit, if need be, to bring truth from thence.

And so the war wages. If the battle affected only those whose names now appear on the roster of war, then we might pass it by as an innocent game of logomachy, but with increasing emphasis is the call to take sides with one or the other. Our missionary secretaries in open letters, and possibly in private letters, have been asked for their position on the questions under discussion. So to speak, they have been drafted to fall into line. And volunteers have appeared at the recruiting offices of the opposing parties and have signified the side they take in the issue. Then the effort has been made to locate the field of battle geographically. This, in our judgment, is without success, for even in Sardis—whichever place this is—there are a few who have not denied the faith that the other side (or city) professes. Nor is it simply a question of men, for in all the unkind things that have been said about doctrine, but few personalities have entered, and the fact remains that in the controversy both disputants are our brethren. When the smoke of battle clears away it will be found that the "brotherhood" will not have "disappeared."

The present scribe does not want to appear presumptuous in speaking for this brotherhood that they want still to retain these brethren as brethren. If in any way they represent for us the two ideas of safety and progress, the brotherhood wants both. But it does not want either alone. They have an intense desire to be safe and they have an intense desire to grow into all the demands that this or any other age may require, but in leaving Egypt they insist upon a Moses appointed to the task to lead them across the trackless desert. It may be that after a while they will harden their hearts through unbelief and refuse to enter when the way is pointed out, but for the present they are honestly disposed to follow a wise leader who will lead them into a better land. And if in transit Moses dies, they will gladly march under the man next in command. This, at any rate, is our faith in the brotherhood. There will come no great division out of this discussion.

Undue importance is frequently given to announcements of new "epochs." With a monotony that is almost painful, we have a characterization of the age offered us. One man proclaims the coming of a new age, forgetting that an age worth having stands in little need of his proclamation. An age, like the sun, announces itself. An opposing brother can, with greatest ease, deny the name of the age that has been announced. They are both right. The one really sees and the other really does not see. But what we plead for is this: that a brotherhood with eyes wide open is able to see for itself and should not be concerned seriously with the discussions of brethren as to what they see and what they do not see. Herein is the inconsistency of asking our missionary secretaries to define their attitude toward either of these disputants, or indeed to coerce them into a confession of their faith. These men are brethren in Christ and while they, like ourselves, frequently find their plans defeated and someone going wrong, they are not at liberty to require from us a new statement of our faith concerning any incidental matters, nor are we under the necessity of so declaring ourselves. The same liberty is theirs. The heresy of a small missionary offering is their greatest worry and they sensibly meet the need by increasing the amount of literature and judiciously distributing same. By these means they hope to render obsolete the heresy of anti-missions.

This is not a peculiar age, in the sense that it is absolutely different from any and all ages that have preceded it. Ideas once considered vital and immortal have with the changing years been rendered obsolete. Any growing man is compelled to confess "that I verily thought within myself to do many things contrary to what I now think is right." Why should it be thought incredible that these same conditions are with us now? Men are yet struggling to expand the bounds of the finite. And in all this it is inevitable that in that widening process some scout should get out to where there is danger of being lost. That Edenic ambition to become as gods is with us yet. But whatever progress we can make consistent with safety is open to us. Instead of spending time in the affirmation and denial of questions speculative, it behooves us to return to the necessity of making the Christ central in all our studies. In his leadership there is safety, and under his leadership there is progress. There is room for the devout conservative and for the reverent progressive. If there is any article of faith that is utterly subversive to the true faith, the defenders of it will ultimately go each to his own place. We must, however, still insist that a brotherhood is capable of deciding for itself.

SOAKED IN COFFEE

Until too Stiff to Bend Over.

"When I drank coffee I often had sick headaches, nervousness and biliousness much of the time, but about 2 years ago I went to visit a friend and got in the habit of drinking Postum.

"I have never touched coffee since and the result has been that I have been entirely cured of all my stomach and nervous trouble.

"My mother was just the same way, we all drink Postum now and have never had any other coffee in the house for 2 years and we are all well.

"A neighbor of mine, a great coffee drinker, was troubled with pains in her side for years and was an invalid. She was not able to do her work and could not even mend clothes or do anything at all where she would have to bend forward. If she tried to do a little hard work she would get such pains that she would have to lie down for the rest of the day.

"I persuaded her at last to stop drinking coffee and try Postum Food Coffee and she did so and she has used Postum ever since; the result has been that she can now do her work, can sit for a whole day and mend and can sew on the machine and she never feels the least bit of pain in her side, in fact she has got well and it shows coffee was the cause of the whole trouble.

"I could also tell you about several other neighbors who have been cured by quitting coffee and using Postum in its place." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

COLLEGE TOPICS.—I.

College Popularity.

By Burriss A. Jenkins.

College popularity is a very changeable thing. I have seen a man borne on the wings of it one day, lose it the next. So slight an action—a hasty word, an unjust attitude, a foolish position, or, it may be, a determined stand for the right, will lose it. It is not often that the latter is the case; but any injustice, any selfish or egotistic attitude is sure to destroy the growth of popularity as a blasting wind burns up the green crop.

Popularity in college life, like happiness, does not come to him who seeks it as the chief end. Nobody but would be pleased to possess it. But like the will-o'-the-wisp, or the gold of the rainbow, it flees from him who seeks, and comes to him who may care nothing about it.

Therefore one should never seek for college preferment. A man in politics may ask for others' votes; a man in college, never. A man in the big world may seek place and honors; a man in college may not. The great world is nothing like so rigid and severe in its tests and ideals as is the college world. It tolerates much self-seeking that academic life will never bear. I would therefore advise every college student never to seek a place on public occasions, an office or an elective honor. Let place come knocking at your door, and not you at its door. Your deepest heart-burning in college life, and your bitterest memories, I take it, will come from your own self-assertions, few or many.

Nowhere do Shakespeare's words have so true an application as in college:

"Young man, I charge thee, fling away ambition;
By that sin fell the angels."

This is not to say that one should not duly estimate himself, believe in himself, healthily find outlet for his powers. Not at all. It is not that he should not enter every square and open contest for which he thinks himself fitted; but I am talking now rather of places and honors which depend upon the votes of your fellows—the public suffrage, the public choice. Time and again the public choice errs, in college and out of it; and yet, for all in all, it is more nearly infallible than any other agency of choice. Therefore, let it choose. In college and out of college it is a very safe rule, with due limitations: "Let the place seek the man, and not the man the place." Fit yourself for the place as best you can, and use every legitimate and modest way to let it be known that you are fitted for the place, and then let the place choose you. Do not break your own heart seeking the place. The place you deserve will come.

I am not at all sure but that one firm friendship formed in college life is worth more to you than all the popularity possible. A single friendship is a priceless boon. Yet be sure of this, that to limit yourself to one intimacy will destroy all popularity, all other friendships.

Do not understand me as saying that the college community, either student body or faculty, is infallible in its estimate of men. I think it is far more unerring than the big world outside. It usually takes pretty fairly well the measure of a man, and the big world very often misses that measure by whole yards and miles. But there are many men whom the college thought to be budding great ones, who afterward proved to be mediocre; and many a man is set down in college for the dead level of the average who afterward proves a giant. Gunsaulus and John Fiske took no college honors, but were reclusive browsers in the university libraries. Nobody ever supposed they would be national or international in size.

What is the value of college popularity after all, then? Much the same as in the big world outside. It helps a man to do his work. It multiplies his impression. It is a measurably true index to his powers and personal charm. But when all is said, it comes to none so surely as to the man of character. Not to genius, not to brilliance, not to self-assertion, but to modest, whole-souled, determined, honest manhood—manhood willing to serve—serve without reward, it comes in greater or in less degree, invariably comes. The path of popularity is the path of duty.

Baird-Huey case, and one could see the fine attorney hand of my friend Mrs. Judith Foster in the report. As soon as the doors were opened, however, the Daughters told all about it, and the next morning it was fully reported in all the newspapers. Miss Baird-Huey is vindicated, and peace reigns in Warsaw.

Altogether, to the onlooker from the dome, the ladies had a good time. If they will drop the "personal privilege" business, under which all manner of questions creep in, and stop such feminine announcements as, "Two and a half pairs of gloves have been found in the hall and left at the secretary's desk," and leave their parlor voices and holy tone at home, and keep their factions and wire-pulling and personal infelicities out of view, and teach women how to wear their skirts without sweeping the streets and harvesting the microbes, and their hats without shutting out the horizon, as well as how to wear badges, and cultivate patriotism, revive revolutionary memories, and restore the old ideals of the republic, they will convince the most skeptical that they have a purpose.

The Blight of Unbelief.

By Simpson Ely.

"Take heed, brethren, lest haply there shall be in any one of you an evil heart of unbelief, in falling away from the living God."—Heb. 3:12.

Unbelief is heart disease. It is spiritual apoplexy. It paralyzes the soul even as disease deadens the body. Faith is normal. Unbelief is abnormal. It is a toadstool on the tree of humanity. It is a carbuncle on the neck of the world. Man is normally a religious animal. He who gave us hunger for food, thirst for drink, a social nature and the love of the beautiful also implanted the God-idea in the soul. He who uproots it is found fighting against God.

Infidelity stifles all benevolence and all philanthropic feelings. It lives for self and self alone. Like the rich fool in our Savior's parable it says, "Soul, take thine ease. Eat and drink, for to-morrow you shall die." The great American agnostic said, "I believe in the gospel of plenty to eat, plenty to drink and plenty of sleep." So also does the hog, or any other animal. I challenge the infidel world to point to one benevolent institution that was founded and sustained by any school of unbelief. It has never provided a life-saving service on the seas; it has built no schools for the blind or institutes for deaf and dumb; it has provided no asylums for the insane or hospitals for the feeble-minded; it has no benevolent associations to care for homeless children and indigent old age.

Unbelief is the poison of the soul. A Russian nihilist wrote this creed upon the stone wall of his prison cell: "No God, no Christ, no Bible inspired, no life after death, no soul, no heaven, no hell. Grab all you can get; but be careful you do not get grabbed! Amen."

It is said that the Spaniards hundreds of years ago navigated the Mediterranean sea. When they would come to the Straits of Gibraltar and look out upon the great ocean they thought it an infinite stretch of water with no boundary line. They thought there was nothing beyond. Spain stamped upon her coin the pillars of Hercules and across them the Latin legend, Ne plus ultra, No more beyond! But in 1492 Columbus gave the lie to that statement. He sailed westward across that ocean and discovered land. There was more beyond, vastly more beyond. Spain was compelled to change the legend from ne plus ultra to plus ultra—from "No more beyond," to "More beyond."

So unbelief would say to us when bereft by death of a beloved child or Christian parent, Ne plus ultra. It would cloud the soul with the blackness of despair. Jesus comes to us, dispels the darkness and the gloom and stamps upon the tablet of the heart, Plus ultra.

Blessed be his holy name!

THE PRODIGAL SON.— Luke 15:11-24.

Memory Verses 17-19.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Come and let us return unto the Lord.—Hosea 6:1.

The Use of Parables.

Knowing how all mankind loves a story, and how truth in concrete form may win a hearing even from reluctant ears, Jesus put into the form of stories some of the greatest truths which he wished to proclaim. In interpreting the parables it is of the first importance to remember that Jesus did not try to put all truth into any one parable and that not every detail of the story corresponds to some spiritual fact. For example, compare the various parables which represent the return of the sinner to God. In the parables of the lost coin and the lost sheep the lost one is wholly passive in the process of return; it is simply found and brought back. But in the parable of the prodigal son the lost one returns without suggestion or assistance, and the father simply stands ready to receive him. To press the details would result in confusion and contradiction. The true interpretation consists simply in grasping the positive teaching of each: in the first, that God is eagerly seeking the lost and using all means to bring them back; the second, that sinners are free, that they are not compelled to come back, and that God is willing to receive and forgive them when they come.

Sick of Home.

The first stage in the moral degeneration of the prodigal was his rebellion against the restraints of his own home. Perhaps even back of that was the fact that he came to feel that home was a place of restraint rather than a place of privilege. The revolt against God is essentially a departure from home, a wandering from the rightful and normal place where a man ought to be, and it begins in a failure to realize that nearness to God and obedience to God really give the largest liberty and the truest blessedness. The glitter of distant and forbidden things catches the eye. The imagination is enthralled by the thought of the delights which lie beyond the pale. The daily routine, the humble duties, the plain prose of righteousness and everyday goodness seem very dull. He is already a prodigal at heart because he is sick of home, and only waits an opportunity to leave it behind.

Sick Away from Home.

If the inception of sin is to be sick of home, and the act of sin is departure from home, the consummation and fruit of sin is to be sick away from home. The vision of the bliss of sin has faded. The glitter and the tinsel are gone, and there remain but dust and ashes. Instead of joy there is bitterness. Instead of delightful liberty, there is but the mockery of freedom and the most cruel slavery. And home is a long way off. To every sinner, soon or late, will come this experience, this realization that sin is a bad bargain, that it is a fool's quest for treasure in a region where there is nothing of abiding value to be found. It was not necessary for the father to impose an arbitrary penalty. The punishment for going away from home is in being away from home and in those pains and sorrows that inevitably come when one is friendless and forsaken.

Homesick.

At last, when hunger and want have done their chastening and beneficent work, the prodigal comes to himself. He not only knows that he is miserable; he also knows why. He realizes that he made his great mistake in leaving home. His present surroundings are loathsome to him. Perhaps they are no worse in reality than in the days when he took pleasure in sin but, whether through

Spring Medicine

There is no other season when good medicine is so much needed as in the Spring.

The blood is impure, weak and impoverished—a condition indicated by pimples and other eruptions on the face and body, by deficient vitality, loss of appetite, lack of strength, and want of animation.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills

Make the blood pure, vigorous and rich, create appetite, give vitality, strength and animation, and cure all eruptions. Have the whole family begin to take them today.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla has been used in our family for some time, and always with good results. Last spring I was all run down and got a bottle of it, and as usual received great benefit." Miss BEULAH BOYCE, Stowe, Vt.

Hood's Sarsaparilla promises to cure and keeps the promise.

satiety or want, the end of sin is disgust. Fortunate is the man if it be a disgust for sin and not for life itself. From the depth of this misery his mind wanders back to his father's house, and now he sees its joys as he could not when he was there. He values the quiet and normal pleasures of home as it was impossible for him to do when the glamour of the strange lands was in his eyes. He has reached the keenest stage of his misery, and in his suffering, which comes from the realization of his true condition, there is the promise of better things.

The Return Home.

The yearning for home was the first step toward the return. But it left much yet to be done. For centuries sin had been bringing forth its proper fruit in sorrow and hunger and loathing. For centuries prodigals had been going from the passing delights to the enduring torments of sin, and had been catching, too late, some glimpse of the real joys which they had left behind. But how to get back home—that was the question. The old systems of religion had tried with little avail to provide for this need. They had established schemes of sacrifice by which the forgiveness of an angry god could be purchased. They had tried to devise plans by which one could continue in the life of sin, and yet escape the condemnation of sin. Jesus said, it is simpler and yet deeper than that. Just leave the husks and hogs and come home. Never mind about the propitiation for your past sins. The Father will take care of that. What He wants is for you to leave your present sins and come home, and He is ready to receive you when you do come. That was the great revelation through Jesus, that God as a loving Father is willing to receive the wanderer when he returns and give him free forgiveness. And in this great parable of the Prodigal Son he has embodied the history of a soul, sinning but at last saved.

WHAT JOSEPH AND BENJAMIN TEACH ABOUT BROTHERLY CARE.—Gen.
43:29-31, 34; 45:14-22.

(A union meeting with the Intermediates and the Juniors.)

For the Leader.

The case of Joseph and Benjamin stands out in bold relief in the Bible account of the sons of Jacob as an instance of unusual brotherly love. Jacob had a large family of boys. As we often see to-day, they were not all the sons of the same wife, but were divided into four groups corresponding to the four mothers of that family. While these boys got along fairly well, they were like boys of this day, and the sons of the same mother were drawn closer to each other. They formed little circles within the larger family circle. One of these circles was composed of Joseph and Benjamin, the sons of Rachel, the beloved wife of Jacob. A great sorrow befell the family in the death of Rachel after the birth of Benjamin. She lived long enough to name her son, and she called him Benoni, "son of my sorrow." Neither Jacob nor Joseph could ever forget her sad death, and, no doubt, this accounts for the tenderness between them.

For the Members.

1. When the sons of Jacob came into Egypt long after the disappearance of Joseph from Canaan and his elevation to the high place in the trust of the Pharaoh of that land, they had left Benjamin behind. Joseph inquires after him, and he makes them promise to bring him the next trip. This they did, and, upon beholding him for the first time in many years, Joseph could only with difficulty keep himself from tears until the meal was over. After the repast, he retired to his room and burst into tears. How he loved him! And how the thoughts of their dear mother, passed to heaven long since out of her sorrow, made the love more sacred!

2. It was the thought of his only full brother that made Joseph put "five times as much" upon Benjamin's plate as upon the plates of any of the others, though he loved them all. Nothing was so close as his love for that brother. What a beautiful sight it was! See those tender glances toward Benjamin during the dining! There need be no fear that such a love will ever be long disturbed by anything that might come up in the experiences of men. It is blind to faults. It can forgive everything. It is bountiful in its bestowals of favor. Fail? Never. As well think of the failing of the ocean. How strong and tender and beautiful is the love of brothers!

3. Let no one get the thought of any neglect of the other brothers upon the part of Joseph. They all had enough. Their plates were helped bountifully. They "were merry with him." The thought is not that he was selfishly devoted to Benjamin and neglectful of the rest; but that his love for Benjamin was "five times" as great as it was for his half brothers whom he lavishly loved; Benjamin more, and not the others less. It is the wonder of the love of this story that it could love all so well, and yet have in it left infinite possibilities of extension toward Benjamin. It is in this that we see how we are to enjoy the sweet fellowship of family and brotherly love without a selfishly cold indifference to the rest of mankind. And it is here that we get the lesson of how we can love our brethren in the Lord without limit, and yet care for the welfare of those who are still out of the kingdom, care for even the vicious and sinful. It is a great and beautiful lesson.

4. The 133rd Psalm says, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard; that went down to the skirts of his garments; as the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion; for there the Lord commanded a blessing, even life for evermore." We are brethren in the Lord. We are fellow-Christians in the Endeavor society. Our law is Christian love. That is the new commandment that our Lord gave His disciples, and it is the commandment that He has given us. Dare we speak evil of one another? Is it not His will that we speak well of our brethren, and that we do good, and enjoy that love which gives "five times" more instead of "five times" less? Let us care for one another, for He careth for us.

Quiet Hour Thought.

Have I that love which passeth understanding, and do I love my brethren in the Lord as He would have me do?

SONS OF GOD.

"And because ye are sons, God sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father" (Galatians 4:6).

What a transcendent truth is this—our kinship to God! We are His children by creation in His image and likeness, having the capacity for God, and a nature that cannot be satisfied without Him. But this lesson teaches us that we are to become sons of God in an ethical and spiritual sense through the renewal of our moral nature. It is this spiritual sonship based, however, on our moral and spiritual nature as derived from God, that is meant in this lesson.

The Spirit of Adoption. Paul presents this moral and spiritual transformation under the figure of an adoption. It is a legal term signifying the process by which parents often receive and treat as a child one who is not such by natural law. But of course the apostle lifts the word out of its legal limitations and gives it a spiritual significance, making it stand here for that change which one undergoes in the process otherwise known as conversion or justification. Because of this "adoption of sons" Paul declares that: "God sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying, Abba!" which means father. This is the spirit of sonship by which we recognize God as our Father and feel toward Him the love and reverence and trustfulness which the child feels toward his father. It is a great moment in the soul's experience when it can look upward to the great good God and call Him "Father," feeling all the tenderness and love and confiding trust which the name inspires. This gives new meaning and zest to prayer. If God be our Father, why should we not ask Him for whatever we feel that we need?

The Dignity of Sonship. No one can consider thoughtfully what it means to be sons of God without being amazed at the honor and dignity which have been conferred upon us in being brought into this relation.

When the apostle John considered it he exclaimed with rapture, "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the children of God; and such we are" (1 John 3:1). It impressed the apostle as a unique kind of love that would lift up erring, sinful beings, such as we are, to such heights of honor and clothe us with such dignity. Men seek to trace their genealogy back to some great name in history, and feel honored if they can trace connection with one whose name is cherished for his ability or service to mankind. But infinitely greater is the honor of being sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty.

An Old and Well-tried Remedy

How we become children of God. "He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he the right to become children of God, even to them that believed on his name" (John 1:12). It is, then, by receiving Christ, through faith, that we become children of God. And this receiving of Christ by faith means opening our heart to Him, and allowing Him to enter therein and to control our lives. To receive Christ by faith is to receive Him as Saviour and Lord, bowing to His authority, imbibing His spirit and walking in His footsteps. God does not send forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts until we accept His Son according to the full measure of our knowledge of His will.

Our destiny as children of God. Again quoting from our apostle of love: "Beloved, now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that, if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every one that hath this hope set on him purifieth himself even as he is pure" (1 John 3:2,3). To see Christ, not as He was, but as He is, and to be like Him—that is enough! There is a glory and a dignity in that, that far surpasses anything we can now even imagine. And it is this hope of seeing Christ and being like Him that is to purify us and make us meet for such a destiny.

Prayer: Our Father, we thank Thee that we may call Thee by that endearing name. May the Spirit of Thy Son be shed forth abundantly in all our hearts, and may we live as becometh those who are Thy children, until we shall come at last into the full likeness of Thy Son, through the riches of Thy grace toward us in Him. Amen.

to make a trial of the most marvelous remedy ever prepared for the cure of indigestion, constipation, dyspepsia and all forms of kidney and liver trouble. Vernal Palmettona (formerly known as Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine), is the name of this ideal remedy, and any reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is entitled to a trial bottle absolutely free of all cost. If you are ever sick with any of these troubles you should not delay but write at once to The Vernal Remedy Co., 506 Seneca Building, Buffalo, N. Y., and the remedy will be sent you by return mail.

Our Budget

—The greatest World's Fair in history has opened in a blaze of glory and is now in full blast.

—The world is now within our gates, and not without a liberal representation of the other two members of the evil trinity.

—But the church of Christ is here also with its saving influences and agencies, and feels the magnitude of the task that is upon it during the present year.

—We trust the May offering has made a good start and that there will be no let up on the part of the churches until they have all joined in this holy crusade for the evangelization of America.

—President McLean, of the foreign society, glided into our office like a ray of sunshine last week, on his way to visit the Texas Christian university and some missionary meetings in that state. Brother McLean is growing handsomer as he grows older and as the missionary fund increases. When we get to raising a million a year for foreign missions, he will be perfectly irresistible!

—J. J. Haley has been holding a meeting at Wilson, N. C.

—Bethany college has enrolled sixty-six ministerial students this year.

—Dowieites have been forbidden to visit the Louisiana Purchase Exposition.

—J. E. Lynn, of Springfield, Ill., has accepted a call to Warren, O., to take effect June 1.

—Ella P. McConnell, Youngstown, O., gave the baccalaureate address April 24 for the Gustavus high school.

—We hear that the University Place church, Seattle, is very much pleased with the ministry of Wister C. Williams.

—The church at Narka, Kan., has employed Albert Young as pastor. The new building will be finished some time in June.

—L. L. Carpenter is to dedicate the Bethany church of Christ at Elizabethton, Tenn., of which E. C. Buck is pastor, on May 29.

—We regret to learn that Brother Frank has resigned at Lebanon, Ind., on account of bad health. He has been seriously sick for four weeks.

—J. W. Lowber, of Austin, Texas, has been delivering a series of chapel addresses at the state university on "The Seven Sayings of Christ on the Cross."

—"Bro. Ed. Briscoe has been making a noble sacrifice in keeping the babies and allowing his wife to attend the meetings."—Christian Visitor, Arkansas.

—One of the visitors to the World's Fair opening was James Fillmore, of Cincinnati, O. Brother Fillmore's firm is making an exhibit in the musical department.

—There are but four more Sundays between now and children's day—the first Lord's day in June. All necessary supplies may be ordered from the foreign society, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

—Last week the Foreign Christian Missionary Society received another gift of $500 on the annuity plan from a sister in Georgia. The society hopes to receive many such gifts in the next few months.

—Bro. W. R. Jinnett began his labors as pastor of the Central church, Columbus, Ind., last Lord's day. He was greeted by enthusiastic audiences at both services, and the church hopes for the best success under his leadership.

—Clariss Yeuell has been giving his lecture "On the Summits of the Sunny South" at William Woods college. Brother Yeuell, after seven years' labor in Dixie, has just spent four months in Missouri and will make his home at Shelbyville.

—Clarksville, Pa., is rejoicing in the return of Bro. A. A. Doak as pastor, after an absence of six months. He has been pastor during this time of the Monongahela church, which had many additions to its membership during his period of oversight.

—Our cause has prospered in many places in the northwest during the past year. We are glad to hear that the church of Christ at Pendleton, Oregon, will "soon take the town if it keeps on." That is the way to talk. Bro. N. H. Brooks and his helpers are to be congratulated.

—G. P. Rutledge, pastor of the Third Christian church in Philadelphia, writes: "The work in Philadelphia is doing nicely. There have been additions to the Third church every Lord's day for six or eight weeks." Brother Rutledge is a Milligan boy and shows the good training he received from President Hopwood.

—As May 1 was a day of sunshine in most parts of the country, it may be concluded that the home mission offering did not suffer because of lack of occupants of the pews. Wherever, however, the offering has not been taken, any other Lord's day during this month may be chosen for the receipt of the brotherhood's gifts. Read the article by Brother Loos.

—Our readers will be interested in the interview with General Cronje, the veteran hero of the Boer war, secured by a member of our editorial staff. This will be one of the features of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST during the progress of the World's Fair. General Cronje is now a close neighbor of the editor of this paper, and will be for several months.

—A writer in Atlanta describing Brother Cree's family concludes: "Baby Cree is the greatest of the three. She has already been dubbed 'the church baby.' She at once claimed her regency in our hearts by her quaint, dainty winsomeness and apparent spontaneous affection for us, and we readily acknowledge our allegiance to Queen Martha Elizabeth Cree."

—Plans and estimate for a building at Wenatchee, Wash., are being prepared. There are about fifty brethren in and around this town, and while the task will be hard financially, it is felt that a house of worship is needed to do the work that ought to be and it is believed can be done, and the brethren, being determined to try, have bought a lot in the best location in town.

—A. W. Kokendoffer reports that his brother-in-law, Frank W. Allen, son of F. G. Allen, late of Kentucky, passed through Mexico, Mo., to begin the pastorate of the Christian church at Odessa, Mo. Brother Allen was at one time on the reportorial force of the Kansas City Times, but two years ago entered the College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky., to fit himself for the ministry.

—And now Germany sends in an order for "Helps to Faith." We have been convinced for some time that Germany needs to have its faith helped, and we rejoice at this substantial evidence that it is awaking to the consciousness of its needs. The head of our book department said to us the other day, " 'Helps to Faith' is the best selling book we have in stock." It is one of the encouraging signs that books of this character are in demand.

—A big show has been in Philadelphia. One of our brethren thinks that this may have accounted to some extent for the small attendance of non-Christians at one of the churches, and he adds that he knows of a brother, an elder in the church too, in western New York who took his boy to a show, and when asked about it by his pastor, replied, "I took my boy William that he might have a lesson in natural history." The comment is "Yes, but the elder went along, you notice."

—After two and a half years of successful ministry, in which time he saw the congregation at La Junta, Colo., move out of a hall and into a modern and commodious brick structure, R. H. Lampkin has resigned his ministry there to take effect on or before the middle of August. In the meantime he is expected to hold a meeting for the congregation at Las Animas, Colo. His future work is undecided, but he is busy upon a work on "The Scriptural Foundation for Christian Liberty," which the Christian Publishing Company is to bring out for him soon.

—Sister Euphrama Conklin, of Pennsylvania, has just given our National Benevolent Association $100 on the annuity plan. Geo. L. Snively, 903 Aubert Ave., St. Louis, will explain the annuity plan system and the work of the association to all inquirers.

—The West Side Christian church, San Francisco, has just secured an assistant pastor in the person of Wm. F. Stafford, who has had considerable experience in preaching and pastoral work. The dedication of the new building has been postponed owing to the fact that pews and carpets which were ordered from the east have been unavoidably delayed.

—The Church Herald, of Philadelphia, rejoices that "the holy men at the head of the First, Third and Kensington churches of Philadelphia; Ninth Street, Washington, and those at Reading and Plymouth—Batman, Rutledge, Garrigues, Bagby, Weaver and Knipp, are live men and always at work to push the glorious cause." It says this because it believes they "must be thriving, from the reports of the things being accomplished among them."

—Bro. D. B. Titus has been compelled to leave Carlsbad, N. M., for a lower altitude on account of his wife's health. So they have gone to Deweese, Neb. Brother Titus regrets especially having to go away from the work when the new church building has just started. It will probably be two months before he can determine whether it will be wise for them to return to this sphere of work. In the meantime Bro. Charles Blanchard, of Wapello, Ia., is supplying the pulpit.

—The pledge of $200 from the Benevolent Association, and a draft of $5 from Bro. M. T. Reeves, of Columbus, Ind., and $5.00 from Prof. C. B. Newcomer, Drury College, Springfield, Mo., we believe are the only additions to our World's Fair Pavilion fund which have not previously been acknowledged. A few of the pledges previously made have also been paid. Every one of our members who visits the fair will be sure to use that building as a convenience. You will enjoy it more if you help pay for it. Now is the time to help.

—Among the other good meetings which we report this week, is a unique one held by Brother Harlow which will be found on our second budget page. It demonstrates what we have long believed, that it is possible for our evangelists to lead in union evangelistic services, not in every place, perhaps, but in many places, with the most gracious results. A people pleading for Christian union ought to be leaders in union evangelistic meetings, and in all union efforts that look to the extension of the kingdom of God. We hope this is only the beginning of many such meetings.

—L. G. Batman, pastor of the First Christian church, Philadelphia, has been preaching a series of sermons that may be suggestive to other preachers. There were four on "The Elements of Strength in the Early Church." They were upon the following subjects: "The Creed," "The Purpose," "The Conditions of Membership," and "The Lord's Supper." Brother Batman is continuing the series with sermons on "The Personnel of the Early Church," "The Preparation of the Disciples," "The Democracy of the Church," "The Supremacy of the Church," and the "Finance of the Early Church."

—With the clearing of the skies, the gradual subsidence of the high waters and the growth of the folk boom in Missouri, there is every reason for encouragement and for increased activity along all the lines of religious work and of civic righteousness. The nomination and election of Joseph W. Folk as governor of Missouri and the carrying out of his program of reform in the purification of our state and city politics, will do more to advertise Missouri favorably to the world than all the exhibits of iron, zinc, copper, stone, lead, fruit, farm products or manufactures that may be crowded into the largest building on the Fair grounds. It is conscience and righteousness that make a great state—not cattle, corn, minerals, nor manufactures, though the latter help where the former exist.

—A paper from a southern city contains a communication from an excluded member of a Christian church who is serving as editor of a small schismatic sheet, in which he sits in judgment on a local congregation, summoning its elder to appear before him as a self-appointed "evangelist," that he and his church may be set in order! The elder replies to him in proper fashion, if indeed such unwarranted assumption of authority needed any reply whatever. These recent attempts to override the authority of the local congregation indicate the need of a reassertion of our congregationalism.

—Writing from Virginia Christian college, Lynchburg, Va., Pres. J. Hopwood says: "Our college work here has been well blessed this year. The enrollment is 157 and our young people average over 18 years of age. Bro. J. J. Haley will deliver the sermon for us at 10 A. M., May 22, and Dr. Kent, from the University of Virginia, gives an address Wednesday, May 25, 8 P. M. Our senior program will come Thursday, 10 A. M., May 26. There are eight members in the class." This is a fine showing for the first year of this college, and we congratulate President Hopwood on the encouraging outlook.

—John G. Woolley gave an address at the Central church, Lexington, Ky., recently. Bro. I. J. Spencer reports him as having in conversation asked a Presbyterian the secret of the rapid growth of the Disciples of Christ. The latter answered: "I think it is the flexibility of their position." Mr. Woolley then said: "I think it is their logical consistency." Brother Spencer being asked his view, replied: "I think it is the scriptural simplicity of their plea." Mr. Woolley then said: "That is what I mean," and added, "The preachers among the Disciples know just what they ought to do and do it." Shall we live up to this reputation?

—Secretaries B. L. Smith and F. M. Rains, of the home and foreign societies, spent Monday in the city, consulting with the ministers in the Monday ministers' meeting and with the general local committee preparing for our international convention in October in the evening, concerning the details of preparation for that great convocation. They were present at the invitation of the local committee, through its general chairman, W. H. Mc Clain, and all the details were gone over very carefully. The secretaries and the committee are preparing for a convention which shall exceed in magnitude all previous conventions as far as our World's Fair exceeds all its predecessors.

—We regret exceedingly to learn of the death of the wife of Prof. J. D. Forrest, of Butler college, who died at Daytona, Fla., on Wednesday, April 27, of tumor on the brain. She had not been very well for some time, but the cause and gravity of the trouble were not suspected until recently and the end came very suddenly. Professor Forrest went to Florida about a week before she died. The body was taken to Indianapolis where the funeral services and burial took place on Saturday, April 30. Sister Forrest was a woman of brilliant mind and a most devoted Christian. We sympathize deeply with our bereaved brother in the unspeakable loss which he has sustained.

—We acknowledge the receipt of a good, racy speech by Hon. Champ Clark, delivered in the house of representatives recently on "Tariff Reduction and Genuine Reciprocity." A congressional speech now is a good example of running the gauntlet, and a man must be prepared for all sorts of interruptions from the opposite side. Referring to President Roosevelt as "no idiot" who would send a treaty to congress [he did not approve, he says: "He knows something about more things than any other human being I ever clapped my eyes on." Mr. Clark was chastising the opposite party for not carrying out the reciprocity program of President McKinley, endorsed by President Roosevelt.

—Before any other Disciple school had reached that mark, Disciples all over the country admired the unfailling $500 children's day offering from the First church, Allegheny. Back of it stood Wm. H. Graham, for twenty years its superintendent. Brother Graham is the subject of a biographical article in the Christian Worker. He has long been a trustee of, and also is a deacon in, the First church. When days were darkest for Bethany college, some funeral remarks were made in the presence of one who knew, and his verbatim answer was, "Graham and Oliver and Cochran never say die." Mr. Graham has been president of the executive committee since its headquarters were moved to Pittsburgh. His youngest son is now at school at Bethany.

—Bro. J. M. Springer sends us a few words from Los Angeles in the nature of news. He says that Bro. Eugene Burr having prepared a model camping outfit, departed with his amiable wife for a recruiting trip up the coast, leaving a warm place in the hearts of numerous friends at the East Side Christian church, Los Angeles, where the twain have labored and planted well for many months. Brother Crabtree, of San Diego, delighted the congregation on a recent Sunday with a splendid sermon and a lecture on the following evening. Brother Philputt, who is soon to come to St. Louis, was to preach morning and evening last Lord's day in order that Brother Shie might have further needed rest. Bro. J. P. McKnight is doing a grand work for the "south side" mission church. A lot has been secured and an effort will be made to build a church this fall.

—W. W. Burks, pastor of the Christian church at Mason City, Ia., calls attention to the eighth annual convention of "the young men's Baraca Bible class movement," which meets in St. Louis, Aug. 11, 12. "The Main street Christian church of Mason City organized the first class of this kind in Iowa, and, under the wise leadership of Bro. H. I. Prusia, a consecrated business man, the class now has a membership of about fifty bright, enthusiastic young men working under the motto, 'Young men at work for young men, all standing by the Bible and the Bible-school.' There are at present 75,000 young men enrolled. As a successful method in Bible-school work it should appeal to our people. The writer has been selected to represent the classes of Iowa on the program at the St. Louis convention. We are expecting a large and enthusiastic gathering of the choicest young men in our country."

—Hon. Hugh T. Miller, one of the elders of the Christian church at Columbus, Ind., son-in-law of Bro. Z. T. Sweeney and son of the late Bro. John C. Miller, was nominated lieutenant governor on the Republican ticket at Indianapolis last Wednesday, after one of the hottest political battles that has been fought out in that state for many years. There were three candidates for the position and they all started nearly even, but on the third ballot Brother Miller was nominated by about two-thirds of the votes of the delegates. His great capability and his absolutely clean record were powerfully in his favor, but it was an open secret among the politicians that the members of the Christian church were "solid" for Brother Miller. With such veterans as L. L. Carpenter, D. R. Lucas, H. C. Cassell, Z. T. Sweeney and others to aid him, Brother Miller won a brilliant victory and we extend him our heartiest congratulations, from a religious standpoint at least.

—Brookfield, Mo., has a paper that gives local news, yet is published primarily in the interests of "education, morals, Christianity, and business." Would that all papers would raise that flag. In making a plea for church attendance the editor of the "Brookfield Messenger," says he would go to church even if he were a heathen. He says: "The pulpit of today covers a wider range of literature than ever before; is better equipped with a working knowledge of the useful sciences and arts than ever before. It has a firmer grasp of political ethics, as applied to administrative affairs than ever before; has a deeper penetration into the heretofore hidden meaning of public affairs than ever before. The pulpit of this day differs materially from the pulpit of the past, in that while it maintains its former purity and its old time devotion to the truth, it has laid under tribute every source of infor-

—We regret that Bro. L. E. Brown, who has done such an admirable work at First Christian church, Colorado Springs, Col., recently found it necessary to present to his church board his resignation. The announcement was received with such general regret that the following resolution was unanimously passed:

Resolved, That it being the unanimous opinion of the board that the severance of relations between the church and Bro. L. E. Brown at this time would work a great injury to the cause in this city, we therefore ask Brother Brown to hold his resignation in abeyance for six months, and that we assist him in the expense of sending and maintaining his family in a lower altitude and allow him a vacation, to be taken at such time as he may desire, until we are satisfied as to the result of the change in climate, and if he thinks best at that time to go, that we promise to regretfully accept his resignation.

Brother Brown's salary is to be advanced $500 a year so that he can take the needed vacation and send his family east. Telegrams have been sent to the church authorities in Lebanon, Ind., stating that Brother Brown has decided to stay in Colorado Springs for the present. His daughter will go to a lower altitude very soon, and Brother Brown hopes to be able to get some vacation. All who know of his work at the Springs will pray that he may be able to continue it.

A Union Meeting.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON.—We closed the union meeting at Galena, Kan., last Sunday night, and as this is our first experiment in this line, and so far as I know the first by any of our preachers, I know you and many of your readers will be anxious to know the outcome. There were four churches, Baptist, Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian and Christian represented, and a Quaker preacher who acted (he said) as a balance wheel. We had a splendid hearing of from 600 to 1,000 every night, and 80 persons confessed Christ on an invitation just as we always give it, 50 of whom went to the Christian church. The preachers were loyal to a man from first to last. I preached a full gospel, and they sanctioned it, both in prayer and testimony. If like conditions can be had, and all our best evangelists could hold union meetings and preach the whole truth in love, I believe the Saviour's prayer could be answered a hundred years sooner than any other way. I preached on such subjects as "Rightly Dividing the Word" with chart; "The Church of the Twentieth Century," "Christian Unity," "Moral and Positive Law," etc., all of which were well received. We begin with Bro. M. M. Davis at Dallas, Tex., May 15. Springfield, Mo. W. E. HARLOW.

The Jerusalem Exhibit Tickets.

All who have taken stock in the Jerusalem Exhibit and who have orders for tickets to this exhibit, should write at once to the Jerusalem Exhibit Company, World's Fair, St. Louis Mo. The tickets are ready, and will be sent to all to whom they have been promised.

News From Many Fields

Florida.

Sister Cox, wife of Bro. T. A. Cox, one of our state evangelists, recently passed away. Brother Cox came to Florida partly on account of his wife's health, but only the Great Physician could heal her. Sister Cox was a true Christian, and the devoted wife of one of our most consecrated preachers.—Beginning with the first of July Florida will have three state evangelists, Samuel J. White, of Lake Butler, having been added to the list.—Tampa is the second largest town in the state. If Brother Rawlinson continues as he has begun it will soon have one of the best churches in the state.—The Riverside Sunday-school contributed eight additions in our meeting with Bro. Jas. Small, evangelist. This is not the first fruits from this school. It is about two years old and has for its superintendent and teachers some of the best members of the First church, Jacksonville.—The home school contributed twenty-two to the meeting. In all, there were sixty-seven baptisms, twenty-two by letter and statement, five from the Baptists and one immersed Presbyterian, making ninety-five additions to the church.—Brother Small goes to Orangeburg, S. C., to assist Brother Colyer. J. T. BOONE.

Fifteen Months in Oklahoma.

About fifteen months ago, after I had first visited the field and thought I knew the situation and the obstructions which were liable to retard our progress, I rejected a most urgent call from Kingfisher, O. T., also a call from Knightstown, Ind., and accepted the work at Lawton, O. T., under the A. C. M. S.

The Lawton congregation was and had been for some time in a chaotic state, no church roll, no systematic plan of work, no knowledge to a certainty of their indebtedness or finance, and divided into factions. The first thing they did was to unite in calling me. The next thing was to arrange our indebtedness. $1,000 was borrowed from the church extension, and $500 from one of the banks which enabled us to pay off mortgages amounting in all to $1,462.50. The next thing we created a church roll and located the members. This roll gave a bona fide membership of seventy-five. We also systematized so that we were enabled to know what we were doing financially.

We paid off the bank's note of $500 and had some money on hand to be applied on the first church extension note, which fell due last January. We also added sixty-nine to the membership and lost by letter six, making a total gain of sixty-three.

After resigning at Lawton I signed a contract with the A. C. M. S. which made me "missionary pastor" at Walters, O. T. (a good town twenty miles below Lawton), and "evangelist of Oklahoma." While thus engaged I preach twice a month at Walters (to which place I moved), once a month at Temple and Hastings. I visited Snyder where I instituted a church of twenty-five names. I did the same at Cache and Hastings, and instituted and re-organized churches at Temple and Mt. View. These are good points and need a good man, a strong man, no others will do.

I quit the A. C. M. S. March 31, 1904, and began the pastorate here April 1. In many respects I liked Oklahoma, but the work done there does not tell as the same work would elsewhere. The people are liberal. While my salary at Lawton was $75 and they paid it every cent, it was many times hard to meet, and it meant a sacrifice on the part of many.

My salary in the evangelistic field was larger than while at Lawton. I say these things so that if any preacher may think of going to Oklahoma he may know that he will be supported to the fullest extent of the churches' ability. But I would also have him to know that the expense of living in Oklahoma is greater than in many places, especially is this true in the "new" country.

We are well pleased with this "old" congregation which was organized in the "40s." The church, while up to date, is "still" apostolic in all things. My predecessor, while a business man in Burlington, is an all round preacher and pastor. During his four years here he paid off a large debt and made some repairs on the church and added seventy-five to the membership. The people here love him and I love him. He is a "John the Baptist" in many respects. He has this cause at heart and will help us from time to time. If we had more such men the church would be in far better condition, for business must be mixed with Christianity.

Northern California.

W. T. Hunt, of Fortuna, goes to Illinois for a year's rest and recuperation with friends instead of going to Madison. Not but what he would be among friends at Madison, but it would be work and he needs rest. He will be back in California though, for no one, or to be correct, not one person in one hundred who comes to California and stays three months will ever live anywhere else.

Frank W. Barber, of What Cheer, Iowa, has accepted a call to the Lodi church, and will be with them May 1. We rejoice in this for we think from all we can learn that in Brother Barber we have secured a strong man, and in Sister Barber a splendid helper.

Frank E. Jones, of Palouse, Washington, has been called to Selma, and will be on hand May 1 to succeed A. L. Platt who becomes state evangelist. This is as it should be. Arrangements should always be made when at all possible to have an incoming man on the field the very day the outgoing man retires. It is an exceedingly false and unbusinesslike policy to take a rest between pastors. Keep the battle going.

I understand A. C. Smither is to hold a meeting at Woodland shortly. May it be in keeping with the men who will be at the helm. Shrout and Smither ought to make something give way.

Mrs. Clara H. Hazelrigg is in a meeting at Los Gatos and is getting a taste of California work. We look for good results. She always gets them.

Real California weather is upon us once more. Here and there "haying" has commenced. Vegetation seems to grow two inches per day.

Bro. J. S. Pierce, of St. Helena, has openings for a few good Christian families about Rutherford, in the Napa valley, where he labors. That vicinity has been settled fifty years, and a crop failure is unknown to the oldest settler. No need of irrigation either. A few good families there would bring our church to self-support

Healdsburg. J. P. DARGITZ, Cor. Sec.

The Central Illinois Ministerial Institute.

The ministerial institute of Central Illinois was held at Atlanta, April 14-16. This church has entertained the institute five times. Bro. S. S. Lappin, the pastor, and his people helped to make the occasion one of the most successful and enjoyable in the history of these gatherings.

G. B. VanArsdale, of Peoria, was the efficient and genial president. To him is due the happy arrangement of the program. The sessions were on "The Minister," "The Congregation" and "Doctrine." The papers were well prepared, and the institute is approaching a small congress, on more conservative lines, however.

The institute was most materially benefited by the presence of A. P. Cobb, formerly one of Illinois' best pastors, now of Waynesburg, Pa. J. W. Kilborn came back from Iowa to close his year's work as secretary. J. H. Gililand, W. H. Cannon, S. H. Zendt, Alva W. Taylor and others gave excellent addresses. But Kentucky contributed the larger share of the institute in the person of I. J. Spencer, of Lexington. His sermons were heard by large audiences and as deeply appreciated by the humblest layman as by the ablest minister. They were great in their simplicity. And he was of incalculable helpfulness to the younger ministry. For he is not to be imitated except as one imitates his Christ.

The institute will meet at Arcola next year with Brother Faulders and his church. The following officers were elected: president, Alva W. Taylor; vice-president, Silas Jones; secretary and treasurer, Finis Idleman.

"Christian Union" in Philadelphia.

Recently Dr. Fulton, editor of the Church Standard (Episcopal), read a paper on "Christian Union" before the ministerial union of Philadelphia. The audience of fully 500 ministers manifested a keen interest in the subject. Taking the Savior's prayer, recorded in the 17th chapter of John, as a text, Dr. Fulton made an ardent appeal for organic union. He compared the twentieth century church with that of the first century, referred to the havoc wrought by existing divisions, and declared that nothing short of union in doctrine and concerted action would suffice.

For thirty minutes he stood squarely with the Disciples; it would have filled the bill on "union night" at our national convention. But the conclusion of his splendid address was an abrupt divergence. As a basis of union he suggested and insisted upon the Nicene creed.

In the general discussion which followed G. P. Rutledge asked why we should try to effect a union upon the Nicene creed and recommended the New Testament creed instead. This was replied to by Bishop Coadjutor Mackay Smith, of the Episcopal church. He began by saying it would be impossible to go back to the New Testament for a creed; then emphasized the spirit of union which already exists.

The following Monday Mr. Rutledge met Dr. Kerr Boyce Tupper on the street. During a brief conversation Dr. Tupper said: "I was sorry I could not attend the ministerial meeting. But I read about it and was much interested in the discussion and especially the position you took. You were right, and had I been there I should have stood squarely with you."

Dr. Tupper is pastor of the First Baptist church, the wealthiest and most influential church of that denomination in Philadelphia. In a sermon in his own church, some time ago, he condemned the name "Baptist," and insisted that every congregation should be called the church of God.

The Disciples do not stand alone. Others, of every denomination, are helping to blaze the way back to Christ. REPORTER.

Kansas Ministerial Institute.

The Kansas state ministerial institute held a most profitable convention at Hutchinson. The only fact to be regretted was that every minister of the state was not able to be present and to gain the inspiration which is of inestimable value to his work. Only about seventy-five ministers were in attendance, but the influence of the institute cannot be restricted to that number for they undoubtedly carried to their homes many ideas which will serve to enthuse and inspire many Christian workers.

The principal speakers or teachers of the institute were T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, and H. O. Breeden, of Des Moines.

Brother Haley's talks were along the practical lines of which he is so fitted by experience to treat. Seated in a large arm chair, his face beaming with the cheer and good will which he has practiced these many years, his very presence was an inspiration, and not a young man present could return to his home without a determination to place so much of love and cheer in his own life that he might learn the great lesson of which Brother Haley is a remarkable example—of "growing old sweet." The thing which most impresses one in Brother Haley's talks is the fact that although he has labored for many years in the service of our Master and one would naturally expect him to have many old fashioned and strict ideas, he has that breadth of love which finds something good in everything, and he can recognize the good in the views of all men whether or not they are in exact harmony with his own. He lives the charity which he professes toward all men. His thoughts at this time were principally along the line of the practical, everyday work of the minister, his personal habits, the manner for preparation of a sermon, his relation to the official board and to the church in general. He gave to those younger in years the lessons which he had gained by years of experience. His attitude toward the institute may perhaps be best expressed by his closing remarks when, as he looked about over the audience, he said, "Boys, I love you, and I wish I were where I could tell you of it every day." May our Father spare Brother Haley to us for many more useful and helpful years is the prayer of the Kansas ministers.

Brother Breeden conducted what might be called the more formal part of the program, presenting some of the problems which are now burdening the minds of the thinking ministers, and he brought out many propositions which will be used to ponder over for many weeks. His addresses on higher criticism and on evangelization were scholarly efforts. While all cannot agree with these subjects as they were propounded it is oftentimes these things upon which we differ that cause us to grow most vigorously, and there was much food for thought in each of Dr. Breeden's discourses. His evening addresses were designed more for the popular audiences and were such as would draw all men to a higher sphere. His subjects were, "The Gospel for this Age," showing that dogma and creed have passed away and that the gospel of love predominates, "The Pre-eminence of Christ," portraying Christ as a master in all spheres of life, and "A Vision of the Christ" which pictured in beautiful terms the glory, the majesty and the beauty of Christ.

In listening to Brother Breeden one is most impressed by his depth of thought and breadth of reading, by his dignity of manner and firmness of purpose and by his stalwart physique which adds not a little to the force of his personality. If Brother Breeden visits our state again the people of Kansas will anticipate his coming with great pleasure.

A New Church in Syracuse.

On April 24 a second church of Christ was organized in Syracuse, N. Y., which will be known as the Rowland street church of Christ. About ten months ago the use of a building, which had been erected for church purposes, was obtained by members of the Central church and a mission Sunday-school organized. The movement proved so successful that a few months later the mission chapel was purchased by the trustees of the Central church. Four weeks ago State Evangelist Stephen J. Corey began the revival meetings which have resulted in the organization of the new church with 26 charter members. Brother Corey continues the meetings for another week, and the membership will doubtless be greatly increased before he leaves, as great interest is manifest and many are inquiring the way. The new church is situated in the midst of a well-populated district, two miles from the Central church. The field about it is white unto the harvest, and the outlook is full of promise. A very efficient board of officers has been elected, and a competent pastor will soon be installed. The Central church continues to prosper. For many weeks not a Lord's day has passed without confessions and baptisms.

WM. D. RYAN, pastor Central church.

State Mission Notes.

The whole brotherhood of the state will sympathize with Bro. W. H. Jones, pastor at Palmyra, in the death of his sweet young wife. Beautiful as a dream, fair as the morning, as good and true as she was beautiful and fair, her early taking away is sad.

So also, we are sure, will we all sorrow with Brother and Sister J. D. Dillard in the death of their youngest daughter. Just past her thirteenth birthday, full of life and vivacity, one of the sweet home children we so often find, the family feel keenly this awful bereavement. Let us all pray for all of these.

W. M. Thomas, the young minister who preached so acceptably at Maysville, has accepted a call to Monroe, Wis., and realizing that it is not good for man to be alone, he has taken to himself a life partner. May their path be lighted with ever increasing sunshine till it merges into the full glory of the never ending day of God.

The topic of conversation now, of course, is our forthcoming state convention. It was felt for a while by many that the combination was an experiment, but we fully believe that it is past that stage now. From the expressions of many we are led to believe that it is going to be a great success. Why not? With Sister Bantz, H. A. Denton, H. F. Davis and T. A. Abbott all pulling and working together for it, surely we can make it a success.

The program, soon to be published, will be found to be one of the best ever prepared for a Missouri convention. The invitation from the Carrollton church is pressing and the hosts are coming, even if it is the World's Fair year. By the way, so many have prophesied that this will hurt us. Is it so? Are we then so very worldly minded a people as that? We do not believe it; our people love the cause of the dear Christ too well for that. Let us have the greatest gathering Missouri has ever had.

What do you think of a chorus of 1,000 voices? Great? Well, that is the size of the one W. Daviess Pittman, of St. Louis, has in hand for the next national convention. Our conventions are noted for their music, but we predict the St. Louis gathering will be a record breaker in this line.

As I write this I am thinking of the very many churches that have not yet taken the state mission offering. Many of them have promised to do this within the next four weeks. Remember that unless your church sends an offering by the time of the state convention it will be delinquent on our books this year; that is, if it has not sent an offering since last September. This ought to be a matter for avoidance by all the churches; but above all that stands the need, the imperative, vital need of funds. It is utterly im-

Evangelists and Evangelism.

By J. M. Rudy.

The First Christian church of Sedalia, Mo., has just closed a good revival meeting. The meeting continued through five weeks, with many interruptions by bad weather. The visible results of the meeting are about ninety additions to the church. Fifty-two of these were by conversion, and the remainder by letter and statement. The preaching was done by Bro. H. A. Northcutt. This was my first experience with this evangelist, and it is a real pleasure to commend him most heartily for his work's sake. I have never worked with a man whose purity and godliness were more deeply impressed upon my mind as well as upon the mind and heart of the entire community.

There are a few things that ought to be impressed upon the mind and heart of every man and every woman who loves this reformation and appreciates its intrinsic merit. It ought to be keenly and deeply realized that our cause and the character of our work as a people are gauged very much by the work of our evangelists. The increased machinery set in motion by a protracted meeting; the larger amount of personal work; the advertising of special services and the calling of the people together daily have the effect of bringing many strangers to the church. These strangers receive impressions in these special meetings which furnish the data for judgments upon us and that for which we stand. These judgments will be favorable or unfavorable, according as the evangelist is real and consecrated, or mechanical and silly (as some are); according as he impresses men that he loves and believes in God and men, or is just working at the "trade" of "evangelism." If his vision is not clear, if he is not "filled with the Holy Spirit," if his soul is not in his work, if he falls in with "fads," if he begins to play "tricks" through the newspaper and the "question box," if he becomes sensational in the bad sense, if he spends much time trying to convince the people that all the denominations are mere sects, and that they are wrong and should do at once what he says they should do, if the evangelist cannot weep over the lost and rejoice over the saved, then the church has lost much of respect in the community as a direct result of the work of the evangelist. The pastor who is left on the field will either resign soon or demonstrate to the community that he, the pastor, is no ordinary man. How? By setting about heroically to correct the errors, to modify the wild, extravagant statements and spiritualize the mechanical work of the evangelist. Alas, how many pastors can accomplish such a task? They have one alternative—move on. But this does not give us back the confidence of the community.

Mr. Moody once said: "He who preaches on hell should have a very tender heart." Should we as a people not realize our need of a class of evangelists more tender, more earnest, more deeply consecrated, and more thoroughly equipped with a knowledge of God's word than any other people on earth? We claim to have taken a higher position—a position above denominational distinctions and party differences. If the position is higher, and it is in theory, then let us be holier. We may cry, "Come to the word of God and unite upon it," but the people interpret this as meaning "come to us." Since this is the fact, why should we not rise in deed and practice, in hard, solid work, in enthusiasm, in inspiration, in such joy and love of holy service that others can say: "Judged by their fruits, they are in advance." The only plea for Christian union which will move this world will be one with more God in it than any other but God's inheritance is in his people.

Our people must rise in their deed to the high level of their creed before this poor ridden world will look longingly toward them. The type and kind of evangelists which our movement is producing ought to cause us serious thought and deep reflection. We cannot allow our cause to be represented by those whose ambition "to count noses" is holding them captive. We cannot afford to turn the sacred interests that we represent over to those to whom "evangelism" has become a sort of get-rich-quick business and who, when work becomes slack, turn "promoters" with "Rev." before their names. It is time somebody is sounding an alarm. The work of an evangelist in a community should be such that he could return and do a still greater work. This is the second meeting which Brother Northcutt has held in this church. He came before our city ministerial union and gave them a talk on "Modern Evangelism and its Methods" and all the ministers present were delighted. Brother Northcutt is at present arranging to hold a union meeting in a certain Missouri town next summer. Will it not be a step forward for us as a people when some of our evangelists are chosen to lead in great union revivals? Why not? Can it be possible that our central and fundamental position as regards doctrine—the union basis upon which we claim to rest—gives us no great advantage in spiritual power and evangelistic leadership? I am sure we do not care to acknowledge any such thing.

In another article, by the grace of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, we shall have a word to say upon the preaching needed in an evangelistic meeting.

Sedalia, Mo.

To the Preachers of Illinois.

I wish to call the attention of the brethren of Illinois to our spring convention for the third district which will be held with the church at Cuba, May 24-26. The church at Cuba extends a cordial invitation to every minister of the district to attend and every church is asked to send as many delegates as can be induced to come. An excellent program has been prepared, and besides there are a number of very important matters pertaining to the interests of the kingdom for which we will need your presence and advice. Brother Marion Stevenson will be in the midst of a Bible institute at Cuba that week and the delegates will have the benefit of an address by him each evening without cost. It will be worth the while that you attend for these Bible studies besides the many other good things of the meeting. Let each church send its minister and delegates.

ARKANSAS.

Bald Knob, April 27.—Two baptized at Arkadelphia recently; one at Caldwell last Sunday. Am preaching this week at Wynne, in the Methodist church. Have found 131 members here.—JAMES H. BROOKS.

CALIFORNIA.

Los Angeles, April 21.—Our work at the East Eighth street church goes forward in good spirit. Five additions recently. One of these, a Catholic young man, confessed Christ last Sunday evening. Foreign mission offering was the largest in the history of this congregation.—E. S. CONNER.

Watsonville, April 26.—Our meeting with home forces, assisted by D. W. Stoner as leader of song, is one week old. Eighteen additions to date. Will report later.—M. D. CLUBE.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Washington, April 30.—Washington churches reported 16 additions—10 by baptism—for the past two weeks. Brother Bagby's Sunday-school has run up to over 500 in attendance. All churches at the capital are on the up grade. The writer recently organized a good Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor in Alexandria. A large hall, centrally located, has been secured and services will be held regularly every Lord's day afternoon. The writer will hold them a meeting some time in May, looking to the organizing of a church. Alexandria now has 20,000 inhabitants and no Christian church. One from Methodists at H street at prayer-meeting Thursday evening.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR, Sec. Wash. Min. Assn.

ILLINOIS.

El Dara, April 25.—The ladies of the Christian church at El Dara raised $57 recently by a sale.—J. W. BOLTON.

Dorchester.—I have begun work with the Marine church for half time. Next Sunday I will visit the brethren at Old Union, Green Co.—J. E. MASTERS.

Jerseyville, April 27.—J. W. Larimore, of Loami, held a one week's meeting at the court house here. The audiences were large and the interest intense; three were added. When the meeting began we were scattered and discouraged, now we are encouraged and full of hope, and we feel that Brother Larimore is the man who can lead us on to victory if we can keep him here. Ours is a beautiful city of about 4,500 inhabitants. Our plea was unknown here 'till about three years ago; now the field is white unto the harvest. We need help to build a tabernacle. Are there not a large number of brethren in the state who will help this needy field by giving us from five to one hundred dollars each?

Chicago Heights, April 30.—We have just given a bazaar that has netted $120; we have a noble band. The Christian Endeavor society pledged $46.50 to missions, and in all our missions this year will be over $100. Considering that our organization is only one year old it will be hard to find another as loyal and true to duty as this one. We are very hopeful.—HARRY E. TUCKER, minister.

Quincy, April 29.—Four more additions to the First church here—two by statement, one by letter and one by confession and baptism; the latter was our leading soprano and one of the best soloists in Quincy.—WALTER M. JORDAN, minister.

INDIANA.

Odon, April 25.—Great interest in meeting at Odon. Two additions last night. Large building with standing room only could not accommodate large crowds.—CLARKE AND STEVENS.

Anderson, April 27.—I closed my first year with the Central Christian church of this place last Sunday. There have been 86 accessions during that period and 40 dismissed by letter, giving us a present membership of 950. The church has raised during the year for all purposes $9,000. Of this $3,200 was paid on the church debt and $1,000 for missions and benevolences. The church is well organized and all departments are prosperous.—T. W. GRAFTON.

Indianapolis, April 25.—Six added at North Park church yesterday.—AUSTIN HUNTER.

IOWA.

Webster City, April 25.—I preached the anniversary sermon to the Odd Fellows and Rebekahs yesterday morning. The church, which seats seven to eight hundred, was filled. Christ was preached as the only way. The church exalted as the divine institution which is to absorb and unite into one kingdom all the kingdoms of earth and to make of the families of the earth one great universal brotherhood. Two more by letter a week ago. Quarterly report showed a net gain of 36 April 1. Forty young people in my Bible class yesterday.—J. WILL WALTERS.

Keosauqua.—We are now comfortably located. The work is moving along very satisfactorily. There have been 17 additions since I came. Under Bro. J. W. Rowley as superintendent, the Bible-school has nearly trebled in number, and under Mrs. Floe Starr the Christian Endeavor is growing in interest and membership. Our congregations are gradually increasing in attendance. I delivered the memorial address for the Odd Fellows in the M. E. church last Lord's day to a splendid gathering. Will Sister Clara Hazelrigg please let me know at what time this she will be available for work with this church, as I do not know her address?—W. L. EVERETT.

North Topeka, April 25.—Two more, a husband and wife, were added to our number yesterday by letter.—F. H. BENTLEY.

Herington, April 24.—Organized a Junior Endeavor society with 24 members. It was a rainy day and many could not come. We expect to have a society of 75 by next meeting. Miss Fannie McHale was elected superintendent.—**

Wichita, April 29.—Our fifteen days' meeting with Brother Chamberlin, the pastor at Payne school house, resulted in twenty-four confessions. I go to Coldwater to day. Churches and scattered Disciples wanting a meeting write me. Permanent address, 1117 S. Main, Wichita, Kan.—E. A. NEWBY.

MICHIGAN.

Detroit, April 25.—Yesterday closed my first year's work with the Central church of this city. Results have been most gratifying. Until last October we put our energies into preparations for the great national convention. It was a success and did us much good. After the fire our church had to be repaired within and without, from foundation to roof. We took the opportunity to make some needed changes. A larger and better pipe organ now stands where the old one burned on August 5 last. The church had carried a mortgage of nearly five thousand dollars for thirteen years. It was in some respects the "old man of the sea." In December we raised in cash seven thousand two hundred dollars and paid off this mortgage and every other claim against the church. For missions the church, auxiliaries and individuals have given about two thousand dollars. For all purposes we have raised and paid out $14,200. Ninety-two have been added to the church, mostly at the regular services. Our prayer-meetings are the largest in the history of the congregation. We praise God for making us willing to do this portion of our duty.—C. J. TANNAR.

St. Louis, April 28.—Meeting of 18 days; 27 added. J. C. Meese is a splendid pastor and co-worker. We continue.—J. S. RAUM.

MISSOURI.

Lamar, April 26.—One confession last Lord's day. Just closing a series of sermons on the ten commandments to full house of appreciative hearers. Have honor to become president of ministers' alliance. We meet every Monday morning.—S. W. CRUTCHER.

Kansas City.—Two confessions at the Sheffield church since last report. Took offering for state missions April 1, which amounted to $30. All departments prosperous.—G. E. JONES.

Kansas City, April 23.—Our Sharon Springs, Kansas, revival closed April 16 with 29 from the world, four reclaimed and two by letter, total, 35. Population about 150. Invited to return. Baptized two at Grinnell April 17. These places need a pastor. Our next meeting is at Tyler, Texas, May 8.—FREDERICK F. WYATT AND WIFE, evangelists, Kansas City, Mo.

Doniphan, April 25.—Dedicated here yesterday. Needed $600 and raised $1,531. Had five additions last night; 22 to date.—J. M. HOFFMANN.

Memphis, April 25.—Everything moving nicely. We continue Bible-school contest another three months with change in working.—M. T. NICOSON.

Moberly, April 30.—One addition by letter and one confession last Sunday. We are getting ready for Scoville and De Loss Smith. They come May 8. We are working for a great meeting. Our meetings at Dexter continued eleven days; seven confessions and seven otherwise.—JAMES N. CRUTCHER.

Sedalia, April 25.—We closed our meeting here last night. There were 94 additions. I will go at once to Whitesboro, Texas, to begin a meeting.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Doniphan, April 30.—J. M. Hoffman, of Goldfield, Iowa, closed a glorious meeting of three and a half weeks, in this city last night. He raised sufficient money to pay off the church indebtedness and secure new seats for the church, and dedicated the building on last Lord's day. A big congregation was present at the dedicatory service, notwithstanding the rain was heavy all forenoon. During the meeting there were 30 additions to the church, 15 of them being by confession and baptism. It was intended that the meeting should continue over to-morrow, but Brother Hoffman received news that his wife was sick, and left for home to-day.—J. P. CAMPBELL.

NEBRASKA.

Pawnee City, April 25.—We closed a 29 days' meeting at Pawnee City yesterday. There were 65 additions. Much the greater number were by confession and baptism. A few united by commendation and a number came from Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian families. I held a 23 days' meeting with the Pawnee church 20 years ago with 59 additions. In the late meeting we had 59 additions up to the twenty-third day. Theodore A. Lyndenmeyer is the godly preacher now.—SIMPSON ELY, Joplin, Mo.

Geneva, April 28.—Recently closed a meeting at Beaver City church, A. C. Corbin pastor, with twenty five added in about three weeks. This is the fifth day of our meeting here. Crowded house every night. Large numbers turned away unable to get into the building. We commence the "old time religion" Sunday.—DE FOREST AUSTIN AND FRANK McVEY, evangelists.

NEW MEXICO.

Albuquerque, April 25.—Commenced work in this city March 15 with 27 members. We now number 45. Two added yesterday. This church is a noble band of Christian workers. With strong faith in Christ they can and will, in his name, go on to victory. I should be glad to hear from scattered brethren in New Mexico who have a will to work.—H. M. BANDY.

OHIO.

Bellaire, April 24.—Two young married women made the "good confession" last night. Four men have been baptized since last report. Geo. E. Hopkins and others are maintaining a mission Sunday-school on Indian Run near the city. Benj. L. Smith gave us a great address on home missions yesterday morning. We are hoping to reach a sum in our offering for home missions to continue the support of our own missionary.—SUMNER T. MARTIN.

Dayton, April 26.—Closed a two weeks' meeting at West Side church last Sunday with home forces; 92 accessions, 10 by confession and two from denominational churches. Three confessions and one from the Methodists not reported before.—G. B. STEWART.

Painesville, April 25.—The church is in a prosperous condition. There have been over 50 additions in the last six months. All our missionary offerings have increased and all have gone beyond our apportionment. Our Sunday school is by far the largest in the place and doing a good work. All departments are quite active. Prospects are good for a growing work in this old "western reserve" town.—J. P. MYERS, pastor.

Youngstown.—Four additions the past two weeks at the Third church: one by letter, one from the M. E.'s and two by baptism.—L. J. MCCONNELL, pastor.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Cherokee, April 30.—Two added to the church at Ingersoll, since last report by statement.—M. B. INGLE.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Sharon, April 25.—Closed a four weeks' meeting with the church here last night, Bro. A. A. Honeywell pastor. It has been a fine meeting; 110 added—91 by baptism.—F. A. BRIGHT, evangelist.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Presho, April 29.—Fifteen came forward at the invitation Sunday. We will continue the meeting two weeks.—W. J. DODGE.

TENNESSEE.

Highland Park, April 29.—My work here began last January. Up to date we have had eight additions, three from the Methodists, one from the Baptists, three from other congregations, and one from the world. The church is in a fine condition. A large and growing Sunday-school is under the superintendency of Bro. Wm. Cosby. Our Christian Endeavor is full of life and vim with Brother Cothey as president, and our devoted Sister Mathuse to assist in the work. Our congregation has almost doubled in number. We have here some of the best and brightest people in the brotherhood.—RUFUS ROWLAND, minister.

TEXAS.

Collinsville, April 25.—After finishing the work of organizing and housing the Second Christian church at New Orleans, La., I returned to Dallas, and ran up to Collinsville and preached one week and baptized five persons and organized a church yesterday.—JOHN A. STEVENS.

Garland, April 24.—Six additions to the church to-day; three by letter and three by statement.—CHAS. CHASTEEN, pastor.

WASHINGTON.

Cheney, April 25.—One addition by statement on yesterday and one good confession April 17 by a young woman, a student of our state normal. Church is much encouraged.—R. M. MESSICK.

Lectureship Notes Noticed.

The venerable W. T. Moore, in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of the date of April 21, writes under the caption, "Lectureship Notes." It is the last paragraph of this contribution that I wish to notice. Brother Moore says, "Brother Denton, of Warrensburg, entered his protest against the teaching of the book," meaning, of course, Clarke's "Outlines of Theology," which was most ably reviewed by Brothers Calvin and Cupp. Brother Moore will, I know, stand corrected when I say it was not the teaching of the book as a whole, but certain parts of the book, viz., the latter portions of the book on the questions of the resurrection, the second coming and the judgment against which I raised my voice. The editorial report of the Lectureship, same issue, page 501, gives this as the part which "aroused the criticism."

Again, Brother Moore says: "According to Brother Denton's view, it seems to us, progress is simply impossible, for the reason that we must not read anything that conflicts with our present knowledge and present convictions. It seems to us that preachers, at least, ought to be trusted to do what the apostle Paul urges all to do, viz., 'Prove all things; hold fast that which is good.'" No such position was taken. I do not care to go before the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST as opposing the widest reading upon the part of the preacher. This was so stated in answer to one brother at the Lectureship who, in the discussion, undertook to give my remarks that turn. It is not reading that was opposed, but it is the reading that does not "prove all things" read; a reading that accepts without question, that takes in the whole statement seemingly because it is new, modern, up-to-date; a disposition to fall into line, without reservation, with whatever is new; a disposition to take up with the fad of the "new," the "modern," the "critical"; a reading of the class of books that treats philosophical and religious subjects as a preparation for pulpit work, to the neglect of the reading and the study of the scriptures. I said this was making dry baptisteries in Missouri. And I am constrained to believe that Brother Moore believes this as strongly as anyone.

The resurrection, the second coming, the judgment are subjects that lie, for the present, outside the field of human experience. They can only be consistently treated, as they are in the New Testament, from the viewpoint of revelation, not philosophy. I do not believe—and I so stated—that Dr. Clarke treats them from that view-point. That is, he fails to show how his conclusions can be reconciled with those of the inspired writers. I am standing upon revelation, not philosophy. I am opposed to throwing away what have come to be the most cherished hopes of a vast majority of the followers of the Lord, which hopes have been built upon a plain man's understanding of the promises of the New Testament, for no better reason than that some man, however learned, by what he calls reason has reached some other conclusion. To me it is not reason; it is folly.

If anyone says, "Why, the New Testament writers were mistaken as to the time of the second coming," and thus places himself upon the platform of an insufficient inspiration, coming back to the old doctrine of reason, not revelation, as the seat of authority in religion, it is of no consequence to me in my contention, for I simply do not stand upon that platform. There may be some difficulties of interpretation in the apostolic statements about the end of the world, but, in my opinion, they have been greatly overworked. But the time was a question about which Jesus seems to have intentionally left them in suspense. It is not to be classed with the fundamental questions of the resurrection, the second coming, the judgment. When Jesus promised his apostles the Holy Spirit as one who would lead them into all truth, he was certainly meaning to cover these great subjects. I do not put my knowledge up as authority on these subjects. I have none on them. My contention is that neither does Dr. Clarke. I am simply holding to what I think the book tells me.

Brother Moore says, "Notwithstanding Dr. Clarke is well known to be one of the most orthodox of modern writers on theology." This is begging the question. Dr. Clarke's statements must stand the test upon their merits separately. He cannot plead for any one of them, "It must be true, for Dr. Clarke is the most orthodox of modern writers on theological subjects." That is the very thing in reading that I was trying to correct. You cannot "lump" a man. Nor can you "lump" a book. Suppose, for an example, one should try it on our venerable brother, for whom I have a very high personal regard. Why, he would, on the one hand, out Nashville Nashville, and, on the other, out-Chicago Chicago. In some instances men are better than their theology, as was stated at the Lectureship; and in some not so good. Even Dr. Clarke, I fancy, would not claim this shelter for himself.

Let us have the widest possible reading upon the part of the minister, consistent with the time he should give to the book that contains the message he is to proclaim. But let it be a discriminating reading. Let things that are sacred to the people alone until there is something more definite than a "think-so" that they are out of date. Deal with the message. That is my contention. I simply wanted to make these corrections, and to state my own grounds. Now that I have done so, as I did at the Lectureship, let Brother Moore meet me here, and not upon some imaginary ground I never dreamed of taking.

H. A. DENTON.

Warrensburg, Mo., April 25, 1904.

Leave Them Alone.

Brother Editor, I wish you had not published my article on, "Do We Need It?" or that I had said nothing about preachers' going into "get-rich-quick" schemes. Letters! letters! If you could only see them! Can't you stop them? If you will not let me answer them through your paper, I shall have to sell the best cow on the farm to pay postage. Let me speak this once. I will plead your cause, for the burden of these letters is: "Why do not our papers warn the preachers and expose the schemes?" Here is my answer:

Be reasonable, brethren. Let us not blame our editors for all our ills. Often, when I read the papers, I am grateful beyond expression for what they do not publish. Have you forgotten the burden of the song your mothers sang to you, when first your attention was called to wandering sheep—"Leave 'em alone"? This instruction lacketh not wisdom for age as well as youth.

When a man spends a lifetime in getting up a "smooth-self-heating flat-iron," "self-jerking-sucker-hook," "snipe-trap" or what-not, the trap has to be set or money will be lost. The trap set, game should be forthcoming, driven or led. Preachers ought to be good leaders. Leading is their God-given business. "Fishers of men," they. Suckers are fish. Fish are game. Who could not preach a sermon with such connected food for thought?

Promoters of "unique plans" for putting goods on the market are not slow in following "leads." "Go to now," say they. "Let us get to ourselves wisdom. Our goods are marketable, our business honorable, our propositions clean and our agents trustworthy. Eureka! Who is more to be trusted than the self-sacrificing preacher? He needs money and we need him; at least we need the men whom he can influence. He will not think of selling our goods. This will we do: we will sell him a county right for $1,000 and make him a partner agent. That is to say, for every person whom he may commend, lead or direct to us and who gives us $1,000 for a county right, we will give the preacher $500—half a year's salary for most preachers. Now! Who dares say that our proposition is not clean, our dealings not honest and our business not honorable? No one!"

True! Very true! All too true! It would be a foolish editor who would make himself the conspicuous "defense" in a damage suit; all for the sake of keeping a few Balaam spirited preachers out of such "unique" schemes of placing honest goods on the market. It would be a dumb ass, indeed, that would bray for such provender. There is but one thing that our editors can do—"Leave 'em alone."

With a similar scheme one preacher made $500 in one week; another $7,000 in less than two months; while another wrote 20 letters to personal friends commending the "unique" enterprise and later received a $2,000 check for his labor. All possible, and possibly all true. But what of it?

Here are some suggestive facts:

Fact No. 1. Pastor A. within one year came to be worth $30,000. He listened not to counsel of brethren, "grew fat and kicked"; today he is all but a friendless, second-rate book agent; while others, to save themselves, pay life insurance premiums on a fellow that just will not die.

Fact No. 2. Pastor B. married a wife who received as a wedding gift from her father a little home worth $2,000. Pastor worked hard. God blessed him and his labors. By a certain investment in a day, as it were, pastor became able to write his check for $50,000. Time moved on and pastor knew troubles such as try men's souls. He might fall, but he would fall alone. So he did. Blessed memory his. Such be mine, oh Lord! When he died, however, he had no other earthly possessions than his faithful wife's wedding gift.

Fact No. 3. Pastor C's salary $1,000. Work prosperous, home happy, sermons powerful. Land boom. Pastor in it. New ideas, new prospects, pastor's check honored for $70,000 at any bank. New perils. Boom again! Gun burst! Pastor's health failed, wife and children take in washing.

I read all this to my wife and she said: "Filander, you write with a full heart and an empty head. Your correspondents want to keep our preachers from getting into such pitfalls. Think of what Brother Split-throat is doing. Gave up a pastorate with a $1,400 salary to go into the oil business. Think of the young men who followed. Then it was a pickle plantation, and now it is one of those 'unique propositions.'"

"Yes, Percila," I said. "Brother Split-throat makes me think of Jim Watson's parrot. Jim sold tickets for a circus and always kept Polly hanging above his head, while he sold the tickets. Jim's speech was short but full of wisdom when a rush of business was on. 'Stand back, gentlemen,' he would say. 'Take it one by one. There is plenty for all.' One day when the rush was over Polly was not to be found. After much search Jim saw a flock of crows having a jubilee in a strip of woods outside of town. He hastened to the spot. There was Polly, clinging to a limb of an oak tree, screaming: 'Stand back, gentlemen. Take it one by one. There is plenty for all.' Polly had just three feathers left when Jim got her home."

Percila sighed and said: "Filander, you don't know."

Perhaps I do not, Brother Editor; but when you don't know is a good time to—

"Leave them alone,
And they'll come home,
Leaving their fleeces Behind them"

Sympathetically yours,
FILANDER FUSOME.

P. S. There may be some comfort in the sentiment, "The Lord tempers the wind to the shorn lamb."

"Bah!" I hear them.

"Bah! bad!" Poor little lambies!

Don't worry, children. "Leave them alone," and they will be wise sheep some day.

Man Preparing for Other Worlds, or The Spiritual Man's Conflicts and Final Victory. By William Thomas Moore, M. A., LL. D., St. Louis. Christian Publishing Company, 1904. Price $2.

The author of this book has reached that point in life where one who has been devoting himself to the study of religious subjects for his whole lifetime desires to put in permanent literary form some of the chief results of his thinking. This work by Dr. Moore may be said to embody the best thought of his life on a wide range of religious and theological subjects. It is impossible in a brief notice to give the reader any adequate idea of the contents of this volume. It consists of fourteen chapters, and after the introduction deals with such topics as: "The Old Spiritual Man—His Creation;" "The Old Spiritual Man—His Degeneration;" "The New Spiritual Man—His Birth and Growth;" "The New Spiritual Man's Character and Influence;" followed by other chapters on "The Spiritual Man's Ethical Standard;" "His Great Teacher;" "His Rest in the Rest-Giver," and "In the Church;" "The History of the Departure from the Ideal Church and the Return to It;" "The Spiritual Man's Symbol of Power;" his "Equipment for Service;" and his "Assurance of Victory." Perhaps the chapter that will attract most attention, because of its novelty, is the last one, entitled, "Death and the Other Side," in which the author speculates as to the future abode of the redeemed. He argues the theory that the earth is the center, not of the solar system, but of the universe; that it is the "incubating planet" where rational beings are born and trained for other worlds, and that the starry universe above us is to be the abode of the saints in the future.

Among the theological problems discussed is that of the spiritual birth, and his exegesis of John 3:8 departs so widely from the usual interpretation that it is certain to awaken considerable discussion. One thing can be said of his exegesis, and indeed of the whole book, and that is that it lays supreme emphasis upon the spiritual side of Christianity. The book is gotten out in the best style of modern book-making. As to matter, it would appear to admit of some condensation, though the repetition of ideas in different forms will serve all the better to impress its points upon the average reader. If the work is lacking in that concentration and argumentative cogency which characterizes the author's previous work, "The Fundamental Error of Christendom," it covers a wider range of topics and addresses a larger class of readers. It is a noteworthy book and deserves to be carefully read by all who are interested in the vital problems with which it deals. Few men among us now living have occupied a more prominent place in the brotherhood for more than a whole generation than has the author of this volume, and the fact that he is an independent thinker, and has the courage of his convictions, entitles his writings to the greater consideration.

COX.

On April 15, 1904, Sister Cox, wife of Thomas A. Cox, state evangelist of Florida, fell asleep in Jesus at McIntosh, Fla. She had been in ill health for years but patiently bore her suffering. She was born in Monroe county, Ky., Feb. 22, 1850. In early years Sister Cox confessed her Saviour and was baptized by the father of her then future husband. She was married to Thomas A. Cox, Aug. 25, 1870. The Lord blessed them with two sons and one daughter all of whom still live. The remains were brought to this place for interment. Brother Cox served the church here as its pastor at two different times—in all about six years, and desiring that the ashes of his beloved companion might rest among friends, brought her body here for burial. The funeral services were conducted by F. C. Cauble, of Vincennes, assisted by the writer. May the Lord gently lead our brother and his children through this dark hour to the brighter day when they may join again their beloved in their Father's house, never more to be separated. L. F. DRASH.
Bloomfield, Ind.

DAVIDSON.

Claude Verner Davidson, age 20 years, 5 months and 14 days, departed this life April 21, 1904. He was a young man of exceptional character, well-beloved by all who knew him. He made his confession in Christ at the close of a meeting held at Isadora in September, 1903. The funeral sermon was preached in the Isadora Christian church and his remains were laid to rest in the Isadora cemetery.
Grant City, April 25, 1904. J. A. MCKENZIE.

EMERSON.

Pearl Dooley was born Dec. 29, 1880; died at Asherville, Kas., April 10, 1904. She was married to F. A. Emerson, April 9, 1902. To them was born a son, Ralph Waldo, Feb. 19, 1904. They came to Asherville in March of 1903 at which time Mr. Emerson became pastor of the Christian church here. Her life was godly and exemplary. She was beloved far and wide for her meek yet cheerful spirit. A great circle of friends mourn her loss and extend to her bereaved husband their earnest sympathy. The funeral was held in the Baptist church in Asherville, L. O. Hudson preaching the sermon. A great congregation assembled to honor her memory. The body was interred in beautiful Green Mound cemetery there to await the resurrection morn.

Statement From Judge Scofield.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:—In the early part of this month I learned, for the first time, through a friend, that my name was being used as counsel for the Chicago-Texas land and lumber company. Upon obtaining this information, on April 8, I wrote to the president of the said company, advising him that my name had been used as counsel for the said company without authority, and insisting that the company desist from further use of my name in that connection. I desire to say now that I know nothing about the business or affairs of the company; I have never been in its office at Chicago,—in fact, I have not been in Chicago at all since last August; I have not met any of the officers of the company for years; I have not seen the books of the company; I know nothing about its lands; I know nothing about the management of its affairs; I am not a stockholder in the company, and never have been; I have never received, or become entitled to, any compensation whatever from the company, as counsel or otherwise; I have never been called upon by the company to give advice as to its business, and I have never given advice concerning the same.

A NEW WEEKLY FOR GIRLS AND BOYS

***

EDITORS {W. W. DOWLING, Editor Our Young Folks.
METTA A. DOWLING, Editor The Young Evangelist.

This New Paper is issued weekly and consists of eight pages of three columns each, printed on fine book paper, brand new type, in the best style of the art, and as far as appearance is concerned, will not suffer in comparison with any similar paper in the land.

For Whom Intended. THE ROUND TABLE is a paper for wide-awake, bright-eyed Boys and Girls in their "early teens," who are a little too old for The Young Evangelist and not quite far enough along in years and in their tastes and acquirements to be greatly interested in the material which goes into the columns of Our Young Folks, which is intended for young men and women who are engaged in Bible Study and Christian Work, especially along Sunday-school and Endeavor lines.

Its Contents. THE ROUND TABLE is quite distinctly a "Story Paper," five of its eight pages will usually be occupied with Serial and Shorter Stories, always pure in tone and instructive in character, with fine illustrations. The remaining pages will be filled with Table Talks on a great variety of themes; Odds and Ends of useful information; Outlines of the Sunday-school Lessons and Endeavor Topics; A Puzzle Drawer full of Riddles, Charades and Problems, to exercise the wits of young readers, and in each issue a sufficient amount of Pepper and Spice to keep its readers awake and smooth out any wrinkles that may have a tendency to gather in their faces.

Subscription Price. One copy, one year, 50 cents; in clubs of five, to one address, 40 cents each; in clubs of ten or more to one address, 36 cents each. Quarterly subscriptions at proportional rates.

Address, Christian Publishing Company,

My World.

I see him reading with earnest face
Of the lands beyond the sea;
His knowledge is growing from day to day,
And the sad thought will not flee
That the world to him is so wide, so wide,
And the world is so narrow to me.

I see him walking the city streets,
Where the men that labor be;
I see him helping the poor and weak,
The light of God's love to see.
Ah, the world to him is so deep, so deep,
And the world is so shallow to me.

For the daily duties press me so
And the children fret and call,
And the days go by, and the moments fly,
And I do not live at all;
For I am too tired to think and read,
When the evening shadows fall.

But listen! I hear the baby's voice
In a plaintive little cry;
But as I hasten to where she lies,
I see her laughing eye,
As she clasps my neck with the trusting love
That in baby hearts doth lie.

The door swings back and a laughing boy
Is standing here at my side:
"I just came in to give you a kiss,"
He says with his arms spread wide—
Ah, did I complain of this world of mine?
Has aught to me been denied?

Oh, dear little lives that cling to mine,
With a trust so precious to me,
If I can fathom in all my life
One half of your mystery,
What a great, wide world, what a beautiful world,
What a wonderful world 'twill be.
Toledo, O. M. G. V.

Queer Things in Nature.

Whatever opens up new doors or windows for us into the world about us, whatever widens the field of our interests and sympathies, has some sort of value, says John Burroughs in Country Life in America. But much of the so-called nature-study opens no new doors or windows; it affords no mental satisfaction, or illumination, or esthetic pleasure; it is mainly pottering with dry, unimportant facts and details. Do you know the edelweiss flowers or our own matchless arbutus after you have merely analyzed and classified them? No more than you know a man after having weighed and measured him. The function of things is always interesting. What do they do? How do they pay their way in the rigid economy of nature? How do they survive? How does the bulb of the common lawn-lily get deeper and deeper into the ground each year? Why does the ginger-root hide its blossoms when nearly all other plants flaunt theirs? Why do the roots of trees flow through the ground like "runnels of molten metal," often separating and uniting again, while the branches are thrust out in right lines or curves? Why is our common yellow birch more often than any other tree planted upon a rock? Why do oaks or chestnuts so often spring up where a pine or hemlock forest has been cleared away? Why does lightning so commonly strike a hemlock tree or a pine or an oak, and rarely or never a beech? Why does the bolt sometimes scatter the tree about, and at others only plow a channel down its trunk? Why does the bumblebee complain so loudly when working upon certain flowers? Why does the honey-bee lose the sting when it stings a person, while the wasp, the hornet, and the bumblebee do not? How does the chimney swallow get the twigs it builds its nests with? From what does the hornet make its paper?

I have never been greatly interested in spiders, but I have always wanted to know how a certain spider managed to stretch her cable squarely across the road in the woods, about my height from the ground.

Earthquakes and Microbes.

Do earthquakes set microbes in motion or do they only affect the nerves? is a question which has been raised recently. From early times pestilence has been regarded as one of the accompaniments of earthquakes. Nor is this perhaps a mere figure of superstition. Many instances of epidemics following upon earthquakes are on record, says the Lancet. Thus, in 557-60 A. D., earthquake years, Constantinople was visited by a pestilence, and in 615 A. D., after more than a decade of seismic disturbances, which extended from Japan to the Mediterranean, the whole of Italy was visited, according to Sigonius, by a fearful epidemic, of which the nature is not recorded. Old writers, such as von Pienciz, an authority on the Lisbon earthquake of 1775, were wont to attribute the proneness to disease exhibited by whole populations during earthquake seasons to shaken nerves begotten of prolonged suspense and broken rest at night.—Leslie's Weekly.

A MILLION FROM A MILLION LEAVES A MILLION MORE.

That is to say, a million dollars from a million disciples for Home Missions would not impoverish, but enrich. Every heart would be rich toward God. Every contributor would be confident of treasure laid up in heaven. The cause of Christ would be set forward a decade. We ought to average one dollar a member for Home Missions.

We are asking for only $200,000 this year to answer the appeals which already amount to double our spendable income of last year.

A NOTRE DAME LADY'S APPEAL

To all knowing sufferers of rheumatism, whether muscular or of the joints, sciatica, lumbagos, backache, pains in the kidneys or neuralgia pains, to write to her for a home treatment which has repeatedly cured all of these tortures. She feels it her duty to send it to all sufferers FREE. You cure yourself at home as thousands will testify—no change of climate being necessary. This simple discovery banishes uric acid from the blood, loosens the stiffened joints, purifies the blood, and brightens the eyes, giving elasticity and tone to the whole system. If the above interests you, for proof address Mrs. M. Summers, Box 183 Notre Dame, Ind.

Dreams.

By Eugene Clay Ferguson.

I've heard the shimmering aspen leaves
A melody declare,
When wintry winds were howling round,
And branches all were bare;
And I have smelled the clover bloom,
The weary winter through—
These were but dreams that I have had,
But waking never knew.

The mocking bird has trilled his note
To my too eager ear,
And I have heard the matin song
Of meadow lark full clear;
And waving fields full oft I've seen
All clothed in emerald hue—
These were but dreams that hope has brought,
That waking proved untrue.

But from the south land far away,
The wind a message brings
Of faint perfume, and I can hear
The sound of rustling wings;
And when I wake at dawn of day,
From dreams so oft untrue,
The lark has come and I can hear
His song from out the blue.

Layers From the National Onion.

Each nation has its own set of pre-conceptions. We must take them altogether, or not at all. They are as compact and as natural a growth as the concentric layers of an onion. Here is a sentence from Max Muller's autobiography, thrown out quite incidentally. He has been telling how strange it seemed, when first coming to Oxford, to find that the students got along without dueling. Fighting with swords seemed to him the normal method of developing manliness, though he adds that in the German university "pistol duels are generally preferred by theological students because they cannot easily get a living if the face is scarred all over."

This remark must be taken as one would take a slice of the national onion. One assumption fits into another. To an Englishman or American there is an incongruity that approaches the grotesque—because our prejudices are different. It all becomes a matter-of-fact statement when we make the proper assumptions in regard to dueling in general and theological students in particular. Assuming that it is necessary for theological students to fight duels, and that the congregations are prejudiced against ministers whose faces have been slashed by swords, what is left for the poor theologues but pistols? Their method may seem more dangerous than that adopted by laymen, but Max Muller explains that the danger is chiefly to the seconds.—Samuel M. Crothers in the May Atlantic.

No Third Load.

A negro of my acquaintance, says U. B. Phillips in the May World's Work, had agreed to pay a third of his cotton and corn crops to his landlord. When the season had passed and inquiry was made why he had brought no corn for rent, he explained: "Well, you see, boss," said he, "'twuz dis way. I tuk'n heaped all dat cawn crap on de groun', an' I wuz gwine tuh haul two loads to my crib an' den one load to youn, an' two loads to my crib agin an' one to youn. I hauled dem fust two loads all right, but dey wuzn't no third one fo' yo' rent."

The Bloody Wars of the Ancients.

In ancient times, when men fought with battle-axes, swords and spears, and with bows and arrows, it was necessary that armies should come to very close quarters in order to get within range. An open field was usually chosen, within which both armies lined up in mass form to oppose each other. Then men entered the fray like a lot of ravenous wolves. The battle was decided less by skill than by sheer brute force and the power of numbers. Defeat then meant annihilation. There was no means for covering retreat. When the battle began to turn, the enemy was already at the heels of the vanquished and in a position to cut them down without mercy, while yet frenzied with the fury of the fight. It was not infrequent then that half the numbers engaged were killed. One hundred thousand Persians fell in a day before Alexander. Hannibal slew at Cannæ, 216 B. C., forty-eight thousand Romans out of sixty thousand. In the great battle in the Valley of the Marne, in October, 451 A. D., between the combined Romans and Goths, and the Huns under Attila, the allies slew the invading barbarians at the rate of one hundred thousand a day for three days. That was the bloodiest battle in history. That bloody job stands pre-eminent as an instance of justifiable homicide. It saved Europe from savagery, and rescued civilization. It is estimated that Cæsar's wars cost more than two million lives. His war bulletins did not report a long list of wounded and a short list of slain. They were death-lists—so many killed. The number of wounded was insignificant.

When firearms were introduced tactics were changed, and armies were no longer hurled bodily upon each other, staking everything upon the issue; but for a long time the firearms were primitive and would not shoot very far, and the tactics were but a modification of the older and simpler methods of hand-to-hand fighting.—Hudson Maxim, in the May Woman's Home Companion.

The Green Witch.

CHAPTER IX.

"I guess I have it, George," said Spot a few days later, in the privacy of their bedroom. "I've been making inquiries, and some say that typhoid fever isn't contagious. But I heard to-day that Linnie Greer has it, and if she didn't get it from her brother, it'll do her just as much good! I've been feeling weak and queer for some time."

He sank upon the edge of the bed and looked about helplessly. There was a bright red spot in each cheek that enhanced the beauty of his face; and his eyes, large and glowing, were very attractive. "I hope," said the other, laying aside his book, "that you are only just a little under the weather."

"I don't know. I have hot flashes. And when I try to read—I'm in the middle of a prime novel, 'Bloody Bolt'—I can't go on, for my eyes burn and fill with tears. And I can't smoke; the very sight of a cig excites me."

"Well, that's one good thing," remarked George unsympathetically. "These symptoms are interesting and profitable."

"You are a prig," said Spot, looking at him with the air of a connoisseur. "I have classified you at last. The sight of other people's failings makes you exult in your own virtues."

George felt a shock of displeasure and then of self-distrust. Perhaps he did glory too much in his plucky fight for an education. Perhaps he did treat himself to a dessert of self-complacency when viewing Spot's aimless life. Was there really something of the prig in his attitude toward those with no serious purpose before them, no ambition for culture and refinement? There was silence in the room, which he at last broke. "Spot, if my resolution not to throw myself away, but to make the world know that I have lived in it, and if my seeing that your dime novels and your cigarettes and your wild companions are undermining your manhood—if by this you mean prig, I suppose I must own up."

"Yes," said Spot, rising, "you are a prig, George, but I'm a sick man, or I'd never have told you so. I beg your pardon. Give us your hand."

George rose and grasped his hand, and answered, half laughing, "I acknowledge it, and that's one step toward a cure, isn't it? I hate that kind of a person, and I'll quit being one just as soon as I can."

"Never mind, old man," cried Spot, "if I pull through the fever, I'll give up a lot of things and come and be a prig with you. Look a-here! You're going to that cattle-shed for me if I can't go, aren't you?"

"That was agreed," George replied, suddenly becoming serious.

"Yes. Well, I want to feel that your promise is iron-clad. I'm afraid if I have any doubts about it, I may say all sorts of queer things if I get delirious. Oh, boy, what a time there will be if I speak out some things!

I'm afraid of myself. At this moment I feel as light-headed as a—state senator. You won't have to go till next week. I went night before last and last night; I bunched 'em, to be sure of obeying orders. It didn't do me any good, either, riding so late at night. I was as weak as a popular novel when I dropped off the horse last night."

"Don't feel uneasy about me," said George. "I am acting in the dark and I hate mysteries; but you have assured me upon your honor that it will keep you from disgrace; and if I didn't care so much for you, I'd do it for Flora's sake. So never let your brains get to working over that trouble. Twice a week I'll sign your name in the book, and I shall feel very foolish while doing so!"

"All right—every man is free to have what feelings he will. You have strengthened me by your promise. I'm going to bed. I think I'm in for it."

He was. The next morning George was obliged to inform the family that Spot was unable to rise, and that his exposure to the fever led him to believe he had contracted the disease. The doctor confirmed the fear. Spot was removed to another part of the house, where the room could be heated, and neither Flora nor George was allowed access to the patient. Mrs. Stoner gave up her visits to Kansas City, where she found life more enjoyable than in Burr City, and devoted herself to nursing her son. He was as much a stranger to her as one's son can well be who lives in the same house. But his suffering, his thin cheeks and delicate form brought back in a measure the days when he was her little one, the pride of her life. The mother-heart broke through the cold, bright mask of society veneer.

It was the second week of Spot's illness, and George resolved to imitate his friend's example and visit the cattle-barn on Monday and Tuesday nights, thus relieving his mind of that burden for a week. Accordingly, when the house sank into repose, he slipped down the back stairs and left the house, using the latch-key which George habitually carried. Indian summer had come, and though it was past the middle of October, the air was as warm as on many a summer night. The moon was a little past her full, and did not rise till he had traversed the first wood and reached the open prairie. The burnished disc came quickly into view as if to make up for lost time, then paused to balance itself upon the edge of the world. The solitary traveler felt that the moon had but come to show him how lonely was his road. When he at last reached the thicket where Spot had fastened the horse, he was weary. His five-mile walk after a busy day was an unwonted exertion, and the thought that he must soon return, made his mind heavy like his feet. Not liking the prospect of entering the solitary cattle-barn, he paused to recover his breath, at the same time tightly grasping the heavy oak stick with which he had entered the wood.

It was while he stood thus, to regain his usual calm, that he became aware of a human voice. At first he had attributed the sound to the waterfall. Now, however, he was thrilled by distinguishing words which mingled magically with the musical splash and hurry of the stream. It was as if the waterfall were singing with a woman's voice. As the stream rolled over the stone ledge, its tones changed, sometimes becoming deep and sombre, sometimes growing light and almost gay. The changes were rapid and incessant. And as the stream thundered and chattered, boomed and frothed, a voice mingled with it, chanting to suit its moods; now tragic and full, now light, yet sad. Filled with wonder and awe, George crept to the margin of the thicket and looked out into the open space, which was flooded with moonlight. His first quick suspicion was confirmed. Upon the fallen sycamore sat Marget Hootin—the "Green Witch." Her appearance so surprised George that for a time he was only dimly conscious of her singing. The light was full upon her face, which was turned in his direction. Each feature was clearly defined. He was thrilled by the wild and beautiful picture, and it needed not her voice to touch him with a sense of profound pathos. Her dress was entirely concealed by green leaves. That she wore the rags of poverty, he did not doubt; but nature had provided a mantle of rustling beauty. Her neck was encircled with autumn leaves of various hues and tints, strung upon thread as a necklace. Her long, glossy black hair was spread out over her back and shoulders in rich profusion. As usual, her feet were bare, but, spotlessly clean, they gleamed under the moonlight like exquisite pieces of ivory. A great mass of variegated leaves had been heaped against the fallen trunk, and her feet rested upon this cushion of gold and silver. Her hand-made robe reached her ankles, but here and there the green folds parted, showing the gleam of her limbs. There was a crown of yellow leaves upon her head, and under its mellow framing the face showed strange and beautiful. The thinness of the cheeks, the length of the face, the prominence of the cheekbones, lent a dignity and charm which seemed to belong to the breath of the October night. In every particular she appeared scrupulously neat. For the first time George saw her unsoiled by dust or mud. The heavy, black eyebrows, the autumn-brown eyes, the full, red mouth, the rounded chin, were all touched by a grace, a sadness, an elusive charm which made his heart throb with pain.

As the stream frothed white upon the ledge and blackened at its base, she continued to sing, suiting her voice to its changing stress with such sympathy and art that one might easily imagine her a witch, learning an incantation from the mystery of the waters. She sang the air of "Home, Sweet Home," but, as usual, ignorant of the words, she had invented others to suit her mood. George listened, and presently his eyes filled with tears:

"I wander in the forest by waters cold and drear,
By all the world forsaken, my happiness is here,
No hand of love to cherish, no smile of one held dear,
No voice to call me Marget in tones I long to hear.
Home, home, sad, sad home,
There's no place so dreary as the place that I call home.

"I dream of lovely pictures, of carpets warm and bright,
Of walls that ring with laughter, of halls all bathed in light.
In vain are all my longings, and sad, oh sad it seems,
There is no place for Marget, no home but in her dreams!
Home, home, sad, sad home,
There's no place so dreary as the place that I call home."

She did not sing as one who employs her words as a means to carry forward a pleasing melody. The words were with her the principal part of the song; she felt them; and as her voice uttered them with intense significance, she made the listener feel, also. Her voice was so sure of itself, so unafraid of the heights to which it was cast, so certain of its ability to hold a note and relinquish it at will, that George felt an exquisite delight, while at the same time the tears came. He who appreciates genius, for the time borrows of its power. He is borne beyond himself out upon a sea of emotion which he, alone, could neither navigate nor fathom, but upon whose bosom, sustained by a master hand, he breathes the freedom and the wild delight of untrammelled thought. So it is for him who loves music, while in the presence of a great singer. He is thrilled inexpressibly, while there come to him haunting dreams, vague aspirations like etchings of passions and a power to be great, which alas, dies with the voice that gives it birth. As Marget's voice ceased the liquid music of the plashing waters, weird and melancholy, came as a fitting finale. George, as if drawn by an invisible hand, issued from the thicket and approached the motionless form of the singer.

At sight of him she uttered a cry, and, leaping from the prostrate trunk of the sycamore, sending the autumn leaves flying, she fled in confusion.

"Marget!" cried George, advancing, "don't be frightened. I am alone."

"Why did you come here?" demanded the girl, standing still in the heap of leaves, her eyes opened wide in startled alarm.

"I never once imagined I should meet you here," said George. "I came for something else."

"You mustn't be here," said the other, excitedly. "You must go at once."

There was terror in her voice, but the other stood still, watching her. "You should not be alone in the woods so far from home, at such an hour," he said. "It is very wrong. But are you alone?"

"Yes, that is why I came—to be alone. Go back, and don't spoil the little pleasure in my life. And don't come again—leave me my waterfall, will you not, George?" Her voice changed from command to soft entreaty.

"It is very wrong for you to come here alone," he persisted. "I can't leave you out here in the woods where something horrible may happen to you. Don't you know there is danger from gypsies and hunters and tramps happening along at any time? I must go home with you."

"No," she said, abruptly, "I will not stay with you nor go with you. I am not afraid of anything. But you are in danger right now. I want you to hurry away; I want you to be safe. You were kind to me, and I like you. You are not safe here."

"I don't understand you," said George, quietly. "If I am not safe—are you?"

"Nobody will harm me," said Marget, shaking her head impatiently. Then her flexible voice sought its tones of sweet entreaty. "George, please go from my waterfall, please leave me. Oh, don't break my heart by staying here when at any moment you may be injured! I don't think you are the kind of person to stay where you are not wanted, even if the one who begs you to go away is only Marget."

A sudden suspicion entered his mind, causing him to turn white. He bent fierce, accusing eyes upon her as he cried, "Yes, I understand why you are so anxious for me to go away! You are waiting here to meet somebody. I know who. But he won't come. He is sick in bed, and he has sent me in his place."

"I am not here to meet anyone!" she cried, defiantly, her eyes suddenly blazing.

"I suppose that's why he came before, and why he kept me waiting so long," continued George, still white from fierce anger. "And that's why you dress yourself in beautiful colors, till you are beautiful, too. It is for him. But don't be uneasy, Marget. He won't come to you to-night, nor for many more nights. He has typhoid fever. You may as well go home, now."

"Every word you speak is untrue," cried Marget, vehemently. "I don't know what you mean, unless you imagine I am here to meet a sweetheart."

"I know you are here for that very purpose," cried George. "I see into it all now. He deceived me, and you deceive me. You have a wonderful voice, Marget, and you have dressed yourself in a wonderful manner. Both are for him, but he can't come to you."

With fierce hands Marget began to tear the leaves from her garments. They fluttered upon the ground in little green heaps about her bare feet. A frenzied wrench tore the crown of yellow from her head. Presently the poor soiled dress, ragged and patched, came into view. George stood watching her with the stern face of a judge witnessing the execution of the sentence he has pronounced. In a short time the green mantle was all destroyed—the "Green Witch" had vanished, leaving a daughter of the poor, somewhat bowed, as if her shoulders felt the sudden burden of her life.

Then he said, "Yes, I will go." He spoke abruptly, and turning about, strode toward the thicket.

"Stop!" cried Marget, hoarsely. She came toward him in leaps, like a wild creature of the woods. Her face was distorted by wrath. The other did not heed her. Marget rushed to his side and seized his arm in a grasp that gave him pain. "You shall not go with such a lie between us!" she gasped.

George turned and shook himself free. He shuddered at her touch. He did not look at her. Marget stood suddenly still, watching his averted face, her lips pressed tight together. He entered the thicket, then paused. Why should he go near the cattle-shed? Was not the "Green Witch" the cause of Spot's troubles? His mind was too excited to think connectedly. The fact remained that he had given his solemn promise to enter Spot's name in the blank book under the barrel. The promise must be fulfilled.

He found the shed without difficulty, —a low, ill-smelling building with its southern wall fallen into decay. There was no floor, and the roof of thatch sagged low in the middle. Where once had stood a door was now a wide open space. Here and there boards had fallen away from the sides, and the moonlight streamed across the damp ground through these crevices. Under the barrel he found the lantern and the blank book. He lit the lantern and set it near an opening, then carried the book to it, and examined the page where Spot had written his name six times. With a hand still trembling from his recent unwonted excitement, he felt for the long lead pencil with which he had armed himself for his night's adventure. It was gone! With the painful shock of this discovery came the thought that he must have shaken it from his vest-pocket when tearing his arm loose from Marget's powerful grip. It would be necessary to return and hunt for it; he could not let his long walk go for nothing.

Business Notes.

Send for our catalogue. It is free and contains about 100 pages.

Song books are always in order. Popular Hymns No. 2 are among the best.

Our baptismal suits are of the best, and we guarantee perfect satisfaction and the lowest price.

If your Sunday-school needs Class Books, a Secretary's Record, Class Collection Envelopes, Treasurer's Book or Superintendent's Pocket Record, we can furnish all of these.

The marriage certificates and booklets are in such demand as demonstrates the pleasantness of these little reminders of the "tie that binds."

Those ordering the Apostolic Songs at 50 cents per dozen, not prepaid, are well pleased, and so of Tidings of Salvation at 75 cents. These are in boards.

The schools are now ordering Concert Exercises for Children's Day, and to such as want something just out, we commend "The Sunlit Way," at 55 cents per dozen, $4.55 per 100. Single copies, 5 cents.

The Lesson Commentary is again in demand, but at the price, it seems you should want one for each of the children at 60 cents for trial, then you will send in the regular price for the work first of the year.

The bargain list is again before our readers and this will be its "last appearance," for we are even now out of some of the stock, and it seems as if we would close out the rest before the thirty days expire.

The Life of Garfield, at 25 cents, prepaid, is like giving it away, and for those not having read the same it is of inestimable value. It is the character of book we like to put into the hands of young people.

We were so rushed with orders for the Moran "Reporting style" Short-hand, and the "Word sign book" that the stock was exhausted, but that will not soon occur again. The former at $1.50, the latter at 25 cents.

If you are expecting to organize a new Sunday-school, we shall be glad to send a full set of samples of our Sunday-school supplies from which you can select the needs of your new school. Write us for samples, and they will be cheerfully sent.

The Revised New Testament, at 7 cents in limp cloth, and 15 cents in full cloth, for the nonpareil edition, and 35 cents for the long primer edition in full cloth, is an offer that seems to be appreciated and should be, and the stock will very soon be exhausted if the present calls continue.

The Pocket Record and Memorandum, by G. A. Hoffmann, seems to be filling a long felt want, or the preachers have long felt the want, but could not meet the price until this handy little memorandum was put to them at 50 cents, so that we will soon issue another edition.

"The future, after all, will not usher in so great a change as some imagine. This mortal must put on immortality, but we will hold to the types of character which we have formed here. It may be that we take up our future life very much at the place where we lay down the present." Dr. W. T. Moore's very suggestive treatment of this subject in "Man Preparing for Other Worlds" (500 pages, crown, 8vo, $2), is but a part of an exhaustive analysis of the spiritual man's career. It is the most original book written on this subject.

Not surprised at the run on books like the life of Raccoon Jno. Smith, in full cloth, at 50 cents, but would be very much surprised if they were not ordered as they have been. This is our regular $2 book and will go to the standing price when thirty days expire from the first publication of the reduced price.

"Helps to Faith."

Since it is by grace that men are saved, and through faith, it is of unspeakable importance to all unbelievers that they be shown the way to faith; and it is of scarcely less importance to those who are weak in faith that they be helped into a well-grounded, clear, definite, and abiding realization of its blessings. Rev. J. H. Garrison, the able editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, published in St. Louis, has lately given the reading world a volume of 245 pages, 12 mo. size, through the Christian Publishing Company of St. Louis, entitled "Helps to Faith," that richly deserves the title chosen for the volume.—Rev. J. W. Ross (Methodist) in Pacific Christian Advocate.

There are some 300,000 children in Porto Rico who need an education, but only 60,000 can be accommodated in Government schools, and even then only the less needy class are permitted to enter. The C. ### What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumphs speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

A Duel Between Shott and Nott.

A duel was recently fought in Cumminsville by Alexander Shott and John S. Nott. Nott was shot, Shott was not. In this case it was better to be Shott than Nott. There is a rumor that Nott was not shot, and Shott avows that he shot Nott, which proves either that the shot Shott shot at Nott was not shot, or that Nott was shot notwithstanding. Circumstantial evidence is not always good. It may be made to appear on trial that the shot Shott shot shot Nott, or as accidents with fire arms are frequent, it may be possible that the shot Shott shot shot Shott himself; when the whole affair was resolved into its original elements, and Shott would be shot and Nott would be not. We think, however, that the shot Shott shot shot not Shott but Nott; anyway it is hard to tell who was shot.

He "Took" Them.

"During the Spanish war," a young man had said in the presence of General Miles, "I took five Spanish officers without any assistance from the army or navy." "What's that?" asked General Miles, turning upon him abruptly. "You say you took five Spanish officers without the assistance of the army or navy!" "That's exactly what I said, sir," replied the young man. "By myself, and without any loss of blood. It happened at Boston. Here is my card. I am Smallsmith, the photographer. Now if you will allow me to pose you, general—" But the general had fled.

Current Events

After the close of the Boer war, when the South African mines attempted to resume operations they were suddenly confronted by the difficulty, almost the impossibility, of securing labor. The war had made many changes and white labor could not be had. Permanent ruin of the mining companies seemed imminent, and in that event the industrial and economic development of the country would have been indefinitely postponed. Lord Milner's government in the Transvaal has solved the problem—perhaps at the cost of creating others—by the unpopular plan of admitting Chinese coolies for a term of years under conditions which are described as establishing a system of virtual Chinese serfdom for a limited period. Protests against this step have been neither few nor feeble. They have the combined intensity of our anti-Chinese propaganda, especially on the Pacific coast, and the feeling, particularly in protectionist circles, against competition with European cheap labor. The voice of Australia has also been raised in unison with that of the anti-government sentiment in the Transvaal. In Australia, the paradise of trades-unionism, the fight has been constant and strenuous for a "white man's country," and rigorous exclusion laws have been enforced. Such a wide departure from this traditional policy in South Africa is naturally viewed with apprehension.

An official circular put forth by the Russian minister of foreign affairs makes a point-blank denial of the rumors that friendly intervention has been offered by the kings of England and Denmark, and asserts in the most positive terms that intervention will not be permitted under any circumstances, and that, when the war is over, Russia and Japan will settle the terms of peace between themselves without outside interference. This may be merely patriotic bunkum, intended solely for home consumption and to fire the enthusiasm and martial ardor of the people. It is plausibly conjectured that King Edward and King Christian would not have gone so far as they did in proposing intervention if they had not received encouragement from the czar. If, however, the announcement is meant in good faith as a warning to the powers, it is not unlikely that Russia is thus early preparing to forestall the very policy which she and the other powers combined to follow after the Chinese-Japanese war of 1894. At that time, the contestants were not left to agree upon terms of peace between themselves, for Russia stepped in to prevent the cession of the Liao-tung peninsula (Port Arthur) to Japan, although China would have preferred that course to the extra cash indemnity which she was compelled to pay. Will Russia yield if the powers interfere similarly in the final negotiations—assuming now that Russia is victor in the contest and is making rather than accepting terms? The text of this circular indicates that she will not tamely endure interference. Yet the settlement between Russia and Japan is a matter in which all the civilized powers are interested. It is no private quarrel between the two, but a matter of common interest. Whichever way the tide of battle turns, it may be necessary for the powers to take a hand in the settlement to prevent the conqueror from imposing conditions which are inconsistent with the general welfare.

Perhaps we should rather say, "What women do not want," for the words are intended as the title of a paragraph and not of a volume.

At considerable expense, Mr. Alfred Harmsworth, the proprietor of a number of English newspapers and magazines, has discovered that women do not want a daily paper edited exclusively for women. He says: "I had for many years a theory that a daily newspaper for women was in urgent request, and I started one. The belief cost me one hundred thousand pounds. I found out that I was beaten. Women don't want a daily paper of their own." This is only another step in the great discovery, which is being progressively made and has not yet been made completely, that women are an integral part of the human race and that a vast number of interests which used to be considered essentially masculine are broadly human. A weekly paper or a magazine may represent a certain small section of one's interests, but it is almost essential that a daily should be comprehensive and made up largely of the things of world-wide human interest. In such matters there is no distinction of sex. Because a fashion magazine for the special patronage of women can succeed, it does not follow that a women's daily paper can do the same. In learning this lesson at a cost of half a million dollars, Mr. Harmsworth has gained a piece of information which is worth the price, but which might have been more cheaply obtained.

The great Methodist General Conference is now in session at Los Angeles, Cal. Its program provides for the discussion and possibly the settlement for the time being of a number of questions that have been much debated in minor conferences. Most prominent perhaps are the questions of the time-limit and amusements. Apparently there is some division of opinion between the east and the west on the subject of the time-limit. Several conferences have instructed their delegates to secure, if possible, the revocation of the policy adopted four years ago, when the five-year limit was abolished. Methodist ministers, as the law now is, may be appointed for a year at a time, with the possibility of reappointment year after year to the same pulpit, should that be deemed advisable. In the west this policy has not occasioned much restiveness, but in the crowded eastern conferences there has been considerable friction.

Another subject that will probably give the conference much thought is the attitude the denomination as a body should take to what have been known as "questionable amusements." It seems to be generally conceded that some of the older and many of the young people are being lost to the Methodist denomination by reason of the stringency of the rules governing such things as card-playing, dancing and attendance at the theatre. Shall the church continue to be as positive in its ruling as heretofore, or shall more scope be allowed to the individual to act in regard to these questions as his individual conscience shall dictate? The subject is one of gravity and the outcome, as well as the manner of the discussion, will be watched with much concern. The board of foreign missions of the Methodist Episcopal church has just declined the bequest of $80,000 made in the will of the late W. W. Cooper.

This gentleman was a leader in the church and one of the founders of the Epworth League; but he lost his life in the Iroquois theatre fire disaster. No reason for the refusal of the bequest, which was unanimous, is given, but it is understood it was because Mr. Cooper, against whom nothing else has ever been charged, met his death in a place "not countenanced by the church." And no one knows why Mr. Cooper was present at the theater. This but shows the very strong feeling on the subject.

A moralist of the old school and a fore-runner of the new school of "success" writers passed away last month with the death of Dr. Samuel Smiles, at the age of ninety-two years. His famous book, "Self-Help," with Illustrations of Character and Conduct," published fifty years ago, attained an immense circulation for a book of its class. In a style marked by neither subtlety nor great brilliance, the old-fashioned virtues were championed and a wholesome morality was inculcated, and it was redeemed from the commonplace and the platitudinous by a strain of sound sense and transparent sincerity. In holding up with new emphasis the ideal of "getting on in the world," he became the precursor of a class of contemporary writers who dispense through the current magazines and otherwise their sage advice as to the way to "succeed." Mr. Schwab, it will be remembered—or has it been entirely forgotten, as it deserves to be?—filled this role for a brief period, and there are magazines almost wholly devoted to this type of literature. It would be well if the "success" writers had perpetuated Dr. Smiles's idea of what constitutes success.

One of the world's noted men died at his home in London, England, on Monday. Sir Henry M. Stanley, the explorer, who went after and found Livingstone, the missionary, had been in ill health for several months, but two weeks ago pleurisy with complications set in. Stanley was not his real name, for when but three years of age little John Rowlands was an inmate of the poor house at St. Asaph, not far from where he was born in the neighborhood of Denbigh, Wales, in 1840. There he received his first schooling, and when only thirteen years of age he was teaching smaller children. Two years later he came to the United States as a cabin boy on a vessel bound for New Orleans, and in that city he was befriended by a merchant whose name he assumed. On the death of this friend Stanley went to California and worked in the gold-mines. When the civil war broke out, he entered the Confederate service, but on being captured by the Union troops he enlisted in the United States navy and attained the rank of ensign. At the close of the war he took up a journalistic career and at one time was a reporter in St. Louis. But it was as correspondent of the New York Herald that he won fame. He was in Crete and Asia Minor for that paper and accompanied the British expedition to Abyssinia in 1867. In 1868 he was assigned to report on the Carlist war in Spain, and in the following year received a laconic order from the late James Gordon Bennett to "find" Dr. Livingstone, from whom nothing had been heard for more than two years. Stopping just long enough to report the opening of the Suez Canal he hastened to Zanzibar where he organized his expedition, with which he started into the interior of Africa in March, 1871, and succeeded in meeting Livingstone at Ujiji, Nov. 10. He placed himself in the front rank of African travelers by this feat, and the exploration of the lake region of equatorial Africa and of the Lualaba-Congo. In 1887 he commanded an expedition for the relief of Emin Pacha. When he returned to London in 1890, he received the highest honors, and deciding to make London his home, he married and entered Parliament, where he accomplished nothing. His success was the explorer's, not the politician's.

Some indiscreet friend of Mr. Andrew Lang, renowned for his devotion to ghost stories and philology, recently presented to him a copy of George Ade's "Fables in Slang," in the hope that the careful study of it might give completeness to his already wide knowledge of the world's speech. Mr. Lang complains that the work in question contains words which are not intelligible to him. When such words as "cinch" and "graft" move him only to wonder, how can he be expected to interpret correctly the more recondite idioms of Mr. Ade's picturesque and original style? So Mr. Lang finds himself only annoyed by this new dialect and not in the least instructed by it, for he cannot translate it into English any more than he can decipher Hittite, the difficulty in both cases arising from the impossibility of securing a reliable lexicon. Even more painful than Mr. Lang's failure to find in the "Fables in Slang" an inviting field for philological research, is his point-blank refusal to be amused by them. He finds them "incomparably tedious." Of course, anything is which one cannot understand. And he asks: "Is humor, like morals, an affair of climate and environment? Are things funny in Chicago which are saddening in Great Britain and Ireland?" What an absurd question for a well informed man to ask, as if everyone did not know that humor is a product of the soil and can never endure transportation, especially across salt water, without losing its savor. Take the melancholy "Punch" for example, with its diagrammed jokes and its parenthetical marks of interrogation and surprise to guide the reader, to the end that the wayfaring man, though a fool, cannot miss the point. Serious-minded Britons, who cannot possibly be suspected of joking with us, assure us on their national honor that Punch is excruciatingly funny. But we can assert with equal solemnity that its humor is of a doleful quality on this continent. And now we see the converse of the proposition in Mr. Lang's failure to enjoy the humor of Mr. Ade as couched in most modern dialect of Chicagoese.

An appeal to the public, calling attention to several aspects of the divorce question, has been issued by the inter-church conference, representing officially fourteen denominations. This is but the beginning of an effort to secure legislation on this question of grave import. After a plea for the cultivation of the grace of purity and the guarding of the children it is recognized that there can be little betterment of present tendencies "until and unless the conscience of Christian humanity is reached." The low ideal of marriage is responsible for polygamy and the divorce courts.

"The hope of curing and crushing the horrible tendencies to facile and frequent divorce rests, we believe, upon impressing and inculcating such an intense conviction of what marriage is, and of what marriage means, that it will cease to be entered into 'unadvisedly or lightly'; that the festivity which accompanies it shall be sobered and consecrated by the conscious presence of him 'who adorned and beautified the marriage at Cana in Galilee, by his presence and first miracle that he wrought'; that neither man nor woman shall dare to enter the precincts of betrothal without the tested certainty of love; without the full recognition of the mutual duty of service, forbearance and faithfulness which it involves. . . . This appeal is to the conscience of Christian people to cleanse and purify the atmosphere of public opinion and social recognition. The fear of legalized polygamy in one state is enhanced by the fact of unholy divorce in many states. The faces of Christian people must be set against this. The voices of Christian people must be lifted against this, not only to secure civil legislation, not only to enforce church discipline, but to correct the tendency to control the inclination and to condemn the fact."

A member of the legislature was robbed of $500 by a highwayman. This disposes of the theory that th is honor among thieves.

Was the Ideal of Our Fathers Practicable?*

III.

The religious movement, concerning whose practicability we are now speaking, was conceived and presented to the world by men of large intellectual mould and of profound faith and piety. They were men of spiritual vision who recognized the magnitude of their undertaking and sought constantly divine wisdom and strength to fit them for their work. Is it too much to say that their ideal is only practicable when it is under the direction and control of men of similar intellectual breadth and spiritual insight? Such is the catholicity of the ideal and so vitally is it linked to the wider interests of the kingdom of God, that only broad-minded, large-hearted and deeply spiritual men and women can fully appreciate it, or adequately represent it. That is where many of our local failures come in. The ideal is too high and too broad for many of us and we fall short of it. In such cases it is we that are impracticable and not the ideal. If any cause ever demanded for its success the highest educational equipment, the most daring faith and the profoundest religious experience in its leaders in order to its ultimate success, it is the cause that seeks to lift the Christianity of to-day out of its sectarianism, out of the limitations of human creeds, into the larger freedom and life of the Spirit, and into the unity of the faith where all who believe in Christ may be one.

This ideal of our fathers has attracted many men of large mould, and it has helped to develop others both mentally and spiritually. But it has also been hindered and restricted in its power, and brought into disrepute, here and there, by men of intellectual narrowness and of inadequate spiritual training who have been utterly incapable of wise leadership, but who have, nevertheless, aspired to be leaders. The problem of the permanent retention of our ideal and of its ultimate realization is the problem, very largely, of securing proper leadership for our churches in a well-trained and thoroughly consecrated ministry. We must have leaders who will lead the churches forward in scriptural knowledge and piety. It is only in the region of the spiritual, above the narrowness and bigotry of the carnal, that the ideal of our fathers can be incarnated in a reunited and revitalized church.

Who but men of educated minds and Christ-filled spirits can deal wisely with the problem of harmonizing the right of private judgment with the plea we make for Christian union? This is perhaps the most acute phase of the union problem to-day. What solution did our fathers propose for this problem? They had before them two courses, either one of which they might have adopted. The first was to seek for a basis of union that would be flexible enough to adapt itself to the differing convictions of men as respects conditions of membership in the church. The second was to ascertain from a careful, inductive study of the New Testament, what was the minimum requirement for discipleship to Jesus Christ and membership in his church, and adhere to that as an authoritative basis of fellowship and membership in the body of Christ. They chose the latter course, as alone in harmony with their advocacy of a return to original New Testament Christianity. If this latter course presents difficulties, the former still more and greater. To have waived, for instance, the baptism of the New Testament as a condition of membership, might have placated some, but it would have made an impassable barrier between them and the great Baptist family, whose consciences could not have accepted such a basis of union. But what is even more serious, the application of that principle to other subjects than baptism, would have raised difficulties involving the very foundation of the church itself.

But how about the right of private judgment? The man whose training and education have been such as to give him conscientious scruples against accepting the New Testament basis of union as we interpret and present it, has the same right of private judgment that we have, and exercises that right in going elsewhere, with none to molest him or make him afraid. But does not that destroy the practicability of our ideal of Christian union? Not any more than it destroys the practicability of any conceivable basis of union, for no matter what that basis may be, there will always be some who cannot conscientiously unite upon it, until they are convinced of its complete harmony with the will of God. It must be remembered too, that in entering into any organization, or body, where there is a community of interests to be subserved, there must be, in the nature of things, the surrender; not of conscience,<sup>3</sup> but of certain individual preferences and opinions which are inconsistent with the collective unity and harmony of the whole body of believers. Unwillingness to do this bars one not only from the church, but from all social life whatever.

In conclusion, we need scarcely say that none of the misconceptions which we have hitherto mentioned entered into the ideal of our fathers. Their ideal of union was the largest liberty in Christ, consistent with loyalty to Christ, and open-mindedness for truth, which would accept it from every source, and follow it whithersoever it would lead. Whether this ideal, which has already demonstrated its practicability in the marvelous conquests it has gained, and in the wide influence it has exerted upon the religious thought of the world, is to actualize itself in a completely reunited church, is not given for us to know. Enough for us to know that we are working with God and along the lines of His providential purpose, and that all the signs of the times prophesy the fulfillment, sooner or later, of our Lord's prayer when all who love Him, and call Him Lord, shall be one, even as He and His Father are one. What mean all these interdenominational movements of late but that the growing unity of believers must have some more adequate expression than is afforded by denominational organizations? When the fig tree putteth forth its leaves, know ye that the summer is nigh.

Unity Like Charity Should Begin at Home.

At the banquet of the Presbyterian union of Chicago, held in the Auditorium hotel on May third, eight branches of the Presbyterian church were represented. The speaker of the evening, Rev. Robert F. Coyle, of Denver, moderator of the Presbyterian church of the United States, made the following deliverance on the subject of Presbyterian union:

"What is the use of talking to the world of Christian union unless we begin that Christian unification at home? What I want to see, first of all, is not federation, but a reunion of the great Presbyterian family. We talk of such things as Christian unity and brotherhood for others, when our own family is torn apart. The time has come for us to confess that the Calvinistic system is not synonymous with Christianity; that the Westminster confession of faith is not equal to the Bible; that John Calvin is not to be compared to Jesus. And, therefore, we should put an end to metaphysical hair splitting on theological questions and unite as one family under the blue banner of Christianity."

The principle emphasized in these plain words we believe to be a true one. It applies to other religious bodies as well as to Presbyterians. What is the use of any religious body talking about Christian unity on a broad scale for the whole religious world, while it is divided on questions of tweedledee and tweedledum? We are just in receipt of a letter from a member of one of our local churches in the south, saying that the congregation is divided on the subject of instrumental music in the church. And this congregation claims to be a part of a great religious movement pleading for Christian unity on the principle that we must be one in matters of faith, with liberty in all matters of opinion! True, we have no separate denomination as yet based on that view of Christianity, but no doubt a few misguided brethren are drifting that way.

We hope that Dr. Coyle's advice will be heeded and that all religious bodies, having a common root and origin, will seek to heal their family divisions, and put themselves on a platform where they can with consistency plead for a larger unity of the people of God.

*This article embraces a statement, in substance, made by the writer in the discussion which followed the two papers.

Unauthorized Barriers.

At a recent conference of ministers of different denominations in the city of New York, Dr. McConnell, of the Episcopal church, discussing the question of Christian union, is reported as saying:

I believe that the churches are at fault. I believe that the churches have, consciously or unconsciously, erected barriers in the way of admission which make it unduly difficult for Christian people to get in. I believe that secondary and unimportant in effectual contentions have been made things to be swallowed whole. I experience it in trying to influence Christian men to enter my own church. They say to me: "Must I subscribe to all your articles of faith?"

And so with my Methodist brother on my right. I have no doubt men and women say to him: "Must I be conscious of a distinct religious experience?" and to my Presbyterian brother on my left, "Must I agree to all the articles in the Westminster confession?"

If the churches are to draw to their membership all, or a majority, of the Christian people in this or any other community, they must get on common ground, so that all good men can stand by them and not be shut out. And every time we emphasize the fundamental Christian unity to which the preceding speaker alluded, we condemn ourselves in the sight of God that we have any denominations at all.

I can see no reason why there should be Presbyterian and Episcopal and Methodist and Congregational churches in this city of New York, and I look forward to the day when men of power in the community will have effected a union of the churches with that wonderful skill of combination which to-day is so apparent everywhere but in church life.

Very good, except, it is not "skill of combination" that is going to effect vital Christian union, but the faith and loyalty that will enable us to see what is the New Testament basis of union and to unite on that. Allegiance to a common Lord, and not assent to a common formulation of doctrines, is the bond of union.

A Plan for Uniting Baptists and Congregationalists.

The Independent of April 21 contains an interesting article by Norman Fox, D. D., entitled "The Baptists and Christian Union," in which he replies to an article by Dr. A. H. Bradford in an earlier number of the same publication. Dr. Fox argues that since infant baptism is going out of practice so rapidly, the Congregationalists are not, strictly speaking, making any concession in proposing to surrender that practice. He adds:

Nor is there any more of a concession in the suggestion, "let Congregationalists be willing to immerse those who prefer immersion."

Immersion was the act of baptism in the apostolic churches, as any Congregational professor of church history will admit. It has been the baptism of the Greek church through all the centuries. It was the standard baptism of the church of Rome for more than a thousand years, and of the church of England down to the reign of Elizabeth. It was the baptism of Jesus and Paul, of Tertullian and Cyprian, of Augustine and Chrysostom, of Anselm and Wicliffe, of Cranmer and John Knox. It is sanctioned by the Episcopal "Prayer Book," and the Methodist Discipline. It was practiced by Mr. Beecher fifty years ago and has been by other Congregational leaders. It is no great yielding to recognize as valid baptism what no church in all the ages ever denied to be such.

Dr. Fox does not believe, therefore, that union is practicable between the two bodies mentioned on the basis of mutual concessions, but he states what he deems to be "a practicable scheme for such a union." This scheme is as follows:

If Congregationalists and Baptists could all be brought to see that water baptism is not made by the New Testament an essential to church membership, that the church of Christ should be open to all the disciples of Christ irrespective of baptism, then, though each retained its own beliefs as to what constitutes true baptism, these two great bodies could become one.

There is a very important "if" at the beginning of this sentence. What are we going to do with the Acts of Apostles, and many passages in the Epistles, if we separate baptism from the confession of faith in Jesus Christ, as the condition of admission into the fellowship of the church? This attempt to reduce baptism—an ordinance of Jesus Christ—to "a question of private duty, like the giving of a tenth of one's income in benevolence," is to treat with disrespect a divine institution, upon which is written the sacred name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Churches may federate or cooperate, as far as practicable, on this basis of each granting full liberty to the others to follow their own convictions and practices, but Christian union in its fullest meaning cannot come until the churches uniting adopt the same terms of fellowship, having "one Lord, one faith and one baptism."

Editor's Easy Chair.

Here is a sample letter which describes a condition and states a problem which thousands of our members are compelled to face: "Since removing to this city, where we have no church, my husband and I have been in a strait to know what our duty is. We do not wish to be unfaithful to our cause, to which my own father devoted so many years of his life, nor can we conscientiously become members of any church in ——. But neither can we afford to allow our children to grow up without the religious influence of the church and Sunday-school. There is a great deal of wickedness and religious indifference in this place, and we both feel that we ought to cast our lot with the religious rather than with the irreligious class of people, who do not go to church. We have been attending the —— church of late, and the pastor urges us to unite with them, but as I have said we do not see our way open to do so, although the members treat us very cordially and we enjoy much of the services. It is a real problem which causes us much anxious thought. After a while, when there has been some seed-sowing here, I believe one of our good evangelists could establish a church here, but meanwhile—what? Can you help us to a solution of our problem?"

In view of the large number of similar cases, we feel justified in answering this sister's letter in this public way. The following is, in substance, what we have written to her personally, and to scores of others in like situation, within the last few years. Do not identify yourself with any church whose position you cannot conscientiously endorse. You are identified with a religious reformation that is seeking to correct certain evils in the religious world. Do not hide your light under a bushel, but let it shine for the benefit of others who may come within the reach of your influence. You cannot do this to the best advantage by identifying yourself with any religious body where the name you wear, the creed you profess, and the distinctive principles for which you stand, would be eclipsed. But on the other hand, you cannot let your light shine by staying away from the church and the meetings of religious people who in that community stand for God and righteousness, for Christ and Christianity. We advise that you continue to meet and worship with the church which comes nearest to the church of your choice until such time as a congregation of our own can be established there, or until you remove elsewhere. Meanwhile you will not wish to receive something for nothing and should bear such part as you may feel able to do in meeting the current expenses of the church, and should take such part in its services and in its work as you can consistently.

But there is one point in your letter which you and your husband may well feel has not been fully covered. You wish to be known to the church with which you meet and to the community, as Christian people—as on the Lord's side. You may even think it well that it be known with what religious people you are identified. The church with which you worship has a right to know that. Let the pastor or elder of the church where your membership is, send you a letter of commendation, stating that you are members in good standing in that church, and let the pastor of the church with which you are worshipping read this letter to his congregation, stating that while your religious convictions prevent you from becoming members with them, you desire to worship with them and to render what service you can. That would be certain to raise questions in the church as to what your religious principles are, and of course you must be prepared to answer such questions intelligently. It will not be long until it will be known throughout the church that there is a Christian family meeting with them that believes in Christian union, and that is opposed to all party names and human creeds, and thinks that the Bible alone is a sufficient rule of faith and practice. That would be the very kind of "seed-sowing" which will prepare the way for some future meeting.

It will be observed that the course herein advised does not affect the membership of the parties concerned. They remain members of the church from which they came, and when they return to it or to any other church of their own, a letter from the pastor with whose church they have found temporary hospitality, would be evidence of their Christian fidelity while absent from the immediate supervision of their own church. This course would save thousands to our cause who are swallowed up in the denominations or in the world every year. It honors conscientious convictions and secures religious privileges at the same time. It applies to members of other religious bodies as well as to our own. Many of them live contiguous to our churches and would meet with us and make themselves at home, with an arrangement of this kind. By so doing many would come to an understanding of our position and would heartily unite with us. Without this change of mind and conviction, it is better that they remain members of their own churches. This attitude toward our isolated religious neighbors is one our churches have always recognized and maintained, without, however, the letter suggested or the public recognition. Some one has recently called those sustaining this relation to the church "Fraternal Associates," to distinguish the relation from membership; but the name makes it neither better nor worse. We are not sure that any name is needed. To confuse this practice, which looks to the saving of our members from drifting away from us, and to furnishing religious hospitality to our religious neighbors who may be deprived of church privileges, is careless and inaccurate thinking and speaking.

Notes and Comments.

Some of our scribes are getting a great deal of fun out of the phrase "the immanence of God." The humorous phase of the matter, as they see it, is that the phrase, though often occurring in modern literature, conveys no intelligible thought to their minds, and, therefore, it is of course entirely meaningless—mere high-sounding nonsense! But after all is not that pathetic rather than humorous? Here are teachers of the public speaking to the people of this twentieth century, and acknowledging that they have not caught even a glimpse of this most fundamental and fruitful idea of modern times—which is an ancient idea restored to power—and one that is doing more perhaps than any other one single conception to mold the scientific, philosophic and religious thought of to-day. And they make merry over their agnosticism, which they evidently mistake for superior knowledge. This is pathetic in the extreme.

Prof. Borden Bowne, head of the department of philosophy in Boston university, who was recently charged with heresy, has been tried by the ecclesiastical court of the M. E. church, having jurisdiction, and has been vindicated. It is altogether proper that our Methodist brethren and others having formulas of doctrine, a departure from which constitutes heresy and ground of disfellowship, should have tribunals for the trial of those charged with such offenses. In our own practice, having no other test of fellowship than faith in Christ and obedience to Him, we have not felt the need of such tribunals other than the local congregation and that quiet but effective power, the consensus of public sentiment in the churches interested.

No principle is more clearly settled among us than that faith in Jesus Christ is the essential faith of the New Testament, and that he who possesses this faith and maintains his Christian character, is not to be disturbed in his fellowship. As Isaac Errett expresses it: "There should be the largest liberty of opinion, of investigation, and of utterance on all questions arising out of the study of the scriptures, and no one who holds to Jesus as 'God manifest in the flesh,' and who keeps His commandments, should be disturbed in his church relations on account of his opinions, provided he does not attempt to force his opinions upon others or to make an acceptance of them a test of fellowship." We cannot depart from that basis of fellowship and maintain unity among ourselves or succeed in promoting the unity of Christendom.

Dr. Torrey has been having some great meetings in England. J. H. Jowett, the successor of Dr. Dale, and one of the sanest and most brilliant of the younger generation of British preachers, has just summed up what he regards as the elements of success attending Dr. Torrey's preaching. These are a calm confidence in the ministry of prayer, assurance of constant fellowship with God, preaching of definite doctrines, and the steady purpose to save souls. The doctrines most frequently proclaimed by Dr. Torrey are given as follows: the necessity of the atonement, the efficacy of redeeming grace, the personality of the Holy Spirit, the terrible perils of sin, the sure degeneracy and ruin apart from Christ, and the certainty of judgment. We are profoundly convinced that no theology of negation can get rid of these fundamentals in preaching. And admitting the great fact of sin neither "soup, soap nor salve" are solvents for it; Christ, and not methods, is what men must have.

One more step towards union has been taken in the foreign field. Japanese missionaries—Congregationalists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists and Disciples—have all taken part in the compilation of a union hymn-book.

In an address at Cooper Union, New York, recently, Andrew Carnegie said: "Peter Cooper announced the eternal doctrine that only the trusteeship of surplus wealth, with its onerous duties—not the ownership of it, with its selfish rights—is conveyed under the moral law."

That is the kind of preaching concerning wealth of which there is not likely to be too much in this country. And men of wealth are the most effective preachers of the doctrine—when they practice it. It would be interesting to know how many Christian men of wealth accept the "eternal doctrine" announced by Peter Cooper, and endorsed by Mr. Carnegie, "that only the trusteeship of surplus wealth, with its onerous duties—not the ownership of it, with its selfish rights—is conveyed under the moral law." But whether accepted or not, it is the law by which men will be judged, both by God and their fellowmen.

Dr. W. W. Boyd, pastor of the Second Baptist church in St. Louis, in an article in the Central Baptist, on "The Extension of our Cause," having stated that "there is a church fellowship and a Christian," adds:

"But when I unite with a church I am bound conscientiously to choose that body of believers which, in my judgment, most nearly expresses in its creed and polity a New Testament church. And when I become a member of such an apostolic church I am a Christian plus something; a Christian and a Baptist is something more, and, I believe, larger and fuller than before."

No doubt Dr. Boyd has stated very clearly and candidly his view and that of other Baptists, as well as the view of many others, in the above extract. There are some of us, however, who do not see why, if one be a Christian, and joins a New Testament or apostolic church, he, by that act, becomes anything less or more than a Christian. He may be, and doubtless is, a growing Christian, a more active Christian, but still just a Christian, going forward in the line of Christian duty. This seems to have been the idea that prevailed in New Testament times, for we do not read of any who became Christians and afterwards joined a church and became Christians "plus something." Isn't it this "plus something" that makes the mischief, that creates our divisions and perpetuates them? Would it not tend mightily to restore the unity of the primitive church if we should drop off the "plus something" and be content to be simply Christians or disciples of Christ and members of Christ's church? So it seems to us.

A Settled Pastorate

By W. J. Burner

Six of our preachers move each day. We spend more money in moving preachers than we do in home missions. I am informed that the average length of a preacher's sojourn with one congregation is eighteen months. We are told that a settled pastorate is a desirable thing, and that preachers and churches are to be educated into a new conception of their relation to one another so that pastors will not be like "the Methodist itinerant, who is forever moving."

1. We have inherited bad traditions. Our early preachers were not pastors. There was a vicious theory of a revealed form of government with no pastor in it. There were to be "elders" to care for the flock. The care of the church was a work to be performed by men who were always without any special training, and often without any special aptitude for the work. A preacher was an "evangelist." His business was chiefly to preach the gospel to the unconverted. The highest talent, the special training and sustained effort were devoted to adding to the number of Christians, and the care of Christians was made secondary. Our pioneer preachers, who captivated the imagination and determined the ideal, were great evangelists, not great pastors.

2. Our people sprang out of revivalism. A new period in the history of Protestantism begins with John Wesley. There were revivalists before Wesley, but he organized revivalism and made it the main object of the church. His own thought was that the ordinary ministration of the church would proceed in harmony with revivalism, but his preachers broke from his control even in his own lifetime, and Methodism gave birth to denominations. Revivalism promptly took possession of the Baptists, and has been dominant in every denomination formed since Methodism became a power.

Because of this fact, these denominations do not maintain an educated ministry and a settled pastorate. A relatively small amount of education is required for an effective evangelist. A relatively brief time is required for him to finish his work in any place. In common with other bodies formed since Wesley did his work, we have revivalism for the main object of the church, no high educational standard for the ministry and no settled pastorate.

3. The older Protestant theory, inherited by the Lutherans, Episcopalians and Presbyterians, and to some extent by the Congregationalists, was that conversion is of less importance than culture. Christianity was to grow through the increasing spirituality of Christians, through the home as a religious institution, through the care of the children. Luther never conducted a revival, Knox never heard of one. One broke out in the parish of Jonathan Edwards, and the great theologian let it grow and took good care of the results. History does not record that he made any attempt to promote a second revival. When the object of the church was Christian culture, an educated ministry and a settled pastorate went with it, as indispensable means to that end. The older Protestant theory was Christian culture, an educated ministry and a settled pastorate; the newer Protestant theory is revivalism, a low educational standard and an itinerant ministry.

4. Do we really desire a settled pastorate? I think not. We wish to reap some of its advantages, but we do not wish to comply with the conditions. A preacher is judged by the size of his congregation and the rapidity of its increase in numbers. So we are all pushing toward the top. The number of additions in the country and the smaller towns is limited by the population and by close competition with other bodies. A man cannot hope to build a $20,000 church and gather a congregation of 600 members, and get on convention programs, and be known as one of our leading preachers in a village of 1,000 people. Whatever the difficulties in the city, there are people and there is money, so the preacher exhibits a very natural desire to move up.

To get additions by the revival process one must narrow down his preaching. The revival interest does not permit an exposition of Job or Isaiah. It hardly permits an exposition of Romans. It forces conversion into a position of exaggerated importance. Among us the teaching of Jesus has been subordinated to Acts for no other reason than that Acts is more available for making converts. Our conceit of a superior knowledge of the Scripture springs from the same source. We know all we have use for.

5. Is it not possible to combine both theories? We are at least moving a little in that direction. Revivalism by itself is a complete failure. Revivalism as at present modified is largely a failure. The work of the church is done by half of our nominal membership. The fault is not with the evangelist, it is with the church. The church does not expect or desire to grow like a living thing, but like a heap of stones. In the revival religious thinking and feeling were forced on a large number of people by the extraordinary amount of preaching, singing and religious conversation. When the pressure of religious influence dropped to the ordinary, the convert dropped also. Besides, his soul was saved, in his own estimation and that of the church. He had complied with the conditions necessary for entrance into the kingdom. The fact that he had a new aspiration, but not a new character, was not apparent to himself or the church. The result of the revivalist's work is raw material, not finished product. By directing the energies of the church to the development of Christian character we will make greater meetings possible and we will make small meetings more profitable.

6. A settled pastorate requires a cultured ministry. Biblical education may be ancient or modern. Each does the work best in its own environment. As the world moves, whether we like it or not, the thought of the church must move. It is quite comforting, no doubt, to dwell in a little green oasis of orthodoxy in a vast Sahara of heresy, but a body that refuses to move soon loses all value save as a "missing link" in the development of doctrine. It is quite comforting to imitate the mule, whose method of criticism is "to shut both eyes and let fly with his two behind legs," but this is to shirk the function of self-criticism and the duty of giving the world a religion to live by. A church whose creative thinkers are all dead, is in a bad condition.

We must preach a gospel that will live in the atmosphere of state universities. Therefore, we must not get our theological works in second-hand book stores.

The most pitiful thing in the struggle against modern biblical scholarship is that the ultra-conservatives have utterly failed to grasp the problem. Here it is: Given, the Bible and the educated man, to find a means by which the educated man may so believe in Christ that sin will no longer have dominion over him. The church that solves this problem will incorporate the brains of the present and the masses of the future.

Those who consider thought, a disease would do well to remember that it is frightfully contagious. The culture of the ministry should be thoroughly religious. It must believe tremendously. It must have a living Christ, a genuine redemption, a real heaven and a living God. It must live by the grace of God. It must see that which is invisible. It must be trained in heart to ethical sensitiveness and sympathy. It must have a great capacity for understanding why people sin. It must know that there is salvation in Christ Jesus. It must deal with sin. The world may need lectures on spiritual medicine, but practitioners in spiritual medicine it must have.

Benton, Ill.

Anything which makes religion its second object makes religion no object. God will put up with a great many things in the human heart, but there is one thing he will not put up with in it—a second place. He who offers God a second place offers him no place.—Ruskin.

As Seen from the Dome

By F. D. Power

All is still under the Dome. Congress has departed. Seven hundred millions and over were appropriated for Uncle Sam's housekeeping expenses for the coming year, and then the people's servants went home to look after their fences, make their defenses and explain their offenses. Soon the campaign will be on, and the man behind the gun will give place to the man behind the jaw, and the voice of the spell-binder will be heard in the land.

We have had two sessions of the fifty-eighth, and they have had just two subjects as far as important legislation is concerned—Cuba and Panama. The reciprocity treaty between the new island republic and the United States was made operative, and the ratification of a treaty and initiation of legislation for the canal zone commit us to the construction of the canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific. The annual supply bills were passed in a hurry, and will take all the estimated revenues, less about $20,000,000. The whole cost of running the government in the year 1804 was $12,624,646, and as late as 1854 it was but $75,473,119. How we have grown! Over 1,400 bills became laws during the two sessions, though 21,043 were introduced in the house and senate, besides resolutions by hundreds. The tomb of the Capulets calls for constant enlargement.

For the peace of the world this congress has done something. An American group affiliated with the inter-parliamentary union for international arbitration was formed, and a joint resolution passed extending an invitation to the union to hold its next annual meeting at St. Louis, and appropriating $50,000 for its expenses. So while our war budget is $310,000,000, about, including all items, we are willing to put $50,000 into an effort at arbitration and so hasten a "world peace"; meanwhile the Japs turn the flank of the Russians on the Yalu, and blow up Verestchagin and Makaroff at Port Arthur, and capture such important centers as Chintien Cheng, and get after Skrydloff, and Sassulitch, and Kuropatkin and the rest of them with a sharp stick, and we cannot repress ~~himself~~. What consistent folks we are!

We did some other things in this congress in the interest of civilization: provided for the transportation of 600 of the public school teachers of Porto Rico to the United States during the coming summer for purposes of education; also for the protection of fur seals in the northern Pacific and Bering sea; also for a superintendent of public instruction and the gathering of statistics in Hawaii; also for a loan to the Louisiana Exposition Company of $4,600,000, $100,000 of which is for "the lady managers"; also for the extension of the capitol building and the erection of other much needed structures in Washington. We had the Smoot investigation as far as it went, and made Doctor Wood a brigadier, and had a stir over certain postal scandals, and at the last played politics in a rather disgraceful fashion. The District of Columbia gets over ten millions out of the grab bag, and is wearing a satisfied smile. One senator, Hanna, and seven members of the house, Tongue, Boreing, Foerderer, Burk, Skiles, Croft, and Thompson, have died. Bourke Cockran came in the place of George B. McClellan and Charles Dick in the place of Hanna, and one man, Shafroth of Colorado, did a marvelous thing, acknowledged there was fraud in his election, and resigned in favor of the other man.

Altogether the folks under the Dome are an interesting collection. A member of the house tells this story. As he was on his way to the capitol recently a gentleman was on the same car accompanied by his little son. Both were evidently strangers. The fond parent was pointing out the sights. "See, son," he exclaimed, as they neared the Peace Monument and the Goddess of Liberty loomed up high on the Dome, "there is the capitol." "No, papa, that is the zoo," shouted the irreverent young American, no doubt misled by the broad capitol grounds well adorned with trees and shrubbery. "My son, that is the capitol," said the father, firmly. "Papa, I am sure it is the zoo," insisted the lad. The boy at least had the authority of a distinguished Democrat who on one occasion compared the house to a bear garden. Ben Harrison called congress "a team of wild horses," and Reed retorted by calling the Harrison regime "the ice wagon." Two statesmen in the closing hours of the session locked horns very much after the zoo fashion. Mr. Cockran stirred up the animals or the animals Mr. Cockran, and here is what they said of each other:

Mr. Dalzell.—Mr. Cockran made a mean and contemptible attack upon me. I would have been a coward, worse than a poltroon, had I done less than make the retort I did. If there be hoodlums among us, they are to be found among those adventurers who, having left their country for their country's good, find in American politics prolific source of notoriety and pelf and a market for their peculiar wares, among which is not respectability.

Mr. Cockran.—I can protect myself—and the gentleman from Pennsylvania—by choosing my own side of the street. If what the gentleman has said is true, I am unworthy of membership; if what he has said is false, he is unworthy of membership. That represents my attitude, and the attitude of the honest man in the face of—one that cannot be described in parliamentary language.

Our solons are having a time with the new words necessarily introduced into the vocabulary with our new possessions. See the tongue twisters in this paragraph from the biography of a territorial delegate:

"Jonah Kuhio Kalanianaʻole, Republican, of Waikiki, district of Honolulu, Island of Oahu, was born March 26, 1871, at Koloa, Island of Kauai, Hawaii."

The delegate's biography is entirely modest and in good taste, but, brief as it is, it includes quite a lexicon of strange sounding names to a mainland. These are: Kalakaua, Liliuokalani, Kapiolani, Kahanu, Kaaui and Maui.

Senator Hoar is one of the ablest scholars in congress, but he has a serious time with "Panama." With him it invariably rhymes with "pajama." In a late speech he apologized to the learned senate for pronouncing it thus by saying that used to be the way when he went to school. Senator Daniel, the eloquent Virginian, had occasion to speak of the treaty of New Granada and pronounced it as if it rhymed with Canada. Senator Spooner, in one of his vigorous colloquies with Senator Tillman, added to the examples of original orthoepy in that council of learned Thebans by speaking of "dinnymite." Senator Teller buckled on his armor in the same debate and stood up for "Cubey," and discoursed about "Korey-ee" and "Columbee." No less a man than John Sherman, when senator from Ohio, talking on the Samoan question, invariably referred to the far off island as "Sammy-on." Senator Carmack has a way of saying "reciprocity" as if it were ree-see-proz-i-tee, and rolls it as a choice morsel on his tongue as Sunset Cox used to use "Kiss-kiminetas." One school at the capitol insists upon "Cubey" and "Filli-pines." A new word by Senator Hale baffled the stenographers—"Come-up-ance." "They will get their come-up-ance when the matter reaches the comptroller," said the senator. What did he mean?

Henry H. Smith, a member of the Vermont avenue church and the ablest parliamentarian in America, died April 17. He was for many years connected with the house of representatives as journal clerk and was a recognized authority on legislative rules, and the author of many important measures. He wrote the rules of the house under Speakers Randall, Keifer, Carlisle and Reed, and also "Parliamentary History of the Congress of the United States," and "Parliamentary, Political and Legislative Leaders of the American Congress."

Two others have recently been called from the Vermont avenue fellowship. Mrs. John F. Fisk, mother of our sister, Mrs. Byron Andrews, and widow of the late Governor Fisk, of Covington, Ky., died here. Her husband was a member of the General Missionary Board and a great friend of our work here when the new house of worship was erected. She was a beautiful Christian.

Mrs. Elizabeth M. Hutchins, another choice spirit, fell asleep in Christ here. She was from Warren, Ohio., wife of Judge F. E. Hutchins, assistant attorney-general.

College Topics — II.

BY BURRIS A. JENKINS.

Moral Influences in College.

Many a conscientious father or mother says to himself, "I do not wish to send my son away to college; I want to keep him at home under good influences and under my own eye. He is too young yet to go to college."

Well, how old is he? Sixteen? Seventeen? Eighteen? Then, the safest place in the world for him, morally as well as intellectually, is in a college community.

"But so many college boys go to the bad."

Do no other kinds of boys go to the bad? Are there no boys in your cities, towns, and yes, country cross-roads, who are going to the bad? You may take 500 young college men and women out of almost any college community in the land and compare them with 500 young men and women of any other social circle in the country, whether metropolitan, rural, or village, and the young college people will not suffer in the comparison.

It stands to reason that a company of young people whose minds are engaged upon the great movements of history, who have constantly held up before them the heroic lives of the best among the race, who have always in view the ideals of cultivated men and women, and whose very recreations are of cultivated character, shall be safer than the young men and women in the ordinary atmospheres of social life.

Their amusements consist of literary societies, college magazines, Greek letter fraternities, athletics, and the like; all of which are intimately related to the intellectual spirit of the institution.

"Ah," but some one declares, "how about your athletics? These surely are detrimental to good morals."

Undoubtedly athletics in some institutions are pressed to an extreme, and have certain objectionable features. But even those objectionable features are preferable to loafing about billiard halls, hotels and bar-rooms as the young men of town and country and city are too much given to doing. Suppose a young man or two is injured in the course of a foot-ball season, or even killed; that is better than a dozen gone to the dogs. There are some things worse than death. If, therefore, athletics can be held within reasonable bounds, and can serve as a clean, wholesome, and vigorous stuff with which to fill a young man's mind so as to push out pruriency, effeminacy, or indulgence of appetite, they are certainly to be fostered and controlled. And as to casualties, they are not after all so numerous. More men are killed quail shooting, or drowned in fishing, or slip upon banana peelings on the street and break their thigh bones, than are injured in any foot-ball season.

So long, therefore, as college athletics take young men away from the slot-machines, and the race pool-rooms and other places that we would rather our sons should have mill-stones hanged about their necks and be cast into the depths of the sea, than to frequent, so long will college authorities tolerate, if not encourage, athletic sports.

Another influence which makes for righteousness in college life is the constant friendship and supervision of professors for their students. College students think far more of their professors than they think they do. They have a far deeper respect for them than they themselves know, and are more easily and permanently influenced by them than the big world outside realizes. These professors are, or should be, men of high ideals and sterling character. Most of them, indeed, are such, else they would not turn to the comparatively poverty stricken life of a professor when they might put their splendid talents to the accumulation of fortunes in the world of trade.

The closer, therefore, the intimacy between the college professor and his students the better for the latter. Here the small college has a great advantage over the large university, for the very reason that this intimacy may be so much closer. In the great universities, like those at the east and at the great centres, as well as in some of the great state institutions of the country, the student is lost in numbers. He has no close contact with his professors until the last year of his college life, if then. In the college of two to four hundred students, on the other hand, he is brought into relations of close friendship, and sometimes of close intimacy, with his instructors. This is a great moral preservative. It is often the saving salt in a young man's career. Consequently the small college and the denominational college at that, for most of the small colleges are denominational colleges, will continue in the future as in the past, to turn out a large majority of the men of sterling worth, who shall take places of leadership in the nation.

The safest place in the world for a growing young man or woman is in a college community.

The sinner's task is to master his mind. Here, in a few pounds of flesh, intricately folded, lies your battle-field of the brain, a battle-field some seven hundred square inches in area! Conquer here, and you shall conquer everywhere else. Play the craven here, and demons shall mock you to the pit.

Falling Into the Hands of God.

By R. J. Campbell.

"I remember one day a man came to speak to me whom I had never seen before and have never seen since. He had a shy, half shame-faced way that often men have in exposing a weak side to another man. He said to me, "You were speaking this morning in a figure thus: You described a man hanging from a prison wall all night, dreading to drop into safety. I have been hanging on for a year or two, dreading to let go, because I feared it would not be safety; it would be a precipice over which I should fall. Pardon me for saying it, sir. I am sorely tempted to put myself right in a way that once upon a time I should never have dreamed I could even entertain in thought. What am I to do?" At first I thought he had come, as so many do, to ask that I should put him right. I was thankful I did not say so, for in another moment he said, "Mind you, neither you nor any other man can save me; if ruin comes it will be on too big a scale for you or anyone else to avert the catastrophe. What I want to know is this: Knowing as I do that my little ones are sleeping at home, and that this harassment is hanging over me, and that if I fail they suffer too, what am I to do?" I said, "Do you really need to ask a preacher?" His reply was, "I think not; but if I refuse to do what I am sorely tempted to do, what then? Ruin—failure." I said, "Perhaps so. Go back to your business, and fail; and when your life story comes to be told—and it may be a long while yet—praise God for the success. You have not done; it seems to you so simple to take the selfish wrong road, to go down because the hill is so steep to climb." "No," he said, "not that. What I am afraid of is, I am going down." I said, "If you go, underneath are the everlasting arms. A man falls into the hands of God—the safest place, be he sinner or be he saint. Go there." I have never heard from him what happened; I sometimes feel I should like to know. For I can parallel that story. I could show men who do not stand so high up in the world as they used to do; but they are thankful that conscience is clean. They know it was worth while to take the straight road; they know it was the wisest plan to do the right thing; they know it were better to bequeath to their children a father's noble character than to sin for the sake of temporary deliverance. They know that in the den of lions there was no evil, for the Lord of Hosts was there. The God of heaven has his own way of delivering those that put their trust in him. The eternal God is our refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms. Brother men, keep your hearts pure and sweet and clean. Keep your soul open towards God. Live your life with the windows open toward Jerusalem. Trust in God and do the right.

The Triumph Road

By Stephen J. Corey

God thinks in action, speaks in events. The half of the wonders of this age are yet untold, and their full meaning still awaits an interpreter. Behind the developments of to-day is the mighty hand of God. Just as at the coming of Christ the world was prepared for a rapid introduction of the new faith, so now the fullness of time has come for the conquest of the nations by that new faith. Hand in hand Christianity and civilization have hammered at the gates of the forbidden nations until the portals have swung wide. Even hermit Thibet is now unlocked to the heralds of the cross. In the east now a great war is being waged. Who knows but that God in this will make the wrath of man to praise him? It may be that through a sturdy island empire, still heathen, but writhing in the throes of a new birth, he will bring the Orient to the foot of the cross. The times are big with wholesome prophecy.

The wonderful advancements of this last century have opened marvelous opportunities for the spread of the gospel. We grow eloquent over this age and are proud—and well we may be. But let our pride be turned to shame if these great advancements are not used for the spread of the gospel. The past century is the marvel of the ages. No other century has ever witnessed the power of steam or electricity. No other century ever saw a steamboat or a railway. No other century ever saw an electric car or listened at a telephone. No other century ever pedaled a bicycle or dodged an automobile. No other century ever ran a sewing machine or scratched a match. If one had told George Washington that within a century men would chain the lightning and hang it in the streets, would run a carriage with an unseen force, talk to a comrade across half a continent, or send a message across the Atlantic with nothing but the clouds to send it on, the "Father of his Country" would have locked him in a mad house. These are wonderful times! But how futile are these things unless they be vehicles for the truth. The arc light is not the light of the world. Wireless telegraphy brings us into no closer connection with God. A flying automobile enables no man to run with any more patience the race which is set before him. The power of steam is not the power of God unto salvation. Yes, these are wonderful times! The swift heralds of Discovery trumpet its triumphs from the rising to the setting sun. Invention harnesses its magic power to cars and ships and speeds us on the wings of the morning to the uttermost parts of the earth. The heralds of civilization go everywhere. No heat or cold, no forest or desert, no sea or frost, no famine or pestilence, can stay their ubiquitous flight. And for what? To preach the gospel of the sewing machine and the Elgin watch. To tell the world of canned beef and flour. To sell jackknives and collars, tobacco and rum. To dispose of gingham and soap to the inhabitants of the earth. There are no avenues too dangerous for the messiah of merchandise. Yes, and these are the avenues of the gospel, the companions of the cross. These are the vehicles of the kingdom. These are opportunity, and opportunity is claim and responsibility. Opportunity calls with the trump of an archangel: "Come over—come over into the world's Macedonia and help us!" Progress cannot redeem—invention cannot save. If so, the electric dynamo would be a better signboard to heaven than the cross. But all these give opportunity and responsibility, and God's people cannot shift responsibility. If "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature" was binding upon the apostles in their days of meager world development, how much more so upon us at the gateway of the twentieth century!

I verily believe the Disciples of Christ stand at the parting of the ways. One way leads to triumph, the other to oblivion. The triumph road is the missionary road. Every great religious movement has had its supreme test; this is ours. If we plead for the restoration of New Testament Christianity and are not filled with the passion for the world's evangelization, we "strain out a gnat and swallow a camel," hump and all. I believe in the great plea of the Disciples of Christ. I believe it is divine. I believe that in its fulfillment lies the future hope of Christianity and the world. But I also believe that this God-given plea places upon our shoulders the most tremendous responsibility of the ages, and that if the Disciples of Christ fail in this supreme test God will raise up another people to bring about his purposes, and we will be rejected. The true missionary spirit is the heart of New Testament Christianity, and without it our plea is a poor, crippled imbecile. Doctrine without life is a rope of sand. You can no more divorce doctrine and life than you can untwist the sunbeam and say, "This strand is gold, and this silver." Brethren, it is not infidelity of mind we need to fear, it is infidelity of heart; not heresy against the church, that is insignificant, but heresy against Christ. The most dangerous doctrines in all the world are the truths of God's word taken carnally.

The fullness of time has come—the fullness of time for the evangelization of the world for Christ. Every discovery and invention is a clarion call to missionary enterprise. We stand at our Kadesh Barnea. Our Canaan is the world. To falter means the wilderness with its despair and oblivion. To burn all bridges and advance means victory—glorious victory and the blessing of God. Which is our direction? I verily believe it is forward, onward, ever onward. America is our Jericho. Let us take it and thus take the world.

IN AN OLD TRUNK

Baby Finds a Bottle of Carbolio Acid and Drinks it.

While the mother was unpacking an old trunk a little 18-months'-old baby got hold of a bottle of carbolio acid while playing on the floor and his stomach was so badly burned it was feared he would not live, for he could not eat ordinary foods. The mother says in telling of the case:

"It was all two doctors could do to save him, as it burnt his throat and stomach so bad that for two months after he took the poison nothing would lay on his stomach. Finally I took him into the country and tried new milk, and that was no better for him. His grandma finally suggested Grape-Nuts, and I am thankful I adopted the food, for he commenced to get better right away and would not eat anything else. He commenced to get fleshy and his cheeks like red roses, and now he is entirely well.

"I took him to Matamoras on a visit, and every place we went to stay to eat he called for Grape-Nuts, and I would have to explain how he came to call for it as it was his main food.

"The names of the physicians who attended the baby are Dr. Eddy, of this town, and Dr. George Gale, of Newport, O., and anyone can write to me or to them and learn what Grape-Nuts food will do for children and grown-ups too." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The Conflict Irrepressible.

By Thomas J. Clark.

Selfish greed hath her own way, dark.
Torture, violence, rack and stake,
Prison, thorn-crown, cross and death.
Thus her victory she doth take.

Grateful love hath her own way, sweet.
Tells her story in accents bold.
Kind and gentle, just and true;
Waits and suffers till truth unfold.

What Heaven Is By E. L. Powell

There are gradations of experience, gradations of happiness and gradations of reward. We shall be just as happy as our experience makes it possible to be, and that means attainment. And because the heavenly life represents attainment, very many, yea, all of the disciplinary measures of this life shall cease to be. We are told that there shall be no death or sorrow or crying, not because these things are bad, not because they are out of harmony with the divine love, not because God has made a mistake in permitting them, but they shall cease to be because they shall have served their ministry. We thank God for the ministry of death here, even though our heart is wrung and the hot tears' course their way down our cheeks. But there shall be no death there, because the development of character, in so far as this ministry could effect it, has been accomplished; for the very same reason there shall be no temple there. It is a city without a church. We need the ministry of the church here. We need its songs of praise and its prayers, but there we shall have no church, for all men shall know Him from the least unto the greatest. There shall be no sea, not because the sea has not been in this natural world a beneficent ministry, but because there shall be no longer need of it for purposes of commerce, since there shall be only spiritual communion and heart shall answer unto heart and soul shall answer unto soul, as deep shall answer unto deep, or as octave shall answer unto octave. This is the best possible world for its purpose. Its purpose is disciplinary, and when that purpose has been achieved the perfect world will burst upon our vision.

Furthermore, friends, heaven is the attainment of all that the prophets have foretold, all that reformers have prayed for and worked for. There is a splendid passage—I know not all of the meaning that is involved—in which is brought before us some far off goal when Jesus Christ himself shall lay aside his authority and God shall be all and in all. His mediation is necessary now and will continue to be necessary until every enemy shall be conquered and until the purpose of God concerning creation shall be fulfilled, until that far off goal shall be reached towards which the whole creation moves.

To my mind the thought of heaven as service is a most satisfactory conception. When the great violinist, Remenyi, was about to die, he hugged his violin to his bosom and we are told that he made the remark, "I shall take this violin with me to heaven." The earthly instrument unquestionably shall be laid aside, but there shall be some medium for the expression of melody of the soul. We shall continue to serve each in harmony with his own peculiar fitness, each in harmony with his own capacity. One note that strikes me as differentiating the service of heaven from the service of earth is that it is pitched on such a large scale, the soul shall be freed from all its limitations, and, therefore, its work shall be vast, it shall move along great lines. I wish I could quote to you the splendid poem of Kipling, but I can only call to mind a few lines in which this conception is brought out:

"And each in his separate star
Shall draw the thing as he sees it,
For the God of things as they are."

Here is tremendous imagination, a man having a star for his world, a man occupying a world itself as his residence in which to do the work of eternity. Can you conceive of anything more splendid in its reach and in its sweep and in its magnificent freedom? Let us not suppose that heaven is the land of the lotus-eaters. Let us not imagine that we shall sit down never more to rise up. Let us understand that heaven is activity, that heaven is service, that heaven has its task no less than earth.

The martial note is struck when heaven is presented to us as victory. "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life." One thing is certain, there is no room in heaven for the sluggard. Do you believe that the crown of righteousness spoken of by the inspired apostle is plaited in some idyllic retreat where one is listening to the murmuring brook or gazing upon scenes that suggest no strife and no conflict? That crown of righteousness, believe me, is woven of fiery experience, of the trials of life, of its heartaches, of burdens that we bear by the grace of God. Who are these arrayed in white? They are those who have come up out of great tribulation, and washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the lamb. It seems to me that in the mighty procession moving heavenward there is none to be found with the nerveless step of the indolent or indifferent, but only those who are longing for the battle, in order that they might win the victory and claim the crown.

I have been seeking in this sermon, and I come now to conclude, to put before you the spiritual conception of the heavenly world, as contradistinguished from the gross and materialistic conception. The aborigines, for instance, of our country believed that heaven lies beyond the great mountains; that beyond the great mountains there is a great river and beyond the river is a wide expanse of country and beyond that wide expanse of country is a world of water and in that world of water there are a thousand isles in which there shall be unlimited fishing and hunting throughout the unending ages. The Mohammedan believes that in the heavenly world there is a river of honey and wine flowing over beds of musk between banks of camphor; each spirit who goes into that world has numerous attendants with baskets and chalices of gold. All those who enter sit down at a splendid banquet and refresh themselves for one hundred years and at the end of one hundred years the appetite is unimpaired. Who cares for a heaven which means gratification of the appetite? Who cares for a heaven that simply means the gratification of animal instincts and desires?

Over against this conception I place the spiritual side with its notes of fellowship and splendid companionship; the house not made with hands; the Father's house of many mansions; the inheritance, the wreath of glory, the crown of righteousness. Do you want a guide as you move thitherward? I point you to Jesus Christ. Do you want to know the way? I point you to his life. Do you want to get ready for entrance? Then begin the heavenly life here now and breathe something of the atmosphere that comes from the eternal hills. You can catch something of its fragrance now, if you choose. You can hear something of its melody now if you are only sufficiently developed spiritually. Oh, the bliss of over there. Oh, the rapture of a soul redeemed. Oh, the blessedness of service, of praise, of attainment in the glory-land.

Old Bishop Wilberforce represents one as asking, "Can you tell a plain man the plain way to heaven?"

"Surely," is the answer, "turn to the right and keep straight ahead."

And no man has ever turned to the right, no man has ever dared to espouse the cause of truth and righteousness and given himself to it with his whole heart and soul and strength, no man has ever lived the Christ life who has not gone straight ahead, and for him the gates will be opened and the welcome plaudit will sound in his ears, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

May I conclude with these lines?

"I know not where his islands lift their fronded palms in air,
I only know I cannot drift beyond his love and care."

And under the mighty spell of that love and care is heaven. May God help us to reach it,

Those who are bound for heaven must be willing to swim against the stream.—Matthew Henry.

Heaven must be in thee ere thou canst be in heaven.

A Verse In Luke *

Betty came over, after Mrs. Van Cortright's grand musical morning. "I guess it's settled," says she. "There's been a lawyer drawing up a deed about a place down there in the Felonies. And I guess it came about this way," says she. "You see Mrs. Van told me I might hear the music, and I was down, and behind the curtain, and I thought I'd lose my breath with the violets festooned in great bunches there, till Thomas let down a window. And there was a settling of silks and chiffons, for the singer was coming, and just before the silence I heard Mr. Brinckerhoff's voice close by. He was standing, tall and grave and handsome, with that spark he has in his eye, leaning over Miss Frances—and there's nothing you can compare her to but just a great, blooming rose—and he was holding her fan, and 'twas plain in his eyes, his smile, his voice, that after his way he worshipped her. 'Never!' he was saying. He was speaking low. 'Let my wife waste herself on the creatures of the slums? Never!' And just then the singer began to sing; and let me tell you I never heard music before! Sweet, sweet, clear as flutes, voices falling out of the sky, far, far off! And I saw the face of Miss Frances where she stood, and it seemed as if it must be the face of one of those singing voices. And I says to myself, Larks, says I! And you'll see!" says that Betty.

I did. It was a clear, blithe morning, with scents of the earth blowing over the city from I don't know where; and I'd have known it was the Easter, even hadn't the streets been so still and the bells swimming on the air, by the high, white light and the sweet fresh smell of the weather. They say, with all the rest that they say, that the sun gives three leaps for joy when he rises on Easter morning. It's my opinion he leaps for joy every morning, except when he looks into the court of the Three Deepes. He couldn't leap for joy looking in there. But, to be sure, he never does! I'd gone down there on the errand of the mistress again. And saving for one broken lily in the hand of a little brown ragamuffin there was no sign of the day down there, and, Sunday or Easter, all the same to them, there was the low thunder of the sewing machine in this room, and the tapping of the last in that, and the scrubbing of the board in the other, as I went by, and all the vile smells were coming out strong, and there was the roar of a fight in the alley, and a dead man—oh, well, there's some of us too delicate to hear about the way others have to live—and die.

And I can't say but it hurt me, it hurt me hard, to think of this pretty creature who had every joy there is in life for her own if she chose, coming down here to live in the reek and the filth, and only going about from one fever bed to another the day long and the night long. A costly sacrifice it was. But, oh, they needed her, the poor wretches, they needed her! And all at once something filled my eyes, and I longed and ached for a moment, not for the poor wretches, but for myself, that I had no such mighty love as that for which I might joy to make sacrifice. "Yes," said my mistress, when I told her once, "it was the Easter time, and the Lord was rising in your heart, I think."

However, that's neither here nor there. But I toiled up those tilting, shaking stairs in the dark and the dirt, and I came to that upper room where the woman sewed and the little girl threaded the needles and the old grandmother mumbled, and Miss Frances was there before me, in the dark room, binding the last cool bandage about the poor creature there who was to hold out but a day or two longer. The boy Billy was standing on his head. "Easter's here, an' we'se blowin' of it in!" says he. "We'se got her—de loidy! She's come to stay, see? Say, dere ain't no stringin' in it! Hope I may never kick a copper if she ain't a-takin' me wid her ter mind de crack!"

The place was clean, the mother was sober, the boy's face was shining. "Easter," mumbled the old grandmother, some chord touched in her memory of a better day, it may be, "the Lord has risen."

Well, some say God made the world in six days, and some say He made it in a thousand ages, and I say anyway God made it. And perhaps the Lord would have risen down here in the Felonies if Miss Frances hadn't come. But anyway Miss Frances came, and the day of the Lord came with her. The Lord had risen.

Miss Frances stepped softly out of the dark room, folding off the apron she wore over the gown that was the color of a plum—she always wore down there the colors to take the eye. Small blame to her if she knew that beauty makes its way—and she looking like a flower! And after a little we went down the stairs, where I always felt to take my life in my hands, and which she was to climb so many a hot day and black night! And we came out on the street, where the sun and the blue sky and the smell of the grass in the air from far-away fields made it seem, beside the place we left, like the forecourt of heaven. And I saw her face white with the light behind it. "There is so much suffering in the world," she said. "And to be set apart to relieve any portion of it, what a fellowship is that!"

"Then you've settled to it, Miss Frances?" I asked.

"Oh, yes," she said.

"And if you find yourself regretting when the dour days and nights come, with the pain, the poverty, the tiring of it, the unlovely folk?"

"No," she said, "no. They are our Lord's, the poor. He must feel more tenderly to them than to the fortunate, the happy—as a mother feels to her lame child. When I go through the dark streets at night I often feel a great, sweet presence walking with me."

"There's a grand verse in Luke, Miss Frances," whispered I, "that says when you have left home for the kingdom of God's sake, you——"

"Oh, it is true!" she cried. "Shall receive manifold more in the present time."

"And in the world to come life everlasting," said I.

NECESSARY

People May Go Without Food for Days
but Not Without Sleep.

Fasters have gone without food for many days at a time, but no one can go without sleep. "For a long time I have not been sleeping well, often lying awake for two or three hours during the night up to three weeks ago, but now I sleep sound every night and wake up refreshed and vigorous," says a California woman.

"Do you know why? It's because I used to drink coffee, but three weeks ago I cut off the coffee and began using Postum. Twice since then I have drank coffee and both times I passed a sleepless night, and so I am doubly convinced coffee caused the trouble and Postum removed it.

"My brother has been in the habit of drinking coffee three times a day. He has been troubled with sour stomach and I often would notice him getting soda from the can to relieve the distress in his stomach; lately hardly a day passed without a dose of soda for relief.

"About two weeks ago he asked me for a cup of Postum—said he liked it well enough to give up coffee, and since then has been drinking Postum three times a day and says he has not once been troubled with sour stomach." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Even after this lady's experience with coffee her brother did not suspect coffee was causing his sour stomach, but easily proved it.

Coffee is not suspected in thousands of cases just like this, but it's easily proved. A 10 days' trial works wonders, and of course "there's a reason."

JESUS TEACHES HUMILITY.—
Mark 10:35-45.

Memory Verses 43-45.

GOLDEN TEXT:—For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister.—Mark 10:45.

A Discordant Note.

The public ministry of Jesus is drawing to a close. The time of the sacrifice is almost at hand, but his hour is not yet quite come, for he has some things yet to say to his disciples. So he withdraws with them to Ephraim, and after a time spent in that comparatively remote region he begins for the last time the journey to Jerusalem. How rich was that journey in episode and teaching! The healing of the ten lepers (Luke 17:11-19); the discourse on the nearness of the kingdom of God (Luke 17:20; 18:8); the parable of the proud Pharisee and the contrite publican (Luke 18:9-14); the teaching about divorce (Matt. 19:3-12); the blessing of the children (Mark 10:13-16); the question of the rich young ruler and the teaching about riches (Mark 10:17-31). Then, as they were approaching nearer to the end of the journey, Jesus again gave warning of his approaching death, and this time in unmistakable terms, including some of the details of his suffering and the fact of the resurrection. And now, in the very shadow of the cross, while the heart of the Master was already burdened with the impending passion for the world's redemption, his most trusted disciples fall into a disgraceful squabble about the distribution of the honors in the new kingdom. Nothing could have been more jarring, more discordant—or more human.

A Selfish Faith.

Even in the affairs of the heavenly kingdom there are those who think first of the spoils of office. John and Peter had advanced far enough in faith to feel confident that the new kingdom would be established. They were convinced that Jesus was a person of power, and that it was better to be on his side. Such a faith at this time was in itself no mean achievement. It is something for one to be willing to cast in his lot unreservedly with the forces of righteousness and stake his future welfare on the triumph of the good.

But it was, after all, a selfish faith, seeking its reward in private gain, and thinking of the kingdom as a means of attaining personal blessedness and glorification, and not as a means of saving the world. It is easy to feel the inappropriateness of John and Peter's request—the almost incredible stupidity of it at such a moment. But it is not wholly unlike the attitude habitually maintained by many Christians who, with the air of all piety, treat the kingdom of God as though it were intended solely for their individual salvation.

Honor and Service.

The reply which Jesus gave to this presumptuous request was not a rebuke, but the declaration of a principle. The principle which he laid down was that his followers must seek service and sacrifice, not honor, not even spiritual blessedness in any selfish way; that honor must come as a mere incident and not as the main object of endeavor; and that the best thing which he promises to his disciples is not glory or power or any sort of personal aggrandizement, but an opportunity to "drink of the cup that I drink and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with."

The indignant ten needed the lesson as well as the presumptuous two. It is a lesson perpetually needed, especially among the professed followers of Christ. Faith in him must be more than a willingness to attach our personal fortunes to his cause in the belief that

ENCOURAGEMENT FOR THE DISCOURAGED.

"Wait on the Lord:
Be strong, and let thy heart take courage:
Yea, wait thou on the Lord." (Psalm 27:14)

Perhaps we little dream how many discouraged hearts there are in the world. Frustrated plans, disappointed hopes, dreams unrealized, unexpected weaknesses within and opposition from without, with the demoralizing influence of sin—these are the causes of many sad and disheartened souls. Many of those thus cast down in spirit need encouragement more than reproof, and kindly guidance more than the cold neglect of those more strong.

Source of Encouragement. The Psalmist had learned, in his own experience, no doubt, where to go for comfort in time of discouragement: "Wait on the Lord." He "knoweth our frame, that we are dust." He is acquainted with the inward struggles and the evils that have been resisted as well as those to which we have yielded.

"The Lord is full of compassion and gracious. Slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy." (Psalm 103:8.)

To whom then should we go in time of trouble but to Him who both knows our needs and has compassion for our weaknesses, and who delights to show mercy? In the presence of such an One it is possible to "be strong, and let thy heart take courage." Not only is our God an ultimate source of help, but He is "a present help in time of trouble" (Psalm 46:1). It is present help that we need in our times of discouragement.

Reasons for Encouragement. Have we had trials, temptations, losses and sorrows? Yet "we know that to them that love God all things work together for good, even to them that are called according to His purpose" (Rom. 8:28). This truth is verified by the statement of the apostle which follows: that God has always taken care of those who committed themselves to Him, even justifying and glorifying them. Another reason for encouragement is that, "our light affliction, which is for a moment, worketh for us more and more exceedingly an eternal weight of glory" (2 Cor. 4:17). Surely if our present sufferings are working out for us a more exceeding weight of glory, we ought to be encouraged to bear these afflictions with patience and resignation. But, after all, the chief ground for encouragement is the fact that, if God loved us well enough while we were yet sinners, to give up His only begotten Son for us, He will not withhold from us anything needful for our salvation (Rom. 8:32). Jesus Christ is able to "save unto the uttermost" all who come to God through Him (Hebrew 7:25).

What is it to "wait upon the Lord"? It is to come to Him in faith, committing ourselves and our ways unto Him, seeking His guidance and walking in His counsel. If things do not turn out as we had hoped, as speedily as we had expected, let us wait on the Lord. In due time He will bring it to pass. God works in infinite duration in which Alps and Andes come and go like fleeting rainbows across the sky. "Yea, wait thou on the Lord."

Prayer. Oh, Thou who art from everlasting unto everlasting, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, infinite in holiness and plenteous in mercy, to whom but unto Thee can we come for encouragement, consolation and strength, when all our earthly hopes lie broken, and when the future seems dark and dreary? We come to Thee and ask that Thy light and life and joy and peace may be given unto us, and that we may walk all our days in the light of Thy countenance, until we shall see Thee and be transformed into Thy likeness, through Jesus Christ the Lord. Amen.

FALSE AND TRUE AMBITIONS.—

We come to-night to study ambition. In the first place, let us note that no tirade upon true ambition is necessary, and none is desired by those who had to do with the selecting of the topics we study from Sunday to Sunday. What is the life of one if he has not that laudible desire to accomplish something in the world? It is nothing. The sluggard of the Proverbs is a case of a lack of ambition. The lazy man is one who lacks the spur and fire of ambition to make him go forward in the work of life. The slothful servant gets no praise or comfort in the Scripture. Nor does the Master, as some infidels once tried to show, teach a lack of thrift and reasonable effort and desire in the affairs of this world. He was of all men the most active. He planned the largest things of all the ages. He undertook, with full faith in its accomplishment, the great work of redeeming and saving all the nations of the world. But the true ambition of the Christian is one thing, and the false ambition of the world is quite another. Let us see about this in our study.

For the Members.

It is not to be assumed that all false ambitions are out in the worldly life. The false ambition has quite as much scope within the church as without. Here in the Scripture of the lesson for this evening is a woman coming with her two boys, wanting for them the best places in the kingdom which she expected Jesus was about to set up. Yes, she wanted one of them on the right and the other on the left. She wanted enough. She certainly cannot be accused of a lack of desire for her boys. It is not difficult to want enough. Every animal is supplied from beneath with that incentive to want much.

2. Nor is the chief evil in this woman's desire in the thing wanted. Nor would it have been a great evil—supposing her boys to be capable—for them to have been the chief men in a new kingdom. That is not the point, as I look at this incident. The alarming feature of her condition is that, in her morbid ambition, she lost sight altogether of the true work of the Master. She saw not the spiritual side, but only the material side. Only a crumbling throne of perishable things did she see in the growing fame and increasing power of Jesus. If anyone should say to this that her mistake was the common one of the day, what then? Why, grant it, and show that the same mistake was common to all. They all fell short for the same reason that she fell short in her estimate of the Savior's mission—they were taking only a material and short-sighted view of things. And therein is just the alarming thing to us in a false ambition.

3. False ambition is a false estimate. It is a failure to see what is in an issue. It is the most narrow attitude thinkable. The good man has a moral guide. It is the unseen connection of the soul with the powers of the Infinite. It sees far as well as near. It can be cast down to-day, for it knows the eternal years are with the right for its triumph.

4. One sad thing in connection with the thought of a false ambition is that it wastes the time that might have been used in pursuit of the true. Here is one who has a false ambition in life. He is spurred on to its expected accomplishment. When the true nature of the false ambition is laid bare, it is late in the day to begin life over. The day is far spent. The sun is sinking. The sense of old age and wasted opportunities begins to haunt one. He can begin over, but how much better to have started right. He is already distanced in the race by those who began right. Those who made the good start are far on the day's journey of a prosperous undertaking. They are within sight of the

AND NEVER SUSPECT IT.

MRS. E. AUSTIN.

An interesting letter to our readers from Mrs. E. Austin, of New York City.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Nov. 9th, 1902.
A little over a year ago I was taken with severe pains in my kidneys and bladder. They continued to give me trouble for over two months and I suffered untold misery. I became weak, emaciated and very much run down. I had great difficulty in retaining my urine, and was obliged to pass water very often night and day. After I had used a sample bottle of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, which you so kindly sent me on my request, I experienced great relief. I immediately bought of my druggist two large bottles and continued taking it regularly. I am pleased to say that Swamp-Root cured me entirely. I can now stand on my feet all day without having any bad symptoms whatever. You are at liberty to use this testimonial letter if you wish.

Gratefully yours,

Mrs. E. Austin.
19 Nassau St.

The mild and prompt effect of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. Recommended and taken by physicians, used in hospitals and endorsed by people of prominence everywhere. To prove what Swamp-Root will do for you, a sample bottle will be sent absolutely free, by mail, also a book telling all about Swamp-Root and its wonderful cures. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and be sure to mention reading this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Swamp-Root, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y., on every bottle.

city. They already hear the music upon the harps of those who are waiting and watching over there. They mount up as upon eagle's wings. They run and are not weary. And, yet, I, who started with a false ambition, am struggling with the preliminaries of starting when I should be rejoicing in a race almost run and a crown in sight.

Quiet Hour Thought.

Oh, Lord, help me to know if I have started right.

Our Budget

—How about the May offering—did you take it?

—These are glorious spring days we have been having, and compensate largely for the cold, backward spring.

—The World's Fair is now in progress, and the attendance is said to be record breaking. Our streets, hotels and street cars are full of all kinds of foreigners, jabbering all kinds of languages.

—Our World's Fair pavilion; our architect tells us, will be practically completed by the middle of this month and ready for exhibits. The indications from reports coming from our missionary societies, colleges, etc., are that we are to have an exhibit that will be worth seeing by all our members who attend the Fair, and by many others.

—It will be pertinent, in this connection, to remind our readers that we are still short several hundred dollars of the necessary amount of funds to pay the bills for our World's Fair building. We urge not only the prompt payment of all who have made personal pledges or who have agreed to solicit certain amounts, but that new contributions be sent in to assist in paying for the building, and to provide an adequate supply of literature for free distribution.

—Many strangers from the country are visiting the city, and we venture, for the benefit of our readers and their friends, the following cautions: Beware of cheap boarding houses, in the down town district, of which you have no knowledge. Beware of leaning or thrusting the arm out of the windows of street cars; for serious accidents have occurred in that way. Also in alighting from cars beware of the car coming from the opposite direction, and beware of being caught between car tracks when cars are passing. Serious accidents have happened from all these causes. It is hardly necessary to warn any of our readers against the friendly stranger that may greet them cordially and desire to show them about town.

—A new house is being built at Fate, Rock-wall Co., Texas.

—Charles Foster, of West Paulet, Vt., will go abroad this summer.

—A new house will be dedicated at Cygnet, O., by S. H. Bartlett, May 29.

—The church at Durant, I. T., has decided to employ a regular pastor.

—Jas. T. Nichols, of Vinton, Ia., is to visit the Holy Land, starting June 21.

—R. E. McKnight has resigned at Cisco, Texas, and will return to California.

—J. H. Hardin is to make his home headquarters at Liberty, Mo., for the present.

—S. M. Martin, after a fine meeting at Sioux City, Iowa, is now attacking Cedar Rapids.

—A. W. Fortune, 71st street church, Rochester, N. Y., will take up study at Chicago university.

—W. Walter Mauer is the general evangelist for Wyoming. His headquarters are at Newcastle.

—The new church at Fair Oaks, Ind., will be dedicated on Sunday by J. M. Elam, of Rensselaer, Ind.

—Brother Cronenberger has organized a First Christian church in the good old country of Habersham, Ga.

—Roy Linton Porter has resigned at Vanceburg, Ky., and will begin work at Lake Charles, La., about June 1.

—The fifth Illinois district missionary convention will be held at Springfield May 31 to June 1 at the West Side church.

—To "Inquirer": No, we do not know of "five" nor of one church in our brotherhood that receives unbaptized members.

—"All who expect to attend the Illinois Christian missionary convention at Cuba, Ill., on May 24 should send intimation to that effect if they expect entertainment."—A. L. FERGUSON.

—The East Dallas church, Texas,—a five and a half months' old congregation—is going to support its "own home missionary." Isn't this a record?

—The Third church of Christ, Danville Ill., will dedicate its new house Sunday morning, May 15, J. H. Gilliland, of Bloomington, officiating on the occasion.

—L. O. Knipp has entered upon his third year as pastor of the Christian church, Plymouth, Pa. "Our defeats and sorrows have spurred us on to larger things," he writes, optimistically.

—The Sunday schools are making active preparations for children's day, the first Sunday in June. They seem determined to raise $60,000 on that day. Every school in line is the word to emphasize now.

—Margate, England, where our work was started by Brother Rapkin, of whose sad disappearance Brother Durban wrote last week, is to be supplied by Francis Foster, who has been studying in this country.

—"It isn't the large audiences that count, but a willingness to work upon the part of the members and the gradual growth of the church." That is a very true remark made by one of our successful preachers.

—Last week representatives of the various Baptist churches of this city held a meeting and voted to invite the Southern Baptist convention and the Anniversaries to hold their meetings in this city in 1904.—Central Baptist.

It is a good idea to have the northern and southern Baptists meet together in this gathering place of the nations. The editor of the Central Baptist is quite right in saying "the differences will certainly be emphasized and increased by a continuation of the two sets of missionary organizations now in existence."

—The Third Christian church at Philadelphia is looking forward to its new organ, which it is hoped will be ready by Sept. 1. It will cost $2,150, toward which Mr. Carnegie has offered $750. All the money is now in hand and the organ is being constructed.

—A. M. Growden, on the eve of his departure for Hamilton, Ohio, to which place he has accepted a call, was tendered a handsome souvenir gift at a reception given by the members of his church at Scranton, Pa. Brother Growden has been very popular there.

—The opportunities for work in the north and northwest are great and the call for help urgent, as our reports indicate. Brother Wetzel who, we regret, is leaving this field, says we need one hundred preachers speaking German or Scandinavian in Wisconsin alone.

—In our obituary column will be found a notice of the death of one of our pioneer preachers in Missouri, Bro. Preston Akers. Our older Missouri brethren will recall his early labors and his presence in our conventions. The ranks of the old guard grow thinner every year.

—The revival meeting that was to have commenced Sunday at the Christian church, Moberly, Mo., has been postponed until next Sunday. Evangelist Scoville telegraphed from Beaumont, Tex., that up to Friday 240 additions to the church had been made, and he could not leave as soon as contemplated.

—Already the Sunday-schools are falling into line for children's day. Bro. D. M. Lawson, of Bowling Green, Ky., writes: "We had a very pleasant and profitable children's day exercise on last Sunday night. Brother Wells spoke of the origin of our children's day and our local paper gave an item in regard to it."

—It is now said that Governor Dockery, of Missouri, is going to take the stump soon to defend his administration and to strengthen his chances for being elected a delegate-at-large to the national Democratic convention. What the people of Missouri would like for the governor to explain, is why he has remained silent all the time that Mr. Folk has been prosecuting criminals and seeking to purify our city and state politics, and has not lent his influence to the cleansing of our Missouri politics.

—J. P. Lichtenberger, of the Lenox Avenue Union church, 41 West 119th street, New York city, is having a series of sermons on "The Christian Life," in which the pastor is assisted by Bro. B. Q. Denham, of the 56th street church, and M. E. Harlan, of Brooklyn church; each of these brethren delivering a sermon on one phase of the topic.

—D. S. Domer has resigned his work at Council Grove, Kan., and will close in a short time. It is with reluctance that he closes the work which has been very successful all along the line during the past year and a half, but he feels that there are reasons which make it necessary. He is open for engagements elsewhere and may be addressed as above.

—Dr. J. W. Ellis, of Plattsburg, Mo., dropped in on our ministers' meeting last week, but as it was "busy Monday" we did not have much opportunity to speak with him. It is his brilliant son Breckenridge that is delighting the young readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and many older ones as well, with his "Advance Society" and his continued story.

—The very latest thing is a "rubber social." Just what takes place at such an assembly we are at a loss to know, though "rubbering" has come to have a certain significance. All we have been able to discover is that the price of admission is as much old rubber as you can bring. What is done with it we have not yet ascertained. Perhaps some one can enlighten us.

—A determined effort is being made to free the Central church, Des Moines, of debt. The mortgage incumbrance is $10,000, one-half of which is provided in good notes. The remaining $5,000 is almost in sight. This debt has been a millstone about the neck of the Central church for a long time, and it is hoped that there will be a glorious "bond fire" some time this month.

—We regret to announce that in the destructive fire at Clinton, Ala., the Christian church was burned. This is a great loss to our people in that county. Several young ladies broke into the church and saved the organ and some of the music and a few portable things. At present the brethren do not know what steps to take toward rebuilding, and would appreciate any suggestion or assistance.

—T. D. Butler, late of California, and long known as a contributor to our religious journals, has been called to the associate editorship of the Christian Century. We congratulate our esteemed contemporary on this valuable accession to its editorial staff, and our brother on his entrance into the editorial fraternity. In this connection we congratulate the Century on the fine appearance of its magazine number, as well as on its contents.

—Bro. L. L. Carpenter has been dedicating a church at Byron, Ind. It is a new organization with only ten members, four brethren and six sisters, but their house is worth $2,500. Most of the money having to be provided by people who are not members of the church, these nobly responded to the appeals of Brother Carpenter, nearly $1,200 being raised in this way. Considering the conditions this was most generous. H. Randall Lookabill is to minister to the little flock.

—We are informed that the contract has been let for the large new mission building at Monterey, Mexico, a view and description of which is found in this issue. The young people's department of the C. W. B. M. is trying this year not only to put up this building, but also to establish a boys' orphanage and industrial school in Porto Rico, furnishing it with the necessary buildings and equipment, and to do something toward replacing the mission buildings in Jamaica that were destroyed by the hurricane last August. This work, besides the necessary outlay for the support of the 500 children in the girls' orphanages in mission lands, calls for more money than the children's missionary organizations can raise, hence the Christian Woman's Board of Missions will be glad to receive gifts upon the annuity plan for these buildings. Address all communications concerning this work to Miss Mattie Pounds, 152 East Market Street, Indianapolis, Ind.

—There will be a banquet at the Christian Endeavor hotel, south of the World's Fair grounds, on Tuesday evening, May 24, for the members of the Christian churches of St. Louis. It is hoped that there may be 500, at least, present, and matters of general interest to our cause in the state will be discussed. The plates will be 50 cents only. St. Louis Disciples will please plan to be present.

—The program for the annual convention of the seventh missionary district of Kentucky, embracing the counties of Grant, Boone, Kenton, Pendleton, and Campbell, has been received. The convention will be held at Erlanger on Wednesday and Thursday, May 18 and 19, 1904. The program, we notice, embraces a number of able speakers from within and without the state, and deals with questions of great practical value.

—The C. W. B. M. has joined the other two national missionary organizations in making an exhibit at the World's Fair, and will pay an equal amount with them ($300) for the expense of the building. Nearly all the colleges are falling into line, but we are still short of funds to complete the building by $2,000, and need $1,000 additional pledges. Shall we leave the building unfinished? That is for the brotherhood to say—and they should say it quickly.

—As we go to press we have received the following telegram:

ORANGEBURG, S. C., May 2.—Tabernacle meeting talk of town ten miles around. Built tabernacle to hold 600; enlarged to hold 1,000. Brother Small's sermon last night was on "the church that Jesus built and how it can be reunited." Opened 1,600 eyes. Additions beginning to come now at nearly every service; nothing like tabernacle meetings to reach the masses.—S. D. COLLIER, pastor.

—One of our best known and most successful evangelists in enclosing his money writes: "Please 'shove' my subscription up a couple of years. If I do not get all my subscriptions paid up before this World's Fair makes me a bankrupt, you newspaper men might lose some money." That is a good suggestion. We pass it on to others. Newspaper men do not want to lose any money, they do not want to keep anybody from seeing the World's Fair, and above everything they do not want to cripple the work of any of the evangelists.

—West Side Christian church, Springfield, Ill., has just completed new rooms in the church for the kindergarten department of their excellent Bible-school which had outgrown its former quarters. The rooms are furnished with kindergarten tables and materials of all kinds for modern methods of teaching children. It is in charge of a trained kindergarten instructor with a number of assistants under her. The rooms are used for day kindergarten during the week. This school also has a boys' department with thirty-five to forty boys from ten to twelve years of age.

—It is announced that "not a man among the pastors of the Methodist Episcopal churches in St. Louis will take a vacation this summer." A minister of that church is quoted as saying: "All are going to stand strictly to their posts, for we believe that the very best way to evangelize the masses who need to be evangelized in the World's Fair year, will be to run every one of our churches at high pressure. The people are going to be scattered pretty well over the city and they will probably go to the church at the place that is nearest." There is good practical wisdom in this by which all the churches might profit.

—We are glad to hear that under the wise leadership of R. F. Thrapp, our church at Jacksonville, Ill., is entering upon a new era of prosperity. Bro. Wallace Brockman writes: "The congregation has long since outgrown the present building. What is known as the Elliott property on West College avenue, has been purchased at a cost of $7,750 and a modern building will be built as soon as the plans and specifications are submitted. It is expected that not less than $45,000 will be the cost. Meantime our beloved pastor has the prayers and hearty co-operation of the entire congregation in this arduous undertaking."

—A local paper announces that pledges amounting to $10,000 have been made by members of the five branches of Presbyterians in St. Louis for the support of the evangelistic campaign during the World's Fair period. This looks as if one religious body at least was awake to the needs and opportunities of the situation in St. Louis. Other churches will no doubt do something in the same direction, so that we may anticipate a very active evangelistic campaign throughout the summer in the city of St. Louis, and especially in the neighborhood of the Fair grounds.

—Dr. Broughton, a southern preacher, speaking of a recent union revival in Athens, says:

"The churches need to do what Athens has done, forget their differences and unite on the basis of the cross of Christ and go in for business. These business men that made up the Athens committee can do anything from a human point of view. We want such a union in Atlanta. The business men need to rally and take hold of a revival campaign. May God grant it so."

If the churches can unite for a short period, why not try to extend it "on the basis of the cross of Christ" and all that implies?

—The San Diego, Cal., Union of April 29 contains the following paragraph:

Rev. Dr. J. M. Philpott, of New York, filled the pulpit of the Central Christian church both morning and evening last Sunday. In the morning he delivered an address on "The Church and the Young Man," in line with the Y. M. C. A. character of the service. It was very much enjoyed by the congregation. In the evening a company of young men, who formed a line across the auditorium, came to hear the doctor. They showed their appreciation of both sermons, particularly that of the morning, by filing up to him after the service and, introducing themselves by name, shaking hands with him.

—B. B. Tyler is holding a meeting at the Central Christian church, Dallas, Tex. Doubtless we shall have a more detailed report from him of the situation there, but in the meantime we may say that he is giving great satisfaction. The church paper, for which Bro. M. M. Davis is responsible, says: "Brother Tyler's sermons, as we expected, are of a high order. The evening sermons of the first week on The Christ deserve to be preserved in book form." But Brother Davis adds, "There is one sad thing about this, and it is that most of the people do not appreciate such preaching; they want the sensational and the superficial."

—The church at Warren, Ohio, to which J. E. Lynn goes next month, is one of the historic churches of Ohio, as well as one of the very best among our people to day in that state. It has a membership of over a thousand, one of the largest Bible-schools in the state and supports a missionary in each of the three societies and employs a pastoral assistant. Brother Lynn has been at Springfield for six years and has found there a most loyal people. There are almost 400 in the membership of the West Side church, although it has been established but two and a half years. No doubt under proper pastoral guidance it will be one of the coming churches of the state.

—According to the Kansas City Journal Bro. R. H. Fife, pastor of the Hyde Park church, is doing some excellent service from his pulpit on the evils of divorce. The Journal says:

"The Rev. Dr. R. H. Fife has got some remarkable statistics relating to divorce and marriage from the official records of Jackson county. He has found, by careful investigation, that 1,075 divorces were petitioned for in the circuit court of this county in the year 1903, and that in that year 3,076 marriage licenses were issued. In other words, about one couple tried legally to break the bonds of matrimony last year in this county for every three couples that got legal permission to enter into them."

These are indeed startling statistics and should arouse the pulpit of the country to deal with this growing evil. The recent interdenominational gathering in the east has put forth a deliverance on this subject that is likely to arouse the attention of the country.

—We are in receipt of a communication from Geo. F. Hall representing the Chicago-Texas Land & Lumber Co., containing rather an extended explanation of its affairs, but as the company has not been mentioned in our columns except in the statement of Judge Scofield, we need only to quote the paragraph referring to that matter. Concerning that he says: "Last fall I wrote my old friend, Judge Chas. J. Scofield, that it might be possible we should need his services as counsel from time to time in the conduct of the business of the Chicago-Texas Land & Lumber Co. I told him that at that moment we had one or two suits in prospect, and in case they came off, we should desire his assistance. He replied very kindly, stating that he would be glad to serve us. Upon the strength of his letter, our board of directors, at its next meeting, authorized me to employ him as our head counsel and Major J. H. Southworth as our office attorney, but the suits never came off and we never had any legal troubles with anybody, hence, I did not write any further to Judge Scofield at the time and overlooked the matter. In preparing our stationery, I put his name on our letterhead and on our prospectuses, as I felt we had a perfect right to do. Thousands of copies of these documents were sent to all parts of the country, but a few days ago the judge wrote me expressing surprise that we had used his name as above and forbidding us to continue so to do. It is true that he has never been in our office, as he has never been in Chicago since the organization of this company. We have had no occasion to send for him."

A Question of Honor.

We refer to the enterprise of our World's Fair pavilion. There is yet due about $1,300 on pledges made, and bills are pressing for payment. At least $1,000 additional to the pledges made is needed to complete the building as it should be. The building stands there unpainted and otherwise unfinished, and our funds are exhausted. The workmen can have it ready by May 15, if we can pay them. Shall we be like the man in scripture who began to build a house and was not able to finish it? Not when that building stands in the gathering place of the nations. Is it too much to ask our ministers and others of public spirit to agitate this matter, and urge a more general participation in this public enterprise that means so much to our cause? We think not, and therefore make bold to ask it. We also ask prompt payment from everyone who has an unpaid pledge. The need is urgent. Send all contributions to this office or direct to the treasurer, J. H. Allen, 104 S. Main St., St. Louis.

In behalf of the committee,
J. H. GARRISON, chairman

Ohio Letter.

The last Ohio letter expressed a somewhat hilarious sentiment regarding the passing of the Brannock district option bill by the Ohio legislature. It passed the house 72 to 36, and the senate 27 to 6. Last fall the people of Ohio voted to give the governor veto power. To the utter astonishment of everybody Governor Herrick threatened to veto the Brannock bill unless certain changes were made. The reason given was that it would hurt the Republican party as it was. Groups of men from the house were brought into conference with the governor, and when the speaker was absent and also many of the friends of the bill, it was rushed through with the governor's changes, and no man, not even Mr. Brannock, was allowed by the temporary speaker to say a word. The measure is a fairly good one but shorn of much of its power by the meddling of the governor. No governor for years has been so great a disappointment to the people of the state as the present incumbent. The people of the whole state are aroused with righteous indignation. They are just now anxious for Myron T. Herrick to be put up for governor again, just for the fun of extending to him the veto power of the ballot box. Please do not forget this incident by the time he comes up for re-election. He has vetoed the Chrischalm race track gambling bill, but because it was unconstitutional rather than on any moral grounds.

We are about to bid farewell to two of our Ohio preachers that we are loth to have leave us. These men are Bro. A. W. Place of the Fourth church, Akron, and Vernon Stauffer of Richmond Street, Cincinnati. Brother Place goes, May 8, to Bellevue church, Allegheny, Pa. He has done heroic service at Akron, and the people of Pennsylvania will find him a tried and true man. Brother Stauffer goes to Angola, Ind., to succeed C. S. Medbury. If any man can do that it is Vernon Stauffer. He is every inch a man and a thoroughly good preacher and pastor. We don't want to lose him but congratulate Angola and Indiana. We wish to serve notice, however, now that he is only loaned for a time. Every up hill has a down hill, however. Ohio not only gives but gets. She is to get, so the daily press says, J. E. Lynn, of Springfield, Ill., who will come to the church in Warren, recently vacated by M. L. Bates. This is another homecoming, as Brother Lynn is a Buckeye and was reared near Warren. We extend both hands and a hearty welcome.

I. J. Cahill has been given a leave of absence from the Central church, Dayton, for two or three months and is in Wartburg, Tenn., to take a greatly needed rest. By overwork and an attack of the grippe Brother Cahill has almost broken completely down. This will be the first real vacation he has taken for ten years. Mrs. Cahill is also at the same place seeking a restoration of health.

W. B. Slater has offered his resignation at Kipton. As to his future plans this scribe is in ignorance at this time.

D. P. Shaffer has folded his tent and stolen away from Barberton and is located with the church at Sullivan. The last pastor at Sullivan stayed fourteen years, so Brother Shaffer has a good precedent.

A. Skidmore is now preaching half time at Mill Creek church in Union Co. This church has a sad and prolonged case of Sommers, but has finally, to its delight, been forsaken by the following of said Sommers and is now ready for a good, healthy growth, having taken both the foreign and home missionary offerings. Brother Skidmore would be glad to preach for some other church within reasonable distance. His address is East Liberty.

Chas. C. Smith has moved from Greenfield to Blanchester where the brethren will build a new house this summer. Brother S. will still preach for Greenfield half time, but goes to Blanchester to superintend the building enterprise.

There are several good men who want to come to Ohio to preach. We should be glad to have them all, but there are not enough churches to go round. Will all churches wanting preachers write this scribe?

Eri M. Dille was, up to the time of his death, April 20, the oldest man in Cuyahoga county. He was born in 1812. At the age of 18 he obeyed the Christ. He lived on one farm, that is now mostly the village of Nottingham, nearly ninety years. He was baptized by Sidney Rigdon. Brother Dille was a man who abounded in the work of the Lord. He and his good wife walked together sixty-two years. He was largely responsible for the beginning of the church in Collinwood and gave largely of time and means for its establishment. His funeral was largely attended and was conducted by his lifelong friend and brother, Lathrop Cooley, assisted by J. C. B. Stivers and C. A. Freer.

All things are now pointing to Cleveland for the state convention which will begin Monday afternoon, May 23. The women will have the first night and day. The railroads have granted one fare plus 25 cents from all points in Ohio. Preachers, don't use your clerical book for this trip, as a round trip ticket will help to get rates next year. The Netz sisters will sing. That is worth a trip across the state. Such men as Lord, Lowe, Wakefield, Baker, Cross Shelburn, Harvuot, Priest, Webber and Ranshaw from Ohio will speak. Then we will have the privilege of hearing Denny, Darsie, Bentley and Muckley from without Ohio. Professor Thomas, of Hiram, will wield the baton. Come to Cleveland. You can't afford to stay away.

Did you take the offering in your synagogue last Lord's day for American missions? If not, there is yet time. Don't neglect it.

Collinwood, Ohio.

Empire State Notes.

The River street church of Troy, Geo. B. Townsend pastor, has established a Chinese Sunday-school. At last reports they had 12 Chinamen in attendance.

The recent meeting held by F. O. Fannon at the Central church, Syracuse, was a great spiritual uplift to the church. Brother Ryan, the pastor, expressed it when he said: "Fannon somehow gets all the people to loving each other." At the close of Brother Fannon's meeting at North Tonawanda over $5,000 was raised to cancel the entire church indebtedness.

We are glad to welcome R. Perry McPherson to our empire state brotherhood. He has become the pastor of the new congregation at Dunkirk. He has given up a prosperous church to undertake this pioneer work, and he will be successful, we are sure. Dunkirk is a flourishing little city, the home of the great Brooks locomotive works, and, like a dozen other cities of our state, a rare opening for the Disciples of Christ. We will begin an evangelistic campaign there as soon as possible.

The church at Williamsville, under the leadership of D. C. Tremaine, is taking on new life. This is one of the oldest congregations in the state.

Joseph Keevil, of Greenpoint, Brooklyn, is in a meeting with the pastors of the Greater New York churches, preaching alternating evenings. Following this your correspondent will continue the meetings, beginning May 8.

We have just established a new church at Syracuse, N. Y., which is an object lesson for every city church in the whole brotherhood. I believe that only in this way can the problem of city evangelization be solved. Wm. D. Ryan, since he became the pastor of the Central church here, has been preaching and teaching missions; not simply missionary giving, which is comparatively easy, but missionary swarming, which is much harder. This is a teaching which is sadly neglected in our great missionary brotherhood. Too many of our city churches are content to be a sort of Mecca for all the Disciples of the city, instead of a distributing point for missionary enterprise. The Syracuse church, about six months ago, purchased a chapel in the western part of the city. There they began a Bible-school, which prospered. It is in a new part of the city. Four weeks ago I came and began a meeting. Last Lord's day we organized a new church with 26 staunch adult members. Twelve of some of the best members of the Central church were dismissed to form this nucleus. Two of them were officers which the old church needed. Brother Ryan and the church have been enthusiastic. They not only allowed these people to go, but did it gladly. I have not heard a single complaint as to the weakening of the old church. They think the mother church will be stronger, and it will. The reason so many of our old city churches are at a standstill is because they have refused to "swarm." Sometimes the pastor is partially to blame, too. He is afraid such action would weaken his home forces. It does mean sacrifice, but it is the only way we will ever solve the problem of city growth. Neither the home society nor the state boards can solve the problem alone. The churches must take the initiative. It will not do to simply ask people to give money in a general way. They must be urged to pass through the sacrifice of relinquishing their membership in the old church to form the new. That is the secret of our success in Des Moines, Ia. It ought to be done in every city church in the brotherhood. The Central church here in Syracuse is not a large one. We have a dozen churches in the state that are better able to stand the sacrifice than Syracuse. We have all learned that it does not weaken the cause to send workers and money to foreign fields; let us also learn the harder lesson, that it does not weaken the cause to scatter our forces in the cities and plant new churches here.

Let New York Disciples remember that our year ends before the convention in June, and that the offerings for state work should all be in before that time. We are going to be in great need of money. Let every congregation do its best.

STEPHEN J. COREY, Sec.-Evangelist,
Rochester, April 28.

Northern California.

Changes are sometimes desirable, sometimes not. However, they indicate anything but stagnation. They indicate "something doing."—Frank E. Jones came from Palouse, Washington, to take the work at Selma May 1. The bringing of a good church and a hustling preacher together ought to bring results. —W. W. Pew goes from Oraville to Concord to supply until the state meeting.—T. P. Reid closed at Gridley. His future work I have not learned.—T. D. Butler closes at Healdsburg and goes to Chicago to strengthen the Christian Century. We congratulate the Century on this move. What is California's loss in this respect is gain to the whole brotherhood. Other changes are in process of incubation.

It is true that years ago we suffered out here from some unworthy preachers, but just now we are suffering from a layman who is a meddler and a busybody, a self-confessed falsifier and one who has no scruples, in reporting convention news, to sandwich in anything to help his private ambitions and charge it, or at least make it appear, as having been the work of the convention. It might be a benefit sometimes if we could keep a sergeant at arms to care for such fellows.

On the whole, we are glad to say that never in our history was there the same enthusiasm shown in our work here as at present.

Very many are inquiring as to our ability to find them good homes near Christian churches, and also about the proposed Christian colony. We hope very soon to have something definite to say along this line.

Our state convention meets at Santa Cruz July 18-31, and promises to be a record breaker. Come. J. P. DARGITZ, Cor. Sec.

Healdsburg.

The New Church at Iola, Kansas.

A new Christian church building costing $9,000 has been dedicated by W. S. Lowe, superintendent of Kansas missions. The following report is a synopsis of the account appearing in the Iola Daily Record:

The building is a handsome brick structure with beautiful art glass windows. The interior woodwork is light oak. The sittings are comfortable opera chairs. It is heated by gas and lighted by electricity. The auditorium, lecture room, church parlor and robing rooms are on the first floor; above is a banquet room 35x25 feet, with ample accommodations for the social functions of the church.

E. N. Phillips, Iola, Kansas.

The basement is designed for a gymnasium. The baptistry is a modern open one. Every cent of the $9,000 has counted.

The church represents untold effort and sacrifice. The membership is not wealthy, it is earnest and aspiring. The difficulties were neither ignored nor underestimated, but there was abundant courage to meet them, and a beautiful church edifice is the result.

The history of this church is interesting, inasmuch as it is one of the oldest congregations in Kansas, having been organized in 1859 by Hamilton Phillips, an uncle of the present pastor, with 10 members, two of whom are still living, viz., Mrs. S. I. McDonald and Mrs. Wisner.

Elder Phillips was succeeded by Elder Solomon G. Brown. It is an interesting coincidence that he also is an uncle of the present pastor.

The Record says of Elder Brown, "He was a man of large stature, a large voice and most plainly spoken. He spoke fearlessly on the living questions of the day and was one of the strongest preachers in the west."

During the war the church was characterized by the same courage and earnest endeavor that marks it now.

There were frequent changes of ministers and finally came Bro. Henry Martin, during whose pastorate was built the little old church which was moved away to give place to the new one.

The church has grown rapidly in the last few years. The present pastor, Eld. E. N. Phillips, has proven the right man in the right place. He is a man of earnest convictions, great natural gifts and untiring energy.

A broad education has added to his natural powers of deep thinking, and this, combined with his oratorical ability, makes him a helpful and interesting preacher. His people admire him as a preacher and love him as a pastor. With its improved church facilities the Christian church will be a most powerful force in Iola.

Notes From Lafayette, Ind.

The district convention at Veedersburg, was well attended. We were proud of the delegation from Tippecanoe county. Every pastor in the county attended the convention, as well as delegates from most of the churches.

Our convention had somewhat of a gloom cast over it when it was learned that Bro. A. J. Frank on account of ill health has had to resign his work at Lebanon. Brother Frank has done a great work, and now since they have gotten into their beautiful new building it is certainly a great disappointment to both the congregation and to him not to be able to continue in a field where he was so well established and loved by those whom he served. It is the sincere desire and prayer of this third district that after a much needed rest for a time he may be able to resume his work in this district, if not at Lebanon, at least with some other congregation in this district. The convention very properly remembered Brother Frank and family by appropriate resolutions expressing their interest and sympathy, and their hope for his speedy restoration to health and place among us.

We were glad to see Brother Moorman in attendance at the convention. He was remembered by the convention with resolutions expressing its sincerest sympathy with him in his sore bereavement in the loss of his dear wife and companion. Brother Moorman is one of our young preachers whom you need to know right well to appreciate both his ability and consecrated life; and we feel sure that the consolations of the gospel and the comfort of hope do sustain him in this trying hour.

We were certainly glad to see the face and hear the voice of Bro. A. L. Crim, of Ladoga, again in our convention. Brother Crim was elected to fill out the unexpired term of Bro. W. H. Brooks as secretary of the district, Brother Brooks having engaged in general evangelistic work.

We were very happy to welcome to our district Bro. Earl Wilfey, the new pastor at Crawfordsville, Ind. Brother Wilfey is starting off finely in this large and important field. Our convention honored Brother Wilfey by electing him to fill out the unexpired term of the president of our district, made vacant by Brother Cato's having located out of the district. There were 700 additions reported to the congregations of the seven counties of this, the third district, at special meetings during the last six months.

Sunday, April 17, was the day for our semi-annual county mass meeting of all the Christian churches of Tippecanoe county, which met in the First Christian church of this city. After the Bible-school hour we held our home missionary rally with Bro. W. J. Wright leading us with charts and maps, and a stirring address to a large and interested audience.

At 2 P. M. our county co-operation reassembled and all the churches joined in observing the Lord's supper, which was to us all a sweet, blessed communion with our Lord and with one another. Then we took up the work of our co-operation in the county and had brief addresses by representatives from the congregations present, giving us both information and inspiration to do more and better work in the future. Bro. Ernest Linton, pastor of Mt. Hope and Pleasant Grove congregations, who has recently located with them, was gladly welcomed. These two congregations should be congratulated on securing a young man so able and efficient to lead them. Then Bro. Ernest Kuhn, who is located at Battle Ground and preaches for this congregation and Clarks Hill, gave an excellent talk, and closed by extending an invitation to the county co-operation to meet in August with the congregation at Battle Ground, which was accepted.

All of the congregations have preaching at least twice a month, except one, and we hope this one may soon get in shape to have the work go forward more aggressively.

Our county co-operation has been in existence less than a year, and we all feel that it has been a great blessing to us individually and to the work in the county.

Cotner Letter.

Cotner won first prize in the Nebraska state intercollegiate prohibition contest. Mr. Hugh Lomax was the representative.

M. Murashimo, a Japanese young man, is expected here soon from Tokio, where he was converted some time ago. He expects to educate himself for work among his people.

Arbor day was fittingly observed. In the forenoon trees and flowers were planted, and some other improvements made on the campus. For the afternoon a splendid program had been arranged. Special credit is due to Mr. C. S. Paine, who had largely to do with the arrangements for the day.

The Cotner ministerial association has just completed the record of the work done by the ministers and ministerial students of the university during the school year. The record shows that since Sept. 1, 1903, 537 people have been brought into the church through their labors. Of this number, 400 of them came by confession and baptism. In some instances student pastors have employed evangelists for revival meetings, in others students have held meetings for the churches where they preach. Some students have gone out from time to time to hold short meetings. So, in all, much has been accomplished. CLAUDE ARMSTRONG.

Dayton's New Church.

Just two years elapsed between the time of the organization of the West Side church in Dayton, Ohio, and the crowning day of dedication. April 6, 1902, sixty-seven members separated themselves from Central church, forming a nucleus for the new church. The first few meetings were social and prayer-meetings. Beginning the first Lord's day of March of the same year, regular preaching services were conducted every week, continuing without intermission unto the present day. Geo. B. Stewart of Madisonville church, Cincinnati, was called to the pastorate. Measures were taken from the very beginning toward raising money to purchase lots, and this was accomplished in eight months' time, then plans were promulgated for a building. The first service in the new auditorium was Easter Sunday. The building was dedicated April 10, Pres. T. E. Cramblett, of Bethany college, in charge. In the afternoon the auditorium was filled to overflowing. At this service in the neighborhood of $6,500 was secured. The property acquired by this faithful people in two years is valued at not less than $13,000. Much credit is due the building committee, especially the chairman, J. F. Needles, for his diligent and painstaking care in the erection of the beautiful house of worship.

The edifice is built of cherry red brick with gables of green tinted shingles. The auditorium has a seating capacity of 350. Robbing-rooms are easy of access, located back of the pulpit platform. The basement is a splendidly finished room, seating 300, for all auxiliary and social meetings. The church is heated by a furnace, a donation from one of the members. Altogether it is a fine structure and a monument to the aggressive spirit of the Disciples of Christ in the Gem city, G. B. S.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

The spring campaign for new schools is now on, and the indications are good for fifty new schools by the Carrollton convention, but to do this the schools of the state must "lend a hand" by remitting their proportion of the expense needed in such work, and you must not be so slow about it.

Gilead, Pettis, has done great work in the past, and from them have gone out the Elmore boys and our Brother Cartright, while others of the ministry have found here help-meets of the right kind. But removals, death and emigration have made heavy inroads on the fellowship, so that it is with difficulty the work is now prosecuted; but determined to do their best, the brethren are holding the fort against great odds. Arthur Downs, a young man of the neighborhood really fits their minister, is giving good satisfaction, and is manfully leading in all the services of the congregation. We organized a good school, all pledging themselves to stay with it and make it the success needed to renew them in the work of God. All were very cordial to the evangelist, and it was a pleasure to find T. H. Jenkins and "father" Elmore still serving God and battling for the right.

Perry has just let the contract for a $10,000 house, but made no such plea in remitting to us, sending exactly the same as in former years, while some better schools, in appearance, neither give nor seek excuse.

The corresponding secretary put in four new schools during April, while W. A. Moore put matters in shape for two more, and R. B. Havener organized three, increasing the school membership, in all, near 1,000. Think of that!

T. J. Head has been at Sullivan, where the few are very anxious for a congregation and house of worship and in his efforts, he was shut out of one house and is now using another when not in use. There have been many additions and the community is eagerly listening to the truth. Good for Head.

Our county superintendents have heard from J. Q. McCanne, our state superintendent of that department, and many are now doing their best for good county reports at Carrollton, to some of whom your secretary will make some nice souvenir presents. Let the county superintendents be free to command this office or Brother McCanne, and we will gladly co-operate with them.

The Proposed New Mission Building at Monterey, Mexico.

This is a picture of the architect's drawing of the exterior of the proposed new mission building at Monterey, Mexico. The building is to consist of two stories, and will be 105x55 feet in size. The lower story will contain corridors, six school rooms, and editor's room and pressroom for the printing department, and an office and a consultation room for the medical department. On the second floor there will be a chapel and six large class rooms, corridors and lavatories. The building will be of brick with dry pressed buff brick surface, molded press brick cornice, and stone foundation and steps. The total cost will be about $15,000.

Nebraska Secretary's Letter.

The Austin-McVey meeting for the board at Geneva began in the rain on April 24 with a handful of people. By Thursday evening they had purchased 60 chairs to seat the lecture room, and on May 1 many were turned away. The ice broke Monday evening with three confessions, all grown people. Belvidere people drove up on Lord's day. Let the brethren pray everywhere for this meeting.—Four grown people added at Kearney April 17. Brother Divine, our missionary there, has received 72 into the churches at Lexington, Kearney and Overton since his coming last fall.—F. S. White has closed his work at Arapahoe and taken the work at Dorchester. —The church at Ulysses is busy rebuilding its house on the new location. They will have a creditable house with furnace heat and the very best location in the town. At present they are meeting in a hall. Bro. Thos. Maxwell is the rustling preacher, and the church board recently gave him a call to stay another year at an increase of salary. The outlook is good for a fine work there.—D. B. Titus is visiting with his father, Ira Titus, at Dewese, this spring. He may remain for some time, or even permanently, in the state. We would not rob New Mexico, but if he has to leave that field we shall be delighted to get him here.—District No. 6 meets at David City, June 13-15, No. 5 at Chester, June 15-17. No. 4, June 17-19, at Wakefield. No. 8 at North Platte, June 21-23. These are all June meetings. District No. 3 meets at Valparaiso, May 11-13, and No. 2 will have met and adjourned at Frith when this is read. No. 7 met at Hastings in a very successful convention April 26-28. Officers for the year are, H. S. Gilliam, president; Z. O. Doward, corresponding secretary. —The Harvard church, where V. E. Shirley ministers, has recently paid off its last vestige of debt. This is due to a generous gift from two of its prominent members. The church is to be congratulated both on the clearing away of the debt and on the possession of two members who are so willing-hearted with the means God has given them. —The dedication at Kingston has been set for May 15. We are anxious that the weather man will get his rains out of the way for that date.—The arrangements for the state convention in August are taking shape. The committee on arrangements has been actively at work. The building of a pavilion is one of the things now under consideration. Fencing the grounds is another. —Ashland will hold a meeting early in June with Austin and McVey at the helm. They look forward to a great meeting.—Let no one forget or neglect the May offering for home missions. A strong pull together and the work will be done. Nebraska has a just pride in her own vigorous achievements, and we need to have the same pride in doing our part in the general evangelization of the whole United States; 13 came forward May 3rd, in the Geneva meeting, making 16 in all.

Ohio C. W. B. M. State Convention.

HELD IN CLEVELAND, MONDAY AND TUESDAY, MAY 23, 24.

The twenty ninth annual convention of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions of Ohio will convene at 2:30 P. M., Monday, May 23, in the Old Stone church on the public square, Cleveland. The address of welcome will be by Mrs. Lathrop Cooley, Cleveland, and the response by Mrs. L. I. Morse, Columbus. A workers' conference in which such subjects as concern every worker will be discussed by such women as Jessie B. Pounds, Mrs. M. J. Grable, Miss L. Etta Rannells, Mrs. Lottie Ogden Tingley, Mrs. A. S. McKittrick, or better known as May Donaldson McKittrick in her writings, Mrs. Jennie Sellers, Mrs. W. T. Groom and others, will follow. The evening address will be given by Mrs. Louise Kelley, national organizer, of Emporia, Kansas, and the preparation service will be conducted by Dr. Butler, of Cleveland. Monday night will be the only night on which Princess Long will sing; therefore we invite every pastor and his people to start in time to reach Cleveland for the Monday sessions. After the afternoon conference the Cleveland friends will give a reception to all delegates, both men and women, in the parlors of the church.

Tuesday's two sessions will be full of splendid things. The speakers will be Walter S. Goode, Youngstown, Miss Mattie W. Burgess and Miss Mattie Pounds, of Indianapolis, Henry J. Derthick, of Berea, Ky., where he is laboring for the mountain people, and Mrs. Kelley, and Mrs. Atwater's address will be some of the features of Tuesday's program. The conferring of the honor roll certificates Tuesday afternoon will be a new feature and of interest to all who have won such honors.

The reports are good, the work in fine condition, the state funds the best in the history of our work. Half rates, plus 25 cents, to all. Entertainment in private homes at 50 cents for lodging and breakfast, to be secured at the Old Stone church from the committee. Cheap restaurants abound in Cleveland, and the other kind, too. Every street car line makes connections at the square and runs from all depots. MARY A. LYONS, Cor. Sec.

The Orphanages in Porto Rico.

That there is not a place in the world where such an institution is more needed, is not questioned by those who have seen the poverty, suffering and superstition which exist on this island. It is enough to break one's heart to see the little emaciated creatures sigh and turn away when they hear the words, "There's no room," in our orphanages. There is a pathos in this scene which ought to melt the hardest, most miserly heart in the world. I have visited the girls' orphanage many, many times, and have observed every detail of the work and management, and do assure our good people in America that this institution is managed on the strictest business principles. Sister Ford can make a dollar go farther and do more than any other person I ever saw. It is really astonishing to see how much good is being done with so little money and equipment. Sister Collins is an ideal teacher, and has advanced the little ones in a most excellent way. Love reigns supreme. Jesus is everything with them, and all else is but the ladder on which they climb to a larger conception of him. The girls' orphanage should by all means care for one hundred little jewels for Jesus' sake.

With Brother Wilkinson and wife at the head of the boys' orphanage, we may expect equally as good results from their work, but their hands are tied, they must wait for a house until many of those who have been looking to this institution for aid, must die in despair. It is cruel in the American to heap up his riches to be wasted in the courts after he is dead, when there is such a worthy appeal for help as we have just now from this island.

We must save Porto Rico to save ourselves from disgrace in the eyes of the world. God is calling us into this fellowship, and we must heed his call or else our garments will be moth-eaten, our gold and silver will rust, and their rust shall be for a testimony against us.

Southeast Kansas Convention.

The district missionary convention of southeast Kansas met in the town of Chetopa on May 3. We have in southeast Kansas over 6,000 members in 57 congregations. Forty-five of these churches had regular pastoral work during the year, and twelve of them seem to be without any preaching at the present time. This is one of the most productive parts of the state, and is rapidly gaining in population while its resources are being rapidly developed. For this reason it is a fine field for church growth and development. The reports, as presented by Brother Forsyth, the secretary of the district, indicated that there were over 1,000 additions in the district during the past year. This certainly is an encouraging report.

The convention was well attended, possibly the best in years, and while there were some absentees on the program, this was well filled and the addresses showed both care in preparation and a thorough knowledge of the work in hand. Among those who delivered addresses were O. M. Pennock, G. W. Burch, Frank L. Jewett, P. D. Holloway, W. S. Lowe, C. E. Pile, R. H. Tanksley, C. A. Burgen, Ellis Purlee, Robert Simons, A. C. Wentmore, E. G. Manley and others.

The C. W. B. M. part of the program was well presented by Mrs. G. W. Tinder, Mrs. J. A. Longston, Miss Alma E. Moore and C. E. Pile. Miss Alma E. Moore, state superintendent of junior work, seems to be an earnest, active, capable worker and is certainly doing great good for the cause of junior endeavor work.

Wallace C. Payne, dean of the Bible chair at Lawrence, Kan., delivered several most excellent addresses. He seems to be perfectly at home in the splendid work of presenting the great themes of the Bible for the consideration of those who attend our conventions. The brotherhood of Kansas are greatly blessed in having such a capable man among them. W. S. Lowe, the superintendent of the state mission board, was present to look after the interests of the splendid work that is being done in Kansas for the cause of Christ. He reports the work prosperous and is looking forward to a great convention at Paola. J. A. Longston, who presided over the convention as its president, did his work exceedingly well. He and Brother Forsyth, the secretary, make a splendid team together and have the work well organized and in a prosperous condition. Brother Longston makes a fine president and the district seems to appreciate the good work that these officers are doing by re-electing them for another year. Brother Pennock and the congregation at Chetopa did their utmost in caring for the delegates and in making them feel perfectly at ease and at home.

The convention heartily congratulated itself for having fallen into such good hands and the splendid care bestowed upon them. The writer was asked to preach one night during the convention, which he did in the absence of the party who was to have been on the program. The audiences during the night meetings were so large that they were held in the Methodist Episcopal church, as their church holds about double the audience of our own. All the sessions, both day and night, filled the house of worship in which they were held. Taking it all in all this was a splendid convention and bids well for the cause of Christ in southeast Kansas. G. A. H.

Canton Notes.

Bro. E. M. Carr is holding a meeting at Myer, Ill., with good results.—Elder Hitch has been called to preach during the next year at Maud, in Shelby county.—Prof. B. Clever, our teacher of Hebrew and Greek and one of our ablest ministers, is now preaching at Denver, Ill. We congratulate the church on securing his services.—Elder Harbord will preach in Kansas City on fifth Lord's day in May, and in June will dedicate a new church building at Steffinsville, Mo.—Recently I visited and preached for the church at Lewistown, Mo., now in charge of Prof. Oscar Ingold. I found a most prosperous church. It pays a good salary for preaching, is out of debt, has a strong Senior and Junior Endeavor and a prosperous Sunday school. Recently I received from Bro. Henry Davis a list of churches in south Missouri in want of pastors, and I have put some of our graduates in correspondence with them.

Our new university building will be ready to enter in about ten days, and the outlook for a very successful coming school year was never better. Requests for preachers are coming in from California, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Indian territory, and students are in correspondence from most of the western states. In short, the school is now prepared for and in every way worthy of the patronage and support of the brotherhood throughout the states. We are now able to receive five hundred students. There will be nearly twenty graduates in June, and about fifteen preachers to be ordained. Many of our preacher-students have more calls to hold meetings during vacation than can be supplied. The people are accepting New Testament Christianity when presented, but without preachers there will be no presentation, and hence many must be neglected. Five hundred preachers are wanted in Kansas. I suppose this number would be needed to evangelize Missouri. THOMAS WALLACE.

A MILLION FROM A MILLION LEAVES A MILLION MORE.

That is to say, a million dollars from a million disciples for Home Missions would not impoverish, but enrich. Every heart would be rich toward God. Every contributor would be confident of treasure laid up in heaven. The cause of Christ would be set forward a decade. We ought to average one dollar a member for Home Missions.

We are asking for only $200,000 this year to answer the appeals which already amount to double our spendable income of last year.

Sermons by E. S. Ames.

These sermons seek to interpret religion in the light of modern psychology and historical knowledge, with the candor of the scientific spirit. In so far as they accomplish this, they transcend all denominational sectarianism, and promote a knowledge of the truth in which is freedom and essential union.

A series of twelve is being printed—one each month. The twelve will be sent to any address for one dollar. Remittances may be made to E. S. AMES, 5520 Madison Avenue, Chicago.

The subjects of the sermons already printed are:

The Religious Nature of Man.

A Lenten Sermon: the Temptation of Jesus.

Living in All Good Conscience.

Kentucky.

I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, is in the midst of a good meeting with H. D. Clark at Mt. Sterling.—J. W. Graham, of Louisville, is visiting the churches over the state in the interest of our Louisville orphans' home. This is one of our noblest charities, and he should be given a cordial welcome wherever he goes.—The ninth district Sunday school and C. W. B. M. convention was held with the Versailles church on May 5, 6.—Meade E. Dutt has succeeded J. A. Holton at the New Union church in Woodford county.—At this writing State Evangelist H. W. Elliott is in a good meeting with the church at Ludlow.—G. H. C. Stoney, who recently resigned at Flemingsburg, has accepted a call to Murray, and is already at work in that field.—R. J. Bamber has entered upon his work at Versailles with fine prospects. We gladly welcome him to our state.—The thirtieth annual convention of the South Kentucky missionary and Sunday-school association will be held at Corydon, May 23-26.—President B. A. Jenkins, of Lexington, will assist George Darsie in a meeting with the Frankfort church in May.—The eighth district Sunday-school and C. W. B. M. convention was held with the church at Carlisle, April 28, 29.—W. S. Willis reports two baptisms at Millersburg recently.—President J. W. McGarvey recently visited the church at Somerset and assisted the minister, O. P. McMahan, in an ordination service. Brother McGarvey held a debate in this church thirty-five years ago with a Baptist minister.—W. B. Blakemore, of Lexington, has accepted a call for half time at Mill Creek, Mason Co.—Oscar W. Riley, of Covington, has accepted a call to the church at California, Pa.—We are glad to report seven additions here at our regular services recently—five by baptism.

Missouri State Mission Notes.

Missouri is doing her best to carry out one of the recommendations of the Centennial committee of the general convention. A special effort is being made to pay off church debts. The last one to throw off this burden is the church at Nevada. G. B. Edwards, the pastor, deserves all praise, for he, under God, has led this people to the accomplishment of this great work. He has been with them but three years, and $15,150 has been paid on the debt. It is amazing to those who know the circumstances, and the question is, How was it done? By an unfaltering faith, a courage that dared anything and an industry that never tired. It was a happy day, April 24, when all evidences of indebtedness were burned in the presence of the congregation by Bro. F. H. Glenn. Bro. W. A. Oldham and the corresponding secretary were there to help them rejoice and listen. They took an offering of $50 for state missions. We take off our hat and make our best bow, and in our sweetest voice we say "Thank you" to the Nevada church and its pastor.

But Nevada is not the only church! It was my privilege to be in Stanberry at the inauguration of the annual rally day, and such a happy time we did have. That comes pretty near being the prettiest church house we have in the state. It is not the largest, nor the most costly, but for beauty I doubt if it be excelled in any part of the state. It was my first visit since this exquisite building took the place of the old structure, and I was delighted. I found Pastor J. E. Davis and his delightful young wife royally enthroned in the hearts of all the people, and they deserve it. He is one of the coming men of our state and will be heard in time to come. They have a debt of $3,500, but they will get rid of it before very long. They don't make this an excuse for not giving to missions, but give more than ever before. That is a good way to pay church debts.

The little church at Sheffield, under the lead of G. E. Jones, is doing splendidly; it is practically out of debt now; they made their first real offering for missions the other Sunday and gave $30 for the state work.

DIVINITY SCHOOL —OF— HARVARD UNIVERSITY CAMBRIDGE, MASS. AN UNDENOMINATIONAL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. Announcement for 1904-05, Now Ready.

Carl Junction has been awakened by the meeting of Bro. Joseph Gaylor and is now pushing on to better things.

We regretted greatly our inability to attend the session of the southwest preachers association at Aurora. W. A. Oldham was the chief speaker. The report is that while the attendance was light the work done was of the first order.

F. J. Yokley, the indefatigable and irresistible, is pushing things at Marionville. The difficulties he has had to encounter in the erection of their new church home have been great, but victory is in sight.

The state convention is only about one month away. Are you ready? Are you going? The report comes that the World's Fair is going to hurt us. Is that true? It ought not to be. It is a fine thing to go to the Fair, but are not the interests of the kingdom of God first?

If the preachers will push this matter of attendance they can exert a wonderful influence for good. Will you not talk it, preach it to your people and pray that we may have a great gathering?

Are you ready for the convention? Has your church sent its offering? Brother, your cooperation at this point is needed more than we can tell you. Many, very many, of the churches have not taken their offering. Is yours one of them? We have been working, planning, praying, with confidence that you will not fail us. If you do, then our report will be a sad one. We beg for immediate action on this question. It is vital; failure here is ruin.

Washington State News.

Evangelist McConnell added 25 to the Tekoa church. He is in a meeting at Palouse with the Webbs leading the music.—F. E. Jones has resigned at Palouse and intends to go south. Brother Walker takes charge of the church at Oakesdale.—Garfield is reported as being without a preacher yet. Neal Cheatham preached at St. John recently after an absence from that pulpit of about nine years. Brother Cheatham is bringing cheer and comfort to many of the weaker churches. His visits are always real blessings, inspiring hope and renewing courage.—It is gratifying to note that several of our churches have made large increase in their offerings to the F. C. M. S. this year. May this be a prophecy of multiplied gifts for home missions.

The Deaconess Movement.

The home and school for deaconesses will be instituted under the auspices of the National benevolent association of the Christian church, June 1. I desire that all members of the Christian church who have received instructions in any school for deaconesses, and all other members of the Christian church who would like to enter on this life of Christian usefulness, between the ages of 20 and 40 years, write me at once, stating their preparation for this work, whether they are financially able to meet their own school expenses, and giving such other information as will enable the proper committee to determine their fitness for matriculation. Only those in good physical health and who are wholly consecrated to the service of the Lord and the church need write. Yours in his name,

MRS. H. M. MEIER.

ARKANSAS.

Rogers, May 1.—Our meeting here goes well; 32 additions and a growing interest.—D. D. BOYLE.

CALIFORNIA.

Eureka, April 27.—Two additions here by letter last Lord's day. Work moving along very nicely.—T. B. DRY, pastor.

Santa Rosa.—We had a grand meeting at Willows with Henry Shadle. Thirty-eight baptisms, two from the Baptists and four by letter and statement. An Endeavor was organized, prayer-meeting started and the whole community benefited. I am now starting with R. H. Bateman at Whittier with six added.—R. L. McHATTON.

COLORADO.

Fort Collins, May 2.—Our missionary offering yesterday amounted to $210. The missionary spirit is growing among us.—WM. J. LOCKHART.

Grand Junction, May 2.—We are having times of rejoicing and encouragement under the pastorate of Rev. F. F. Walters, who took up the work Nov. 1, 1903. Without a regular pastor for about nine months, we feel now that our waiting was providential, in that the Lord has in his own good time provided for us a consecrated, earnest Christian pastor and his worthy wife. Brother Walters planned a series of gospel meetings for early in the year, but was twice hindered; finally begun March 13 and continued five weeks with home forces, the meeting was one of success. There were 34 additions, about half of these being confessions. Of the accessions ten were men who came with their wives. All were over 22 years old save three who were 16. Three were from the Methodists and one from the Congregationalists. Two of the men are attorneys. Some of the new members are wealthy and will be a great help financially as well as spiritually. Before the protracted effort Brother Walters had received 20 into the church, making in all 54 members in six months. Our current expense fund in March amounted to $130. All money raised for different purposes during March was about $300. Sunday evening, April 24, in the Christian church Brother Walters preached the annual sermon to the Odd Fellows and Rebekahs who came in a body. May 1 our home missionary offering amounted to $26.85. We hope it may reach $30.—MRS. A. V. HUTTON.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Washington, May 7.—Two additions at H street church last Lord's day. Will reach our apportionment for home missions. Our Sunday-school contribution last Lord's day for our building fund was $28.70. A mass meeting of the Christian Endeavor societies of the Christian churches of the district was held at Vermont avenue last night to complete subscriptions for the new S. E. building. Ground for a $6,000 chapel will be broken July 1.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR.

ILLINOIS.

Danville, May 3.—I closed my work at Waukegan the last Lord's day in April, with 40 additions during the year I was there; five of these the last Lord's day. I commenced here last Lord's day with five additions.—J. H. SMART.

Pontiac, May 4.—We came here to assist Evangelist E. L. Frazier and Pastor W. G. McColley in a meeting, but Brother Frazier is sick and unable to be here, so Mrs. Williamson is preaching this week. The interest is very good, and we hope to leave the meeting going when the evangelist arrives.—GUY B. WILLIAMSON, singer.

Mt. Pulaski, May 2.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting here with the pastor D. A. Lindsey, resulting in 12 added.—GUY B. AND MRS. WILLIAMSON, evangelistic helper.

Rockford, May 4.—Seven added here last Sunday. Two by confession, three from the M. E's and two by letter.—O. F. JORDAN, minister.

Homer, May 2.—The Christian church here took the offering Sunday, May 1, for home missions, apportionment $10, raised $23.—O. K. DONEY, pastor.

Franklin, May 3.—After five weeks' duration, the greatest meeting in the history of the church at this place, came to a close last Sunday evening, resulting in 80 additions. Prof. Jas. S. Helm, of Chicago, conducted the music. When the meeting began the church was weak numerically and discouraged in heart—now it is strong in numbers, animated with hope, and is rejoicing in victory.—C. A. BURTON.

INDIANA.

Odon, May 2.—Our meeting being conducted by Clarke and Stevens, continues with great interest, people being turned away. Three additions yesterday, two baptized yesterday from the Methodists.—AMOS K. CLARKE, Indianapolis, Ind.

Indianapolis, May 2.—Yesterday one added at Whitewater, ten since I began my work there, making an average of two for each visit.—WILLIS M. CUNNINGHAM.

Indianapolis, May 2.—Three confessions at North Park church yesterday.—AUSTIN HUNTER.

IOWA.

Shenandoah, May 1.—Two added here yesterday by letter.—H. C. LITTLETON.

Newton, May 5.—Semi annual missionary offering of Newton church received May 1 amounts to $118. Apportionments for home, foreign and state work more than assured. Work prosperous in all departments.—E. F. LEAKE.

Atlantic, May 2.—Two more added here yesterday by confession and baptism.—W. B. CREWDSON.

Oskaloosa, May 2.—Two additions Sunday morning. I will be ready for the evangelistic field about June 1.—M. L. ANTHONY.

Sigourney, May 3.—On last Sunday, at my regular biweekly appointment at Lancaster, four were added to the congregation.—C. H. STRAWN.

Cedar Rapids, May 2.—Two confessions at Second church yesterday, one by statement.—J. E. DINGER, pastor.

Colfax, May 2.—Four immersed recently.—THOMAS H. POPPLEWELL.

Sioux City.—Yesterday S. M. Martin closed a great meeting in this city. It continued seven weeks and resulted in 61 additions. Thousands heard the primitive gospel for the first time and the impression made will be lasting. A foundation is laid that insures the success of the work in Sioux City. Brother Martin's greatest service was that held for members and converts only. I do not know of any other evangelist who holds such a meeting, but everyone ought to. The instruction given is just what these new members need. Besides, each one is pledged to the support of the work. Those of our evangelists who have not such a meeting on their program ought to have it there. Its importance cannot be overestimated.—W. T. HILTON, pastor.

KANSAS.

Topeka, May 2.—At my last appointment, Argentine, Kan., there were two additions to the church. This church is in fine condition. They will dedicate their new house of worship on June 19. Next Lord's day I close my work there and go to Ohio, my old home.

MINNESOTA.

Olivia.—Our state evangelist, Bro. J. H. Bicknell, closed a four weeks' meeting here Sunday evening, May 1. The attendance was fairly good, but was in no way proportionate to the excellence of the preaching. There were five baptisms. Olivia is a "problem" for an evangelist for several reasons. First, with a population of about 1,000, it maintains eight sectarian bodies and one Christian church; second, a large number of the people speak foreign languages; and third, there is a strong prejudice against the Christian church prevalent among the sects. If anyone could arouse the people to action, I am sure it would be Brother Bicknell, for a more courteous, enthusiastic, consecrated Christian it would be hard to find. He labored untiringly and unceasingly for the uplifting of the banner of Christ. We bade him farewell on Monday evening after a very interesting lecture on "England and America in Comparison," given by him that evening. We hope that he may be with us some time again.—L. INEZ I. BICKELL.

MISSOURI.

Bolivar, May 2.—Three additions, one by statement and two by letter, since last report. Full apportionment raised for home missions.—J. H. JONES.

Weaubleau, May 3.—Two baptized Sunday at Humansville. The church seems to be taking on new life.—S. E. HENDRICKSON.

Olessa, May 2.—Six additions at Bates City yesterday morning and one in the evening. Will baptize eight this afternoon. Church recently remodeled and interest in general growing.—J. W. COGGINS.

Willow Springs, May 2.—We are in a meeting at Willow Springs with home forces. Ten additions to date; more to follow.—W. E. GRAY.

Marceline, May 2.—There was one more confession at the prayer-meeting last Thursday evening.—A. MUNYON, pastor.

NEBRASKA.

Geneva, May 2.—Crowded house practically all the week. Last night fully 200 people were turned away. The churches that have written me regarding meetings for the coming evangelistic year will please take note that Bro. Frank McVey will hereafter accompany me as singer, and that we will work only on the basis of expenses and what we can raise. If this is not satisfactory to those churches with whom we have partially promised to hold meetings, please notify me here at once.—DE FOREST AUSTIN.

Geneva, May 4.—Thirteen added last night, three the night before; others promised for to-night. Good interest. House packed every night.—AUSTIN AND McVEY, evangelists.

Geneva, May 7.—House packed every night this week in spite of the rain and mud. Four confessions last night, making 24 in the past five days; all grown people but one. We continue.—AUSTIN AND McVEY, evangelists.

NEW YORK.

Syracuse, May 2.—Four confessions at the Rowland street church yesterday, and one confession and baptism at the Central church.—WM. D. RYAN.

NEW MEXICO.

Roswell, May 3.—I closed a two weeks' meeting here last night with 19 additions to the church. We raised the last dollar of our indebtedness last Sunday, besides $20 for American missions. Bro. L. D. Sprague, of California, Mo., led the music. Have had 36 additions to the church here since Feb. 15.—C. C. HILL.

Albuquerque, May 2.—Good day yesterday, two added by letter. I request brethren everywhere when they have knowledge of members moving to this place to notify me.—H. M. BANDY.

OHIO.

Bellaire, May 2.—Ten adults—all married but one—were added yesterday. Both services were devoted to home missions, and a good offering was made.—SUMNER T. MARTIN.

Cleveland, May 2.—The Cedar avenue church, Cleveland, is making steady progress. Seven baptisms last Lord's day. A number of additions by letter recently. The outlook is encouraging.—E. R. WISE.

Steubenville, May 7.—April 17 the Steubenville Christian church observed the fifth anniversary of their new building. During this time the church has had three ministers: J. G. Slayter, who dedicated the church; J. W. Kerns, who was pastor, and the present pastor, H. H. Moninger, who has been with the church about two years. During the five years since the dedication of the building 656 persons have united with the church, making a present membership of 957. Best of all during these five years five young men have entered the ministry. They are L. N. D. Wells, Fred Gordon, Allen Gordon, Edgar Salkeld and Cyrus Yocum. The total yearly receipts have grown from $1,655 to $3,173. The church is out of debt with a fine building and a splendid congregation.—H. H. MONINGER.

OREGON.

Roseburg, April 29.—Closed a 33 days' meeting at Drain, April 22 with 34 additions in all. The church was made self-supporting and a Junior Christian Endeavor was organized as further results of the meeting. The church is strengthened 50 per cent in membership and finance. Prof. D. C. Kellems, of Eugene, preaches there half time. The Roseburg church loaned me for this meeting and is happy over results. The M. E. preacher preached one night in the meeting when I was compelled to be away.—GEO. C. RITCHEY.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Sharon.—The congregation at this place was organized in 1811 by the venerable and beloved Thomas Campbell, consequently it is one of the old churches of the restoration movement. It has always stood squarely for New Testament Christianity. There is now a church property worth some $18,000 centrally located in the heart of the city, and the brethren are prepared to do better work for the Master than ever before. By their invitation I was with them on the occasion of the formal opening and dedication of their elegant house. Brother Honeywell, their excellent pastor, had charge of the services. All services were well attended and full of genuine religious enthusiasm. When the amount was footed up it was found that more than that asked for was raised. If the giving was great the rejoicing was correspondingly great. I shall not soon forget the great kindness shown me by the brethren at Sharon.—L. L. CARPENTER, Wabash, Ind.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Charleston, May 1.—Seven baptisms here April 25, my closing Lord's day with the congregation at Pine Flats, Pa. Began here May 1.—CHAS. E. SMITH.

TEXAS.

Greenville, May 4.—We closed a meeting here last night in which there were 43 additions. Theo. E. Fitz, of Waco, lead the singing and the home preacher did the preaching.—J. W. HOLSAPPLE.

VIRGINIA.

Chilhowie, April 30.—On April 24 there were four additions to the church: three by letter and one confession.—SPENCER L. JACKSON, Box 111.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Parkersburg, May 2.—One confession and a wedding yesterday. Reached our apportionment for home missions.—J. D. HULL.

Echoes from the May Offering for Home Missions.

Sixty dollars—glorious day yesterday. Still more to come. J. L. DEMING.

Loudonville, O.

More than raised our apportionment.

Meridian, Miss.

W. M. BAKER.

Erlanger, Ky., sends $12, apportionment $10. Built new church home during the past year.

The church at Granite, City, Ill., just one year old, made their first offering—$15.

The Fourth church, St. Louis, Mo., raised $30.

The church at Wilmington, O., gave $184.49. Will reach $200. E. J. MEACHAM.

The Jackson boulevard church became a living link church to-day for home missions, and not only so, but increased its offering for the F. C. M. S. LLOYD DARSIE.

Chicago, Ill.

Enclosed find check for $35, the apportionment for home missions from the Millersburg Christian church. W. S. WILLIS.

Best offering in the history of the church for home missions, notwithstanding the fact of building a new church. I visited a church in the country yesterday afternoon and got $8 for home missions. C. F. STEVENS.

Trenton, Mo.

We shall reach our full apportionment. This congregation has increased its offerings to missions greatly in the last five years.

Johnstown, Pa.

E. A. HIBLER.

The offering this morning was $182.25. We will send you $200 and probably more, as many were not out, and we will keep up the canvass. R. W. ABBERLEY.

Minneapolis, Minn.

Apportionment $45; offering yesterday $53, which will be increased at least a little.

Arlington, S. D.

A. H. SEYMOUR.

Our offering for home missions yesterday was $25, nearly double the amount of last year.

Cortland, O.

B. M. DERTHICK.

Our apportionment was $60 at the Mississippi avenue church and we raised $76.85. This is the best offering we have ever made, and the giving was more general than ever before.

LOUIS D. RIDDELL.

Memphis, Tenn.

We have nearly $50 pledged for home missions and hope to make it $60 by the time pledges are paid. If every church grows in missionary zeal as this one has the last few months, you will have four hundred thousand for home missions.

E. M. BARNEY.

Mishawaka, Ind.

We took our collection yesterday, which is by far the largest offering this church has ever made to the great cause of home missions.

J. E. SPIEGEL.

Sandersville, Ga.

We raised our apportionment. Hope to make it more.

W. E. POWELL.

Greenville, N. C.

Offering for home missions to date $235. We shall try to make it $300. Our people are happy in the privilege of supporting American missions.

R. H. MILLER.

Buffalo, N. Y.

Our home mission offering at Hammond, Ind., was $21.27 and at Indiana Harbor $12; total, $33.27. Will send as soon as all is collected.

C. J. SHARP.

Our collection for home missions reached $95. Sunday we will make it $100 or more.

Fort Worth, Tex.

R. R. HAMLIN.

We raised $100.

T. H. SMALLWOOD.

Emden, Ill.

Find check for $60, the apportionment of Christian church at Fulton, Mo., for home missions. We hope to increase from year to year, and we believe it is possible.

MADISON A. HART.

Enclosed please find our offering for home missions. Our mission at this place is just six months old. We feel we must have a part in the good work that is being done by the A. C. M. S. We have no building and but few members, but our work is growing and we expect our offerings to grow also.

Berwick, Pa.

AKERS.

Preston Akers, for forty-three years a minister of the Christian church, died of heart disease Friday morning at his home, 3920 Terrace Street, Kansas City. His body was taken to Missouri City, Mo., for burial. Mr. Akers, was born in Paris, Ky., in 1826, and came to Clay county, Mo., with his parents two years later. He was one of the early circuit riding ministers of Missouri. He was the organizer and founder of many of the churches of this denomination in these and surrounding counties. He was married in 1845 to Miss Sarah Adams, and in 1871 to Miss Julia Robinson. He is survived by 8 children, 12 grandchildren and 3 great grandchildren.—Kansas City Star.

GERRALS.

William Gerrals, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. W. Gerrals, died at Ingersoll, Oklahoma, April 17, 1904, aged three months and twenty-four days. The deceased was born December 24, 1903. The funeral services were conducted by M. B. Ingle, minister of the Christian church at Ingersoll.

HOOVER.

Cordelia Hoover was born March 12, 1841, in Mt. Auburn, Ill., and died April 26, 1904, in Taylorville, Ill., at her beautiful home. She leaves to mourn their loss a husband, David Hoover, five children and one brother, Col. Henry Davis, Jr., of Springfield, Ill., and a vast host of friends. Never was a woman more universally loved by all who knew her. Not only her generous gifts, but the beautiful spirit with which she bestowed them, made her name a synonym for all that is good. The beautiful Davis memorial church, and the palatial parsonage adjoining, built largely by a gift from her parents, was to a great extent due to her influence. She had been a member of the Christian church since early life. Her chief happiness resulted from making others happy. Funeral services were conducted by W. W. Weedon, of Marion, Ill., who had been her pastor for twelve years, assisted by Z. Moore, the present pastor.

MATTHEWS.

Died, Feb. 2, 1904, aged 89 years, Mrs. Charlotte Williams Matthews (wife of Alonzo A. Matthews, deceased), at the home of her daughter, in Savannah, Ill. She lived a devoted Christian life of usefulness for her Saviour and family and shares in the inheritance which the Lord has prepared for them who love him.

MARTIN.

Born in Charleston, S. C., March 15, 1904; died in Charleston, May 1, 1904, being 69 years, 1 month and 16 days of age, Joseph C. Martin. In 1860 he was married to Miss Julia E. Morentz from which union two daughters and three sons were born, all of whom survive. Though fond of his Bible and a great attendant at church, he made no public confession of faith until 1897. But from this time he was a most earnest and ardent worker in the vineyard. Although in feeble health, he fell asleep while making his way to the house of worship where he honorably filled the office of deacon. May our God raise up many such to do his work. Funeral services by Chas. E. Smith.

SALLEE.

Chester Sallee, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. William Sallee, died at Cherokee, Oklahoma, May 1, 1904, aged one year, three months and two days, having been born January 29, 1903. Funeral was conducted at the family residence by M. B. Ingle, minister of the Christian church at Cherokee, Okla.

SNELL.

Mrs. D. F. Snell, nee Hunter, after a lingering and painful illness, borne with much Christian patience and fortitude, is dead. Married to Mr. Albert Snell in 1841; after his death she found a home with her brother, J. W. Hunter, in Long Town, Miss., where her last twelve years were spent. She was loyal to the church of her choice and was a constant and appreciative reader of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. In the absence of the organization of her own preference, however, she threw herself actively with the good women of other churches, and by her unselfish interest in behalf of the good, commanded the confidence, love and respect of all.

WARDEN.

The Central church in Columbus, O., has suffered another severe loss in the death of Hosea Gilford Warden, who passed away on Monday night, April 25. He was born in Licking county, O., Oct. 4, 1841; was married to Miss Ellen M. Wright, Oct. 25, 1865; lived on a farm in Licking county until 1876, when he removed to this city, where he has resided ever since. He was one of the earliest and most faithful members of the Central church and delighted in the services of the Lord's house. He left a widow, but no children, two brothers, Delno H. Warden and A. R. Warden, of this city; two sisters, Mrs. Rosa Van Ness, of Alexandria, O., and Mrs. Henrietta Hunt, this city, and a nephew, Mr. Hosea Gilford Warden, a leading attorney of this city. The burial was at Greenlawn on Thursday, April 28.

Change of Revenue Laws Needed.

ST. LOUIS, MO., April 4, 1904.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—In common with many others, I have been greatly interested in the work of the good ladies of the W. C. T. U.; but especially so in their recent prayerful efforts to secure the closing of saloons on Sunday.

They have my entire sympathy in this movement, as they should have that of all Christian people and others who have the welfare of our city and state at heart. The baneful and pernicious effect of the liquor drinking habit on the coming generation is almost inconceivable beyond computation or estimate. This may appear a strong statement, but I am satisfied that those who have knowledge of its terrible results from personal observation will bear me out. While much good may be accomplished by the prayers of the ladies in remedying to some extent the evil against which they are fighting, there is a point involved in the question at issue which seems to have escaped their attention, as well as that of our law-makers—originating the statutes regulating the liquor traffic. And to my mind, this is found in the character of the licenses issued to the dealers. As an illustration, we will suppose this to be July 1, the beginning of the new fiscal year, and that Mr. B., after having secured a suitable location, and the necessary petition approved by the excise commissioner, needs only to secure the license from the city and the United States to complete his preparations. He goes to the office of the excise commissioner, pays in the requisite fees and in return is handed a properly attested instrument, which grants him the privilege and authority to sell liquors at retail for six months, one-half year, or 182 1-2 days. He then goes to the office of the collector of United States internal revenue, hands to the collector the sum demanded, and in a few minutes holds in his hands a license from the United States granting him similar powers to those already granted, except that the period is extended to one year straight, and one year means 365 days. Now note—there are no restrictions in either as to the time or manner of operation, except, perhaps, the city may require him to run in accordance with the police regulations (?) for the conduct of saloons. Armed with these documents, Mr. B. proceeds to open up for business. Bear in mind the fact that Mr. B. has not engaged in the traffic for "his health," but for "the money there is in it," so he places his own construction upon the privileges and authority given him under his license, keeps his saloon open on Sundays as well as the other days of the week, and perhaps feels that he is violating no law in doing so. He doubtless feels safe in doing so, for has he not the city of St. Louis and the whole United States in partnership with him?

From the foregoing you will see the saloon-keeper is pretty well entrenched, and from this very fact, it may be, springs his readiness to override and deride state statutes and with brazen effrontery trample with impunity upon city ordinances intended to regulate and control his business. It appears to me that about the only means for securing Sunday closing of saloons lies in such amendments of the revenue laws governing the issuance of licenses as will bring it about. Or perhaps a change in the reading of the face of the license might produce the desired effect. Instead of the present reading, let the face of the license show the following permission:

The holder of this license is duly authorized to sell liquors at retail, each and every day during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1904, and ending June 30, 1905, save and except the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, and with the further stipulation: Any violation of this provision shall work the revocation of the license and subject its holder to such further pains and penalties upon conviction thereof as the court may inflict. It is well known, as previously noted, that these gentry (?) have but little respect for state laws or city ordinances, but also equally well known that they have but little desire to become entangled in the meshes of the laws operated under the direction of that kindly, benevolent, but sometimes very stern, old gentleman known as "your Uncle Samuel."

For the cause,

Your fraternally,
WM. H. ARNOLD.

The Voice of Scholarship.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—Since our Knoxville meeting held here in February in which there were 300 additions to the church, every pastor in the city has preached a sermon, widely advertised, on baptism. Some of them have preached as many as four. Every one has claimed that sprinkling was the primitive mode of baptism, and that infant baptism was scriptural. Some of these ministers are of long experience, and graduates of prominent institutions of learning.

While in college I was taught that most of the representative men in all religious bodies would acknowledge immersion to be primitive baptism. This statement is often made in our papers. In an experience of sixteen years in the ministry, I have never found one outside of our own people and the Baptists who would not defend sprinkling and pouring as the New Testament baptism.

Those of our brethren with whom I have conversed on the subject make the same statement.

In the light of the fact that the scholarship of the religious world upholds immersion, what shall we say of the ministers who yet insist on affusion and defend it publicly?

I am your brother,
RUSSELL F. THRAPP.

[The foregoing suggests one of the most difficult problems to solve in connection with the subject of Christian union. It is no doubt a fact as stated above that many reputable and able ministers of the gospel connected with pedobaptist churches do preach and teach as above stated. Nor will it do to say that they are consciously misrepresenting history or the teaching of the scriptures. They have been so taught from their "youth up," and it has come to be a sort of second nature—a tradition which they have accepted as based on historical facts and sound scriptural learning. And yet it remains true, beyond all question, that the scholarship—the highest and the most unbiased scholarship of the church—is decisively and overwhelmingly against the position which these good men take. It will hardly do, perhaps, to say that "most of the representative men in all religious bodies . . . acknowledge immersion to be primitive baptism," because, unfortunately, the scholars of the church are not recognized generally as its "representative men," but if we appeal to ancient and modern scholarship, as it is expressed in lexicons, in church histories, and in the ablest commentaries, we shall find that there is wonderful unanimity as to the original meaning of baptism, and its practice in the early church. Until men are willing to abide by the decision of the world's scholars, on this disputed question, we cannot hope to have unanimity of teaching and practice as respects this divine ordinance.—EDITOR.]

No Heretic.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: As I was a student at Butler college while Brother Ames was professor there, may I say that he was a man dearly loved by all with whom he came in contact, and in the spiritual work of the college he was always first and foremost. Indeed, it certainly is not stretching the truth to say that Butler had no more popular professor than he. I do not recall any student who strayed into the ways of heresy through the influence of Brother Ames' "unsound doctrine." His large Christian heart and deep sympathy for those of different belief won for

Brother Tyler's Experiment.

I love Brother Tyler; this he knows full well, but I think his "experiment" is an unwarranted caper. I want to ask him these questions concerning the "six letters on deposit in the South Broadway Christian church in Denver" (see CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of March 31).

1. Do those letters constitute those six persons members of the Christian church?
2. If so, then why not take all who confess Christ into fellowship without being baptized?
3. If not, then how are they bettered by depositing the letters?
4. Has not the Christian connection (New Lights) tried this experiment?

Brother Tyler has, no doubt, an answer ready. I want it. T. W. COTTINGHAM.

Family Circle

St. Louis—1755-1904.

The owl was in the hollow tree,
The river flowing sluggishly,
The stars above, the mist below,
The moon upon it white as snow.
No sound disturbed the silence there,
No smoke-wreath trembled on the air,
No vision of thy future came
To stir the sleeping forest came,
St. Louis.

Then came a gentleman of France
With pennon, plume, and gleaming lance,
And next a daring pioneer
A little tract of woods to clear.
He reared a cabin on the shore,
With running roses round the door,
And planted things that grew apace,
And built a wharf, and called the place
St. Louis.

Roof after roof, and spire on spire,
Arose to catch the morning's fire;
The river foamed, the paddles flew,
A mighty city grew and grew.
Crowned with electric lights it stands,
And girt with steel in shining bands,
With traffic roaring at its gates,
The pride and glory of the States—
St. Louis.

Two hundred years ago or less
Thy site was but a wilderness;
But now thy fair, with all its arts,
Its riches from a thousand marts,
Its treasures from the land and sea,
Can show no marvel like to thee,
Whose wheels and wires are ne'er at rest,
Oh wonder of the busy West,
St. Louis.

Plant a Tree.

"This is a splendid peach," said Ned. "Just as sweet and juicy! I'm going to plant the seed. Come out into the orchard with me."

"Oh!" said Will, in great scorn. "Why, think how long a year is. Think how long it is since last Thanksgiving; and years to wait before you get any peaches."

"But the time goes by, anyway. That's what papa says. You might as well have something growing. You'd better plant your seed."

"I shan't bother to."

He waited impatiently while Ned brought a spade to dig, and finally, after also bringing water, smoothed the earth over his peach-stone.

"See me shy this at Rover"—

Rover gave a little yelp as the stone hit him, and that was Will's last thought of the small kernel in which was wrapped up so much of beauty and sweetness, ready to be brought out with a little care.

Later in the day Ned spied it and picked it up. He carried it to where he planted the other, then looked about with a thoughtfulness unusual in so small a boy, born of wise heed to what "papa says."

"I don't believe there will be quite room enough here when it's a tree. Those apple trees 'll shade it too much. I guess it had better go over in that corner."

Some years later Will followed Ned into the orchard, and to a special spot, where the latter gave a little exclamation of delight.

"What is it?" asked Will.

"My peach tree," said Ned. "I've been watching out for blossoms this year, and here they are."

"And will the peaches be all your own?"

"Why, of course. I planted the seed. Don't you remember? You were here when I did it. You had a stone, too, that day, but you threw it away."

"No," said Will, "I don't remember."

"I remember, because I've watched and watched it. I saw when it sprouted out of the ground, and when the leaves began to grow; and it's been fun, I tell you, to see it getting bigger and bigger; and now to see these pretty pink blossoms."

"I wish I had planted my stone," said Will, regretfully.

"We're not so very old yet," said Ned; "you twelve, and I thirteen. Papa says that if a boy keeps planting, he will enjoy them all his life, that God sends all his beautiful things to help the one that plants a seed or a tree. The sun helps him, and the rain and the dew and the wind."

"I'm going to plant," said Will; "but you have got the start of me by years."

"Come here," said Ned. He led the way to a corner of the orchard, and pointed out a tree, very much like the one they had just left. "That's yours," he said.

"I don't know what you mean," said Will. "I never planted a peach stone."

"I planted it for you," said Ned. "When you threw it away, I picked it up. See, it has about as many buds as the other—one, two, three, four, five—more than a dozen. This isn't the time of year for transplanting things, but papa says that when the right time comes, if it's taken up very carefully, it won't stop its growth at all."

"You're real good," said Will, fervently. "I'm going to plant trees after this."

He kept his promise, and the two boys are making the world more beautiful for having lived in it. They drop acorns and fruit stones. They bring vines and saplings from the woods. Nature gives them her kindest aid, and as they go on in life they will more and more rejoice in what they have done. In years to come, other lives will be blest by the fruit of their labors.—Sydney Dayre, in New York Observer.

Time is Money.

A man once berated his Hebrew debtor for not having included him among his preferred creditors.

"But I makes you a speshul creditor," was the answer.

"A special creditor? What's that?"

"Vy, a speshul creditor, mine friend, knows now that he gets nothings. The preferred, he von't know that for three years. Time ist money—ain't it?"—Everybody's Magazine.

Wouldn't Risk Her Own Preacher.

A man who once talked with a Baptist minister from New England was much impressed with the varied and unusual experiences which fall to the lot of the country preacher. One thing especially appealed to his imagination.

"It isn't an easy life," he said. "You'd be surprised to hear how some country people treat their ministers. Why, this man said that one cold winter night he was hustled out of bed by a woman he didn't know, and ordered to come right away to her house two miles off, because her son was sick."

"But I don't know you," the minister grumbled. "Are you a member of my church? Am I your pastor?"

"No," said the woman. "I'm a member of Mr. McWade's church. Mr. McWade is my pastor. I don't care about calling him in, though. My son's case is contagious."

Some New Pension Stories.

In his article on "Our Enormous Pension Roll" in the May World's Work, Robert Lincoln O'Brien tells some new stories. The case is well authenticated of a man drawing a pension for deafness incurred in the service when his playmates remembered that his infirmity was so pronounced in boyhood that he always sat in the front seat at school, and was even called by them "Deafie." Of course, no one can say that this infirmity may not have been greatly accentuated by war service.

The story of a man who applied for a pension for injuries received by "taking fright at a false alarm" has become classical. In the old gulf states, where colored veterans and a few northern people are about the only Federal pensioners, the desire to get at the Federal treasury is no less strong. "I had a man come to me," relates an Alabaman, "to say that he wanted to get a general law pension for injuries really received from being thrown out of a buggy at Racine, Wisconsin, ten years after the war. He acknowledged that the procedure was not quite regular, but he justified his course by saying that it was only a question of time when every union soldier would get a pension, and as he might not live to see that day himself, he wanted to take time by the forelock by getting his share now."

Every town has its jokes of that sort. This is one of the pronounced evils of a system of payment based on disabilities, from which a straight service-pension system would give a welcome relief. At least, it should greatly reduce the evil. There is a true story of a man who drew a pension for total deafness on the certificate of an examining board and was discovered in charge of a telephone instrument. One man who was a pensioner on the score of total blindness was found reading newspapers and doing cabinet work; another man, officially certified blind by the United States government, was encountered in a jewelry shop engaged in delicate mechanical tasks with a magnifying glass stuck in his eye. A man drawing $72 a month because "he required the regular aid and attendance of another person" on account of his disabilities, was seen industriously painting the side of a four-story warehouse, having drawn himself up on a twenty-foot ladder, handling both the ropes without assistance. While these cases are, of course, exceptional, their existence even in rare instances is proof of defects in the medical examination system.

On the Point of a Needle.

Rev. Dr. McLeod, of Pasadena, Cal., in a sermon on Micah 6:8, told his hearers of the merciless oppression of the sewing women in our cities who have to make shirts for 35 cents a dozen; and he gave them the following illustration:

The old schoolmen used to have a quibble, "How many souls could be supported on the point of a needle?" A student once asked Robertson that question. "Oh, that's easy," said the great preacher. "As I was walking home the other night I passed a house where a widow lives; her husband was drowned at sea last winter. She has five children, and as I peered through the pane I saw two little curly heads in bed, another in the cradle, and two at the mother's knee. She was working away with her needle, which was flashing in the firelight. So I know now how many souls can be supported on the point of a needle—five, don't you see."

The Great Russian Painter of War Scenes.

Vassili Verestchagin, the best known of Russian artists, won his fame throughout Europe and this country less on account of the technique of his pictures than of the subjects he painted. Russian by birth, by education, by habit of thought, and by keenness of sympathy with the sufferings of humanity, he is Russian also in the terrible fidelity with which he expresses the tragedy of things. There is a greatness and a simplicity in his paintings which appeal to every one. We may shudder at them, but they speak, they arrest us; if we try to turn from them, they strike us full in the face and compel our attention. Verestchagin painted war because he had himself been a warrior. He was a soldier artist—a man who became a soldier for the sake of his art, and who used his art in order to teach the world the truth about soldiering.

There is seldom any actual fighting in the canvases of Verestchagin. This is in accordance with a theory to which he held all his life. He did not believe in depicting only the dramatic moments of the war. If we reckon up the time spent in any war, he was fond of saying, we will find that by far the greatest part of the campaign is spent in suffering, great hardships, heavy labor and miseries. "Weeks are spent in marching in blazing suns, in clouds of dust, or in toiling through mud while the rains drench you to the skin. War means hunger, thirst, sickness, the pain of wounds, privations of all kinds—a reversion to the conditions of savage existence. All these things last for days, for weeks, for months, while the time that is passed in actual fighting is but a few hours. Why, then, should we, in painting war, devote our attention exclusively to these moments of excitement and ignore the dull, grim realities that make up the life of a soldier on campaign?"

With the Children

The Green Witch.

CHAPTER X.

Hoping that Marget might have left the scene of the waterfall, George Clayton returned to the thicket and emerged upon the open. He felt a disagreeable shock at sight of the prostrate body of the girl. She lay at full length upon the ground, her face buried in her arms. She was sobbing and her form was shaking violently. From the upper branches of the surrounding trees there fell a cloud of leaves, stem down, making ghostly sounds as they slipped between their greener sisters, and fluttered to the earth. As if this were a signal agreed upon, the leaves came ceaselessly from every side, showing silver edges in the moonlight. They showered upon Marget as a breeze whirled them round and round. She looked up, and saw George standing ill at ease.

"What do you want?" she asked thickly, as she struggled upon her knees.

"I lost my pencil here," said George coldly, as he sank upon the ground, and began to search the place where he had shaken loose from Marget. The spot was thick with leaves; he felt among them cautiously. Marget sat upon the ground where she had been lying, and cleared her throat. He did not look toward her.

"Did you come just for the pencil?" she asked presently.

"Yes," he answered shortly.

He could not find it, and began to heap the leaves to one side.

"Was it worth so much?" asked Marget in a low voice.

"Oh, the pencil is worth nothing," he returned impatiently, "except I must have it now."

"Are you going to write your name in the book?" she asked suddenly.

"So you know all about the book?" said George, not pausing in his labor. "I thought you did! I thought you were the cause of it all! You know very well whose name I must write in the book."

"Spot Stoner's name?" inquired the girl.

George lifted his stern face and looked at her. Her eyes were fastened intently upon him, and he shuddered a little as he averted his gaze. Her face was white in the moonlight, and it wore a look which lent a sad charm to the lowly one. But he hardened his heart against her. "I don't understand," he remarked bitterly, "how you can speak his name to me."

"Why should I not speak his name?" retorted Marget.

He did not answer. He believed her tears had been caused not from repentance, but because he had discovered her secret. His hands became more impatient as they snatched at the leaves.

"I do not believe you will find it," she said at last.

"I must find it," said George, "and I feel sure I dropped it here."

Marget stood up. "I will write his name in the book," she said, and passed swiftly toward the thicket.

"You have my pencil!" cried George suddenly. Without replying, she vanished from the circle of moonlight. His first impulse was to follow. But the thought of being alone with her had become repugnant. Half in doubt about the accusation he had made, he continued to search with faint hope. He arose, as she appeared once more, near at hand.

"It's all right, now," she said, "I wrote his name. I left the lantern burning so you can go and see, for you do not believe in me any more." Her voice was hard and defiant.

"I did believe in you once," said George. "I mean I believed you were a different kind of a girl. I am so sorry to find you out, Marget,—I can't tell you how sorry I am! I never knew what it was to be altogether miserable, as you have made me to-night."

He had not intended to speak thus, but now he hoped that she would say something to show regret for whatever had passed between her and Spot. She said nothing, however, but turning her back upon him, disappeared among the trees. He hastily returned to the cattle-shed. The lantern stood upon the bottom of the inverted barrel, and beside it the blank book lay open. He felt curious to see what Marget had written. At the first glance at the page he exclaimed, "I wonder where she got her red ink?"

Then he saw that Spot's name, and the date, had been written in blood. Stuck in the barrel-edge was a needle, stained a bright red at its point. It was threaded, and upon the ground lay some autumn leaves stripped from the thread which had held secure the yellow crown of the "Green Witch." George stared at the thin lines of the letters, feeling shocked and unhappy. How she must love the handsome, gay, thoughtless son of his employer! She was willing to write his name in her blood to keep him from trouble! But what had he or she to do with thoughts of love and romance? With them, it was no question of age. George felt that between himself and Marget was an impassable social gulf. How much greater, at least in the eyes of the world, the partition between Marget and Spot Stoner! No one could be better aware of this than Spot. Had he referred to this girl when he spoke of "seeing life" and of "living as a gentleman—as a man of the world"? Had he pretended love to Marget and had she believed him? Perhaps her grief had been excited not so much by discovery as by hearing of Spot's illness. As George returned home, he grew more sure of this explanation. Naturally, if she would walk five miles to be with Spot, if she would use her blood to keep him from trouble, the information that he lay ill and unable to come to her, must make her miserable. Perhaps after all, she had cared little for George's sudden appearance upon the scene; she had certainly uttered no word of repentance, or of excuse. There was one point which Marget's connection with Spot Stoner did not explain; why must his name be written in the blank book twice a week?

Orders continue for "Sunlit Way," a children's day exercise of rare merit. 5 cents each, 55 cents per dozen, $4.25 per 100.

We have at last secured an American Revised New Testament, in full cloth, for 20 cents, postpaid. We have the Bible for 45 cents, postpaid.

Not a complaint has come to us from those ordering our baptismal suits, showing all are well pleased, and why not? They are the best made, while the price is the lowest.

The remarkable book offer, which has been standing as per our announcement, goes out in one week from this issue of the paper, so the tardy ones must now move quickly or be left for good.

The offers for "Helping Hand" come from the young people who wish to post themselves on the Y. P. S. C. E. work in all its organization and workings, and 25 cents is well invested with that in view.

Our stock of marriage certificates and booklets has been greatly reduced this last week, but is again fully supplied, so you need not wait, but on with the ceremonies, then the certificates. Price, 20 cents and up.

For those wishing help in their service at the Lord's table, "Half Hour Studies at the Cross" is just the thing, while the companion volumes, "Alone with God," and "Heavenward Way" help us in private devotion and meditation.

For a first class American or Oxford Bible, write us, as we have all the grades and prices; but we are advising teachers to use the Nelson, as it has surely come to stay, and the sooner we familiarize ourselves with it the better for us and our work.

In Bible-school work, we still urge the use of the "Guide Book," 25 cents, as it takes up all the various phases of the school, discussing fully the officers, teachers, exercises, committees, indeed all the features of the school and its successful operation.

We have one set of the Standard Dictionary in full morocco, the finest made, market price, $26, and we will send it to the first one that orders it at Raccoon John Smith, at 50 cents, has had just such a run as was expected, for never before has such a book been offered at such a price. One pastor has been putting them into the hands of his brethren for loaning among their neighbors, and good results will come of all such reading.

"The future, after all, will not usher in so great a change as some imagine. This mortal must put on immortality, but we will hold to the types of character which we have formed here. It may be that we take up our future life very much at the place where we lay down the present." Dr. W. T. Moore's very suggestive treatment of this subject in "Man Preparing for Other Worlds" (500 pages, crown, 8vo, $2), is but a part of an exhaustive analysis of the spiritual man's career. It is the most original book written on this subject.

A brother in remitting for other copies of the Life of John Smith, asks, "How can you sell such a book in such binding at 50 cents?" Well, we just can't, but then, we said we would and we are going to stay with it, at least one week longer; but unless the offer is renewed it goes out then. Tidings of Salvation is the cheap book this week, and in boards at $1.25, prepaid, is as cheap as "John Smith." But the stock is limited.

In a lengthy review of "Man Preparing for Other Worlds," price, $2, the Christian Century says: "We have here a big theme and a big book.—Dr. Moore has given us a readable book and one that suggests profound thought and inspires high living.—The author has no fears of the finding of the modern scientific spirit. Neither evolution nor criticism has any terror for him.—The book is what the author wished it to be, practical. Its spirit is always thoroughly Christian. It abounds in the Christian graces, faith, hope and charity. The author's faith in God and love for man are so real and so large that he is always optimistic. Human life begins well, has its ups and downs, but ends gloriously. Of the fact of God's fatherly love and the hope of the glorious issue of man's discipline, the book leaves no doubt."

GOD never foreannounces His examinations. If God were to announce to us to-night that to-morrow at twelve o'clock He would meet us, in order to find out what we were in character, what preparations there would be between now and twelve o'clock to-morrow. How careful we should be to appear at our very best, and the result would be false. What you are flashes out when you do not know anyone is likely to be watching you critically. In the small things, in the little details, in the commonplaces of life, character shines out. I never try to find out what a preacher is when he is preaching. It is when he is at home, and when he thinks there is no one there to critically survey, that is the time to find out what he really is. I never want to find out what a deacon is in a deacons' meeting. You do sometimes, but that is not the best time. The best time to find that out is on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, during the week. I do not want to know what your character is when you are singing. I want to find out what your character is when something goes wrong, some little commonplace with your work at home. When you are carried along by the stream of the commonplace, then your character is revealed.

Current Events

Every little while someone tells us that the minister "has no business to meddle in politics."

The Minister and Politics. The mayor of a city that has become notorious for the graft and corruption of many of its officials and leading citizens has just given expression to this sentiment. The main reason he assigns for his belief is that ministers are impractical. Admitting that the mayor is honest in his conviction it by no means follows that he is right, and even if he were, such an attitude on his part is but the easiest kind of way of playing into the hands of evil, for it rules out all idealism, which the experience of many generations has proved to be the only salvation of civic life from all that is rotten and base. Pope Pius X has just given a far better reason why the ministerial element should avoid politics. But even that is only conditional. One of the French bishops sought the pope's advice with respect to the intervention of the clergy in electoral conflicts, and Pius counseled that the clergy abstain because, though defensible in theory, in practice clerical participation "arouses bitter animosity which infallibly compromises the sacred functions," and brings about the loss of that esteem and sympathy which the clergyman needs for the fruitful exercise of his spiritual mission. Undoubtedly the pope is right when the clergyman or minister becomes the mere politician. One of the great hindrances to the spread of the gospel in foreign lands has been this very spirit manifested by Catholic priests. They have not been satisfied to proclaim their message of the Christ, but have sought to control governments. But conditions are very different in this country. There are very few ministers who are mere politicians. We would condemn such men as strongly as the mayor of Minneapolis does. But if any politician tells us that a minister had better attend to his pulpit duties and leave such conditions as have existed in some of our large cities to be handled by the politicians, then we say that a minister is a citizen just as much as a mayor, and if the mayor is an unworthy citizen that is no reason why the minister should be so much occupied with "otherworldliness" as to forget that the religion of Jesus Christ deals with the life of man in the flesh.

If the interior life does not inspire the practical there is something lacking in that inner life. And to be so afraid of practical life as to attempt to evade it is a mistake. The minister has a right to be a politician—but not a "mere politician."

"Mortal Mind" and Food. A woman in New York recently became convinced that food is unnecessary. Her argument was that spirit is the only thing that really exists, that material things are mere phantoms, and that, since the real cannot be dependent upon the unreal, there cannot be any necessity for the use of food. The woman herself abstained from food for a week, but this was not enough. She insisted that her husband and children adopt the same regime. Then the police interfered and she was declared insane. Perhaps she was. But if so, her insanity was of one piece with the theory that drugs and medicines cannot under any circumstances be beneficial to man because man is spirit while medicines are material. If the health of the body is dependent only upon the right action of the mind which animates and controls it, why should food not be as unnecessary as medicine? Both are physical agencies for producing physical and chemical effects upon the body. If it is dishonoring God to use medicine when the body needs those effects which medicine will produce, as the various factions of faith-curists assert, then it is dishonoring God to eat. The New York woman was merely carrying the theory out to its logical conclusion, and she landed just where a good many others would land if all the people who announce insane theories and act insanely were adjudged insane.

Sensible Advice. It takes a machine to beat a machine. The history of political parties in this country has proven the truth of this statement, and the history of reform movements, successful and unsuccessful, is constantly adding confirmation. If the powerful machine which has been created by the organization and federation of trades unions contains some elements of grave danger—and few deny that it does—the trouble is not to be removed by vague denunciation and protest. One of two things must be done. Either the labor machine must be conquered from without by another machine capable of protecting the interests which it menaces, or it must be controlled from within by that element of its own constituency which is level-headed and trustworthy. In a recent speech, Charles S. Mellen, president of the New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad, gave the workingmen some sound advice about their unions. He said: "My advice to you who have families, who have a stake in the world, is to join your unions and make yourselves felt in them. Be always a force for conservatism. It seems to me as much in your interest to do this as that you shall attend the caucus and nominate good men for office and vote for them at the polls. Your apathy is the opportunity of the demagogue, the anarchist, the floater, who has nothing to lose." This advice presupposes that the union is not essentially an evil thing to be crushed, and also that it is not a self-regulating device which can be relied upon to run itself and right all industrial wrongs. It presupposes—and this is the chief value of the advice—that the union is an instrument which, like a political party, will be useful or dangerous according as it is controlled by wise and good men or by hot-headed, short-sighted and selfish men. It is too late to kill the organized labor movement, even if that were desirable, except by a gigantic counter-machine of organized capital, and if it were done the last state of the country would be worse than the first. But the movement must be controlled from the inside by the great mass of the workers who are neither socialists nor anarchists and upon faith in whose essential integrity and good sense the very existence of democratic government is conditioned.

"The Class Struggle." In striking contrast with the sane words above quoted on the labor question, and in illustration of the danger referred to, may be cited the utterance of one widely known labor leader on the situation in Colorado. There was enough to stir the indignation of even the most cool-headed men in the course of Gov. Peabody and Gen. Bell. Even the conservative Mr. Mitchell uttered some pretty strong words, and the general sentiment of unprejudiced observers is that he was not far wrong. But no provocation could be sufficient to justify such utterances as have come from one wing of the labor press. Perhaps there is scanty ground for expecting anything but violent counsel from Mr. Debs, who is to be the socialist candidate for the presidency in the coming campaign. His comments on the Colorado situation are extremely lurid. He is wise enough to warn the men against violence, but he does his best, after the manner of his kind, to stir up class hatred and line up the forces for battle. In an article which has been published in many socialist papers, Mr. Debs says:

"The Republican, Democratic, and Populist parties are all capitalist parties, all for wage slavery, all against the working class. Wake up and take your place in the class struggle. For the desecration of the flag your leader is in jail. What flag? The flag of the capitalist class—the flag that floats above the bullpens of Colorado. The wholesome truths he stamped upon its stripes are your shame and your masters' crime. Rally to the red standard of international socialism, the symbol of proletarian revolt, and the workers of Colorado and all the world shall yet be free."

One of the strong forces in American religious life is the Young Men's Christian Association.

Y. M. C. A. Jubilee.

The convention which has just met at Buffalo marks the fiftieth anniversary of organized religious work for young men on this continent. Sir George Williams, to whom is generally given the credit—though it is doubtful whether it entirely belongs to him—of being the founder of the original movement in England, is still living and some of the early workers in our own country are still in service. So that when we begin to compare the years of its service with the achievements it has won, we begin to realize that a recent statement of Dr. Cuthbert Hall is not far from the truth. He declared the Y. M. C. A. to be in better working condition than any other organization, and one that gets the maximum of results with the minimum of machinery. The same can hardly be said of the association's work in the motherland. Denominational and class distinctions have materially crippled the work in England. It has been run in a much narrower groove, and has been by no means so adaptable to the spirit of the times. While methods have changed in this country, the purpose of the association is the same. It aims to reach and control the body, mind and spirit of the young man, but to-day it is less distinctively evangelistic than formerly. It has realized that a certain amount of human fellowship is demanded by young life, hence the club element has become a prominent factor in its usefulness. The high appreciation which it has won may be seen in the attitude towards it of the builders of great business corporations and organizations like the railroads, institutions of learning, and our national army. It is the recognition of the very valuable work done by the institution for railroad men that has won for it the warm friendship of widely different interests. A recent order by the secretary of war, providing for the establishment of the association in every part of the United States army, was a merited tribute to the work of the association during the Cuban war. And the renaissance of a strong religious life in our colleges may be attributed very largely to the efforts of the Y. M. C. A. The development of the work among other classes of men, such as different labor organizations, is full of the promise of great results. The Y. M. C. A. and its fifty years of life is something that the churches ought to, and largely do, value.

Whatever fun may be made of organized charity as "a scientific method of giving people what they don't want," the fact remains that the increasing complexity of our social conditions, and the growing number and expertness of social parasites, simply compel sensible people to choose between being scientific in their charity and hardening their hearts against every charitable appeal. When fraud is reduced to a science, its detection and circumvention must also be reduced to a science. Moreover, apart from the question of fraudulent appeals for relief, the whole subject of the treatment of the delinquent, defective and dependent classes has become far too intricate to be treated in the old hap-hazard way. Along with a vast amount of almost criminally ineffective, though sometimes well-meant, work in the administration of charitable and penal institutions, there have been laid, during the past generation, the foundations for a really scientific treatment of these elements of the social machinery, so that it has come to pass that this work constitutes a genuine and distinct profession. In recognition of this fact, and of the further fact that preparation for this profession demands thorough training, Harvard university has made a new departure in establishing a "School for Social Workers." The purpose is to supply properly trained men for work in connection with charity organizations, asylums, prisons and reformatories. The work of the school will be both theoretical and practical. The institutions of Boston will furnish the necessary clinic. The inauguration of this course is a recognition of the dignity of this branch of work, and of the demands which it makes, and it ought to be an influence for greater effectiveness in organized social service.

The eventful week has at last happened, and Russia has come out of it badly. Only one disaster of consequence, as such things are counted in war, has befallen the Japanese, who lost one of their torpedo-boats while clearing Kerr bay of explosives. As against this, the Russians have to bewail the blocking of the harbor of Port Arthur, and the investment of that city, while Dalny and Fen-Wang-Cheng have fallen into the enemy's hands, and the czar's forces, under Kuropatkin, have retreated to Mukden. The situation has become so ominous for the Russians that one British journalist has had the daring to say that Russia is a great big humbug, meaning, of course, that she has revealed unsuspected weaknesses. But the end is not in sight. Mr. Henry Norman, a painstaking student of eastern problems, has advanced an interesting bit of speculation. Once pro-Russian, he now argues for the defeat of Russia. We ourselves have felt that Russia's defeat may mean a renaissance in that great empire. Mr. Norman observes that the triumph of Japan over Russia would mark the beginning of a new era in world affairs; that the prestige of the west as against the east would be broken. It would be the end of western domination against the east, but, asks Mr. Norman, would it make for the betterment of the human race as a whole? Not under present conditions, certainly. But we do not anticipate the rise of the yellow races to such power.

One of the most fruitful of educational works is the agricultural department of our colleges. The scientific study of the farm and its products promises a rich reward for our nation. Prof. P. G. Holden, of the Iowa agricultural college, has a scheme to make the soil of his state raise 25 per cent more corn on the same acreage as before. The following are the essentials of the plan:

To induce every farmer to break off and cast aside the small end of every ear of corn he intends to use for seed, because the kernels on the small end are imperfect, germinate poorly and produce poorly. To have every ear of corn intended for seed tested by a simple germinating process to show whether its kernels will grow. To have the corn planted so that it shall average 3 1/3 kernels to the hill. The railroads of the state have taken the matter under consideration to the extent of allowing the professor free transportation over the state on a special train, from the tail-end of which he lectures to the farmers on how to put this idea into practice. If such a plan could be successfully carried out it would add some 50,000,000 bushels to the state's annual corn crop, which would mean $17,000,000 additional wealth production for the state.

Brevities.

Journalists and Federated club women have besieged the World's Fair city for their annual conferences.

A young woman has discovered a new way to secure a license to wed a man under age, and without a guardian—adopt him and as his guardian give the necessary consent.

One of the most remarkable political struggles on record is taking place with the governorship of Illinois as the prize. Altogether, up to the time of this writing, the convention has balloted twenty-nine times without any material change, and no one can foretell who will be the nominee of the Republican party in that state.

A Year of Great Opportunities.

This is a great year when measured by its events and opportunities. The celebration of the Louisiana Purchase by the greatest World's Fair in history, in the heart of the western continent, is bringing, not to our shores alone, but to the interior of our country, representatives from all the nations of the earth. It is going to introduce the east to the west. Even the eastern portion of our own country has had very vague and inadequate conceptions of the mighty empire that stretches west of the Mississippi. These wise men of the East will come to our World's Fair, and when they see what the West is, and what it has accomplished, and its magnificent resources, they will declare, in the language of the Queen of Sheba, that "the half has not been told."

It is a great opportunity for the Disciples of Christ. Beginning as our movement did in the middle west, and following the lines of migration westward rather than turning east, our strength is chiefly in the west and middle west, and we have been largely unknown in the eastern states. But the East is coming to the West this year in multiplied thousands—coming to the center, where we are strongest. It is the opportunity of a lifetime to utilize this great World's Fair for the dissemination of the principles of the reformation which we are pleading. As an American movement, having its origin and its largest development within the United States, it is altogether proper that this young, vigorous and aggressive reformation should have a building of its own at the World's Fair, as one of the products of our western Christian civilization. The great mass of our people have not opened their eyes as yet to the meaning and magnitude of this opportunity.

It is altogether fitting, too, that we should hold, this coming autumn, in the World's Fair city, a great world's convention of Disciples, one that will give to the public some conception of our strength, our enthusiasm, and of our great, world-wide purposes. Already the general committee having in charge the preparation for this convention has planned for the largest gathering of our membership which has ever convened in one place in our history. We have been fortunate in securing the largest and most commodious hall in the city for our purposes. All the signs point to the most remarkable gathering of that religious body whose dominant note is the unity of a divided Christendom.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will spare no pains to make this convention comport, in magnitude and importance, with the great World's Fair of which it will be, in an important sense, a part. Our issue for June 1 will be a convention number, of which a very large edition will be printed, containing cuts of the Exposition building in which we are to meet, our World's Fair pavilion, Festival Hall, where we may hold a session of the convention on our "day" at the World's Fair, other important buildings and personages, a report from the chairman of our general committee as to the plans for the coming convention, words from our secretaries, and much other valuable information relating to the convention. Those who desire to use a number of extra copies of this special number should advise us at once.

Yes, this is a year of great opportunities. The Saviour who commended the children of this world for their wisdom in furthering their interests, will not hold us guiltless, nor give us his approval, if we do not rise to the demands of these great opportunities, and use them for His glory and the good of mankind. If we can put something of the enterprise and liberality which mark the great exhibits of the business firms of the country at the World's Fair into our religious plans, we may expect a larger measure of the divine blessing upon our work than even that which has crowned our labors in the past. Money, time and great labor are being freely expended by states, foreign countries and private firms to make creditable exhibits at the World's Fair. Shall we be less enterprising in behalf of the holy cause committed to our hands?

A Growing Danger.

We published last week extracts of an appeal from an interchurch conference on the subject of marriage and divorce, recently held in the east, which is worthy of the careful attention of our readers. No one who has studied the statistics of divorce, or who is even a reader of our daily papers, can fail to be impressed with the fact that the sanctity of marriage and of the home is being undermined, and that divorces for trifling causes are on the increase. This is an evil that strikes at the very foundations of society and of social order. It is a menace to the church and to the state, for whatever endangers the home or weakens the bond of the family is at war with the best interests of society.

The committee issuing this appeal seems to us to be correct in locating the cause of the divorce evil in the low ideal of marriage which so widely prevails. It is right, too, in believing that there is no adequate remedy for this evil that does not include the reaching of the Christian conscience on the sanctity of marriage. It must begin in the home. As the address says, "Children must be taught it. Young men and young women must be made to feel it." How seldom this matter is made the subject of a serious conversation in the home circle!

It is not sufficiently understood and realized that marriage is ordained of God, and that the home or the family is a divine institution, older than the church or the state. The tendency has been to remove the divine sanction away from marriage and treat it as a matter of light importance. Young people often enter marriage without any thought of its sacredness and of the important place which marriage holds in the divine economy, and hence they have no adequate realization of its obligations and mutual responsibilities. Here must be the beginning of the reform that is needed. The pulpit, the press, the public school, the home, must co-operate in impressing upon the young the sanctity of marriage. It is distressing to anyone who has had any experience in life to observe what qualities in the young commend them most to those of the opposite sex as suitable partners for life. This argues a lack of proper training in the home.

Supplementing this instruction concerning marriage, there is needed wiser and more uniform legislation in the various states on this subject. This phase of the problem is not without its serious difficulties, and we may not hope that public sentiment has yet reached the point where human legislation will conform to the divine on this subject. Something can be done, however, in the way of legislation that will lessen the evil, but much more can be done, in our judgment, by the agencies we have already named, in imparting the necessary instruction to the young concerning the sanctity of marriage and the divine authority which underlies the family and the home.

For the sake of our sons and our daughters, for the sake of the generations that are to come after us, for the sake of the church and society, and in behalf of the future progress of mankind, let us lift our voices against the evils of divorce and against every influence or tendency that undermines the sanctity of marriage and interferes with the purity of our homes.

We notice that the Chicago Presbyterians, according to the daily papers, have had a good "old-fashioned revival" on a large scale in that city. Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman is directing the campaign, with a large number of able evangelists co-operating with him. It is said that more than 2,500 persons have been converted as a result of these evangelistic meetings. This work is conducted on broad lines, so that it has enlisted all the evangelistic churches of the city. That is about the only way we can make an impression upon our great cities—by concerted action and by carrying on many meetings in different places at the same time, under the direction of able evangelists. The gospel is the only power that can save our cities from political corruption and social impurity. The problem is to bring that gospel to the people, in such way that they will accept it, and apply its principles to existing conditions and needs.

The War in the East.

The progress of the war in the east excites the deepest interest in this country. The almost universal sympathy of the American people with Japan in this struggle is a most remarkable fact. The papers announce the arrival in this country of a Russian prince, not of royal blood but of a noble family, who is editor of one of the leading papers in Russia, who has come to find out the causes of this national feeling of sympathy with Japan as against Russia in the struggle for pre-eminence in the east. Russians never fail to call our attention to the fact of their sympathy with us at a critical time in our past history and their friendly relations with us in the past, and Americans gladly acknowledge these facts and are not likely to forget them. But in spite of them, Americans, with rare exceptions, sympathize with the Japanese.

We agree with the editor of the Arena that this feeling is not to be accounted for wholly by the fact that Russia robbed Japan of the fruit of her war with China; that she failed to evacuate Manchuria as promised; that the success of Japan promises better trade relations in the Orient; nor by the treaty between Japan and England; nor by the distrust of the sincerity of Russia's pretensions and promises, based on her past history. The causes for the phenomenon we have mentioned lie deeper than any of these things. The Arena is right in finding the true cause of our sympathy with Japan in the fact that the United States and Russia stand for diametrically opposing ideas of government. "The Declaration of Independence," says the Arena, "casts the gauntlet at the feet of every despotic and class-ruled land in Christendom. The new republic promulgated principles fatal to monarchical and aristocratic rule. It declared the right of the people to govern themselves; the right to freedom of thought, of speech and of press. In the place of the union of church and state it demanded absolute liberty in religious thought and practice, and it insisted upon popular and universal education. Against every one of these great fundamental demands Russia stood and stands in deadly antagonism."

On the contrary, Japan, from the time, in February, 1854, when Commodore Perry sailed into Yeddo Bay, until the present time, has been making strides in all that has made our western civilization superior to that of the east. In education, in government, in religion, and in the art of war, she has imbibed lessons from the foremost nations of the world, and has shown herself to be a progressive power, willing to accept the best from whatever source it comes. Her history is the most remarkable of that of any nation in modern times. When we add to this that she sought to avoid war with Russia by offering honorable terms of settlement, it is not strange that she commands the sympathy of the great mass of the American people.

Whatever may be said against war—and scarcely too much can be said against it—it often removes obstacles to the progress of civilization which ought to have been removed by less violent measures. One of the results of this war in the east is likely to be the modification of Russia's autocracy; the adoption of some form of constitutional government; increased recognition of the rights of the people, and the growth of democracy. The fact that her defeat will probably serve this purpose better than her victory in the present conflict is another reason why the American people wish for the success of Japan.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Of course, the Easy Chair has been looking around a little in the World's Fair. One of the most vivid impressions which it creates on the average mind is the utter inability of any one person to take it all in. What a university it is, setting forth the history, achievements and progress of mankind, if one only had time to take the full course! But that is impossible. One must be elective, and choose that which promises the greatest profit to him. Of course, one wants to get, first of all, a general impression of what is there. A ride around the grounds on the intramural railway, with an official guide-book in hand, will give a general idea of the lay of the ground and the location of the chief points of interest. Then a view north, from the front of Festival Hall, taking in the Cascades and the lagoons immediately in front of you, the great buildings, the St. Louis Plaza, bounded on the north by the Pike and Tyrolean Alps, presents a picture that is likely to live forever in the memory. Then, when one has glanced briefly through all the main buildings, to get a general idea of their contents, and has taken a stroll down the Pike to see what sort of amusements is offered, he is ready to begin the serious work of study in his own special department.

There are shows within the show, as there are wheels within the wheel. One of the most interesting of these is the Jerusalem exhibit, occupying eleven acres of ground, surrounded by a wall representing the ancient wall of Jerusalem, and reproducing exactly a part of the ancient city of David. Entering the grounds by the east gate, we were greeted at once with the noisy clamor of the native shop-keepers desiring to sell their souvenirs, the camel-drivers soliciting us to take a ride, with hundreds of the native Syrian population, illustrating their customs and their costumes, their buildings, their methods of trade, their religion, etc. There are the ancient walls and towers, the hotels, the narrow streets, the camels, the Mosque of Omar, the Tower of Antonia, the Via Dolorosa, and many names and scenes that call up the sacred memories associated with the city. When one has passed along its narrow streets, looked at the quaint houses and shops, heard the strange kinds of musical instruments, noticed the costumes of the people, he leaves the place feeling that he knows more of Oriental life and of the ancient city of the great king than he did before entering. The panoramic view of the Mount of Olives with its olive trees crowning the heights, and the clearly-marked roads leading up and down its sides, with the brook of Kedron and the Garden of Gethsemane at the base, especially recalls the incident in our Lord's life when he wept over the wicked city. It is time and money well spent when you are visiting the Fair to take in the Jerusalem exhibit.

One finds himself surprised, frequently, as he passes through the foreign exhibits, to notice what expense and pains the foreign countries have been at in making a display of their progress in every line of human achievement, out here in the interior of this great western Republic. Evidently these nations feel that it is worth their while to show the New World what they have done and are doing, and what place they hold in the advancing column of the world's civilization. Little Japan finds time and money, while carrying on successfully a great war, to present one of the most wonderful exhibits to be found at the Fair. The rest of the civilized world will be astonished to know what she is doing and what she has already achieved within the short period since she has awakened from her slumber, and entered upon a new era of her history. But the same thing is true, in a less degree, perhaps, of all other nations. It is a cure for national bigotry, exclusiveness and vanity, to see what all the nations of the earth are contributing to the progress and well-being of mankind. One is made to realize more than ever the truth of the saying, that "the sky is the roof of but one family," and that all the nations of the earth have their place and mission in that family.

If one is a lover of art he might easily spend all the time he can spare in the Gallery of Fine Arts. There the nations have sent the best productions of their ablest artists. Acres of walls are lined with speaking canvases. What sermons some of these pictures preach! Their approach to the heart is through what Bunyan would call "eye-gate." But they are none the less effectual on that account. That they accomplish their mission is evidenced by the tone and manner of the people who crowd these halls. There is no loud talking, laughing or jesting; but an air of quiet thoughtful-ness, and even reverence, marks the behavior of the people. Yonder is a great historic picture that recalls some stirring event of the past. There is a beautiful, quiet landscape, filled with the beauty and repose of the summer evening, and breathing the air of restfulness. Here is a little canvas that contains a little touch of life that makes the whole world kin. All nations have their artists and their art, and all of them seek to put on canvas their truest and noblest conceptions. Here, again, one is made to feel that no nation has a monopoly of the true, the beautiful and the good, but that everywhere men are struggling for the highest ideals, and seeking to express them in literature and in art, as well as in life.

Notes and Comments.

We give our most hearty endorsement to the following paragraph from the Christian Companion. No doubt "meddling with things that it is not competent to deal with," is one of the besetting sins of the pulpit, both modern and medieval:

If the modern pulpit would abandon all fads, quit meddling with things that it is not competent to deal with, and which it has no right to attempt to handle, and give its attention and energy to preaching the simple gospel of the Son of God, determining to know nothing among the people but Jesus Christ and Him crucified, the result might be different. Men need rest from the cares and distractions of business, and the worries of political and social life, and there is no better place on earth to seek such rest than in "the place of devotion, the house of the Lord." They go there, or should do so, for spiritual refreshment to be obtained in a season of communion with God.

There is danger that some preachers and some religious journals may, with the best intentions, plant seeds of skepticism by publishing statements of eminent men calling in question prominent New Testament doctrines, without making adequate reply. It is easy to raise an objection in a paragraph which it might take a small volume to satisfactorily answer. Thousands of people who have no ability to investigate these questions would never know of these doubts if they did not read them in religious journals or hear them from the pulpit. It is safer to meet these questions as they arise, and then through some medium that will reach the class of people who are troubled with such questions, without disturbing those who have never heard of them.

Recent evidence has come to light showing that there is a concerted effort being made by the worst element of our city to secure young women from different parts of the United States to come to St. Louis, ostensibly for securing employment in some business at good wages, but really for immoral purposes. The Christian people of this city and of the country have been aroused by the recent arrest of a woman, the wife of a saloon keeper in this city, who had succeeded in bringing ten young women from Germany on the false pretence of furnishing honorable employment for them, when the evidence in the case showed that they were secured and brought here by the immoral element of our city for illegitimate purposes. No language can describe the baseness of such efforts, and scarcely any punishment can be too severe for such offenders against law and against humanity. It is the duty of everyone to do what he can to frustrate the wicked plans of these base plotters against the purity of womanhood.

The success of Mr. Folk in obtaining a sufficient number of instructed delegates in the state of Missouri to insure his nomination for governor, on a moral issue between boodling and honesty in politics, is of course what might have been expected of the honest people of the state. And yet there are quite a number of prominent politicians who are no doubt greatly surprised and disappointed that the people of Missouri could be influenced by moral motives and considerations of political decency and purity, to turn away from their former leaders and cast their votes for one who stands for political reform. These men have no confidence in the potency of moral forces. They have obscured moral issues so long by their political trickery, that they did not believe it possible that the people could be influenced by such considerations. It is a most wholesome lesson that has been taught these would-be leaders, by the people, and our only word of admonition to the reform element now in the ascendancy is, make thorough work of it. Make no compromise with evil; nominate a clean ticket from top to bottom. In this policy you can rely upon the support of the honest people of the state, thousands of whom will vote for it without regard to party politics.

A correspondent in one of our contemporaries criticises the course of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in its treatment of the case of Brother Ames, and says:

Has the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST studied carefully the spirit of the Master in dealing with those who called his divinity and his claims to authority in question? I think not. He called his own people who rejected his claims, "hypocrites," "liars," "children of the devil," "whited sepulchres," "reprobates," and told them plainly that they had made void the commandments of God by their traditions.

Strangely enough our well-meaning critic seems to have overlooked the fact that the stern words of rebuke which he quotes from our Master were applied to the most orthodox people of his time—those who held strenuously to all the forms of religion, but who had lost its spirit, and who, while claiming to be exceedingly "sound in faith," were but "a sounding brass and clanging cymbal." Never did our Lord apply such terms to those who were seeking to be true to their own consciences, and to all the truth which He was seeking to reveal to them, even though their faith were imperfect. It was not the man of small faith who was seeking to be true to that faith, which he denounced, but men who claimed the largest faith and the longest creed, but whose lives were condemned by their professions.

We think our friendly critic betrays some confusion of thought when he makes the idea of building on the personality of Christ identical with that of building on Christ personally. We did not say that the church is not founded on the Master's personality; we said that it is not built on Him personally. A writer can put his personality into an instrument of writing, and seal it up in an envelope, but he cannot do that of himself personally.—Christian Companion.

If it were only a matter of distinguishing between the northwest and the northeast corner of a hair, the able editor of the Christian Companion might succeed, but he will hardly be able to make clear the difference between "building the church on the personality of Christ" and "building it on Christ personally." If our brother will pardon the suggestion, we think his idea of personality has gotten tangled with corporeity. The body is no essential part of personality. To become disembodied is not to become de-personalized. It is but a small part of one's personality which he can put "into an instrument of writing, and seal it up in an envelope." One cannot put his whole character into "an instrument of writing." If that had been possible, the incarnation would not have been the divine necessity that it was. "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." It is not the truth about Christ, but the Christ Himself, with all His divine, personal potentiality, that is the object of our faith and the foundation of the church. If our brother agrees to this we will not quarrel about the difference between building on Christ personally and building on his personality. We want to feel that we are building, not simply on a proposition, but on a divine Person, to whom we can pray, on whom we can lean, and in whose Spirit we can share.

A Yale professor gives statistics to prove that a large proportion of suicides are educated persons. "In much wisdom is much grief," said Koheleth, and woe to him who increases the grief born of worldly wisdom without also by faith tightening his grasp on things eternal and increasing the joys which true wisdom brings.

The "fiftieth anniversary of the promulgation of the dogma of the immaculate conception," has led the new Pope to exhibit a queer kind of logic. "Who can doubt it?" is his way of proving it.

The Big Irish Bog

By William Durban

Poor old Ireland! One of my friends who has traveled more than any man I know, was comparing notes with me about many countries that he and I have both visited. We spoke of the beauties of this and that lovely region, and at length my friend exclaimed, "Well, poor old Ireland beats them all." He was thinking of the Thousand Isles in the lakes and loughs of Connemara; of the Giant's Causeway; of the exquisite scenes in Wexford; of the views along the banks of the Shannon; of the Killarney paradise; and I could not help agreeing with his dictum that in no country on earth are so many sweet prospects to be seen within so small an area. But it is a blighted Eden. The curse of a gloomy priestcraft lies sullenly over that natural enchantment. St. Patrick made Ireland a gospel land and it became the missionary repository for all western and northern Europe. Ireland was evangelical before England, Scotland, or Wales had cast off the darkness of the pagan night. But popery came in and from the western isle has never departed. There the Reformation failed. Ireland has had its wrongs, and clamors for home rule as the remedy. But the greatest of her wrongs is the one which she persistently cherishes by hugging that Rome rule which would use home rule simply to rivet more firmly on the nation the shackles of sacerdotalism.

A Romanist Attacking Rome.

I am reading a book which I wish every one of my American friends could see. Were I a millionaire, I would send a copy to each preacher in our brotherhood throughout the states of "Rome in Ireland," by Michael J. F. McCarthy, of Trinity college, Dublin, an Irish barrister-at-law, who is himself a consistent Roman Catholic, so that his attack on Rome is all the more effective. This powerful writer first made a great sensation by his book entitled "Five Years in Ireland," which was followed up by one on "Priests and People in Ireland." He is a well known lecturer, and his speeches and books are alike mortally dreaded by the priests, for they feel that this expert, being of their own faith, speaks with authority that can never be impugned. I will mention a proof of his power to affect the situation. In March, 1901, an influential deputation waited on Lord Cadogan at Dublin castle to request the government to take up the question of university education in Ireland, with the ultimate view of providing a Roman Catholic university which would satisfy the demands of the bishops and priests. At that date there was not a cloud on the horizon of priestcraft. The Irish Protestants were apparently prepared to surrender to the arrogant pretensions of the Roman-Irish priests in everything. And it even seemed as if the questionable methods of those priests, both in controversy and in religion, were being imitated by a certain section of the Church of Ireland clergy, and by a small section of the Presbyterian, Methodist, and other ministers of religion.

Disappointed Popish Priests.

At that crisis, at the beginning of the new century, the Roman priests' party seemed to be the winning religious party in Ireland. Governments, public bodies, and individuals seemed to be willing to accept the pronouncements of the Roman Catholic hierarchy and priesthood as the decisions of a final court of appeal. Never was public spirit at a lower ebb. Lord Cadogan promised great things to the deputation. He would appoint a commission at once; it should commence its deliberations without delay; it should sit for only a brief period and present its report quickly; and legislation should immediately follow the report. So that it seemed that the most ardent ambitions of the priesthood were about to be at last realized in the endowment of a rich Roman Catholic university completely under sacerdotal control.

No Popish University.

Within one week after the delivery of Lord Cadogan's reply to the deputation, Mr. McCarthy happened to publish "Five Years in Ireland." That book fell on the priests "like a bolt from the blue." One of its most overt results has been that not one of the promises of Lord Cadogan to the deputation has been fulfilled. Once more in history the book of a high-spirited and courageous expert and reformer has defeated a whole hierarchy. Let writers take courage from that fact. Let reformers and iconoclasts bear in mind that a single individual may prove to be a host in himself. Many a simple individual may, if he will, send forth in his own capacity a document which will be more potent than any papal encyclical. The condition of success is that the writer must be well posted in every part of his subject. One of Mr. McCarthy's objects in beginning to write was to defeat the scheme for the endowment of a Roman Catholic university under priests' management. Bad as may be the influence of the priest in the primary and secondary education of the country, his domination would be infinitely worse in the realm of state-subsidized university education. Now, it may be remembered that it was on this same burning question of a Roman Catholic university for Ireland, to be supported by state funds, that Mr. Gladstone's second and strongest administration was wrecked. The great statesman never recovered the full power that he wielded up to that time, and when during his third administration he ventured on the home rule and land bill scheme, he did so with forces previously weakened through his well-meant but mistaken policy in meddling with this problem. His idea was that, the Irish being Romanists by an overwhelming majority, they had a right to inaugurate a university system after the national mind. The British people, more especially the Scotch and Welsh, could not see the force of this theory, for they perceived the Roman spectre behind the program. But I believe that but for the fortunate appearance of Mr. McCarthy on the scene as a lecturer and writer who could not be contradicted, the present Tory government would have obeyed the dictation of the Irish priests. As it is they have elected rather to become tools in the hands of the English high church clergy and to smash the popular board school system. Hence the uproar now going on and the passive resistance squall which will yet wreck this wickedly unscrupulous Tory administration.

A Religious Anomaly.

A singular state of things prevails in Ireland to-day. The Irish priesthood has become the wealthiest and most prosperous in the world, while the Irish Catholic laity remain the least progressive, the most timid, down-hearted and despondent white race in the world. Many of the pages of this wonderfully realistic book are full of pathos. The writer says that no people in the world are more to be pitied than the poor Catholic Irish; no people in the world are more neglected by their ministers of religion; no people are more lovable, more pliant, or more teachable. This fearless Roman Catholic author declares that it is the religious hatred perpetuated by the constant preaching of the disingenuous bishops and priests of Ireland which causes all the bitterness that sours existence for the Catholic Irish in their own land. Here is the shameless style in which Bishop O'Dwyer, exulting openly in the handiwork of his order during the past fifty-five years, describes the condition to which his own class has reduced the Catholic young men of Ireland: "I will simply say this in general, that nine-tenths of them are lost, and that they are now going to swell the ranks of the declasses without an education that is worth a button to them for any useful purpose." Mr. McCarthy, commenting on this effusion, asks what would an O'Dwyer university make these young men useful for? Here is an extract in shape of an advertisement in the Dublin Evening Telegraph of April 13, last year, which throws a vivid light on the relations of the Romish hierarchy in Ireland and the

By F. D. Power

As goes the Dome, so Washington; as Washington, so America; as America, the world. The absence of congress always makes things dull under the Dome. Washington at once takes on a summer aspect. We amuse ourselves a good deal over the antics of our solons while here, but miss them when away, and feel like the prince of Denmark in that address to the skull of the king's jester: "Alas poor Yorick! I knew him well, Horatio; a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy. . . . Where be your gibes now? your gambols? your songs? your flashes of merriment that were wont to set the table on a roar? Not one now to mock your grinning?" The stage has other players. The government at Washington still lives. The most picturesque feature of our national life, however, is removed when the congress closes. There is for example the congressional oratory. Can anything quite equal it? You have listened to members of the sophomore class at college, or to young preachers in their maiden efforts, but one hears on the floor of the house or senate often curling and sky-scraping and eagle-screaming that would put all these to everlasting shame. Think of a man descanting on the beauties of the Pearl of the Antilles, and speaking of so prosaic a thing as an island as "one long, harmonious, brilliant, indescribable mental melody"! Yet this is the climax of an effusion by Sulzer, an orator of Tammany Hall. It is altogether too mellifluous and utterly utter to be entombed forever in the pages of the Congressional Record. After ascending to "her skies more beautiful than those of Italy," and to "her days an everlasting summer's dream," and lots of other things, Mr. Sulzer bursts into this entrancing paean, out-Beveridging Beveridge:

"Cuba is the land of perpetual flowers, of stately royal palms, the Bohemia of the dreamer, generous in tropical fruits, the home of the painter and the poet, the paradise of the islands of the sea—one long, harmonious, brilliant, indescribable mental melody." There you have it. How Cuba could be a "mental melody" Mrs. Eddy could possibly tell us. When a student at Bethany a sophomore friend brought an elaborate anthology which he called a speech and asked me to give him a name for it. I said to him, "Call it Simulacra Præterita, Visions of the Night, the Jimjams—almost anything." The first seemed to strike him, and under that title he actually delivered it before the faculty and students. It was an "indescribable mental melody," but our congressmen can equal him.

There is congressional poetry. It is interesting to notice how many of our statesmen use the same poetical selections. It is when eulogizing their dead colleagues that they fairly revel in verse.

In the memorial services over Representatives Foerderer and Burk, Mr. Moon drops into a verse beginning with "Whom the gods love die young." Mr. Bates quotes the lines from Hamlet. Mr. McCreary uses hymn book and Bible, and several of the poets, one of his selections being:

Safe home into port, rent cordage, shattered deck,
Torn sails, provisions short, and only not a wreck:
But, oh, the joy upon the shore, to tell of voyage ended, perils o'er.

Mr. Fordney, the champion raconteur of the house, uses this:

I live for those who love me,
For those who know me true;
For the God who dwells above me,
And the good that I can do.

Mr. Sibley, who followed him, gives one selection occupying half a column. Mr. Padgett quoted:

Our lives are songs: God writes the words;
But we set them to music at pleasure;
And the song grows sad or sweet or glad
As we choose to fashion the measure.

The Hanna eulogies were decorated with poems from all sorts of sources. Mr. Tawney remarked that the senator's life was not an ideal one, but—

Iron dug from central gloom
And heated hot with burning fears,
And dipped in baths of hissing tears,
And battled with the shock of doom,
To shape and use.

Mr. Lovering employed this quotation:

Was he your friend? Then well you knew
His friendship was unfeignedly true;
And no reservation mocked the relation.

Senator Scott began his funeral discourse with:

To live in hearts we leave behind
Is not to die.

Senator Blackburn, a man of fine fancy, brought his panegyric of the Ohioan to a close with the couplet:

When it is given us to choose the time, if we choose aright,
'Tis best to die, our honor at its height.

Senator Elkins dropped into verse at least half a dozen times, one of his choice bits being:

Death is the chilliness that precedes the dawn;
We shudder for a moment, then awake
In the bright sunshine of the other life.

Senator Perkins started out with the well worn sentiment:

Friend after friend departs;
Who has not lost a friend?
There is no union here of hearts
That finds not here an end.

Senator Daniel, referring to Mr. Hanna's advanced age at which he entered public life, aptly used:

Chaucer, at Woodstock with the nightingales,
At sixty wrote the Canterbury tales, concluding the quotation with:

These are indeed exceptions; but they show
How far the gulf stream of our youth may flow
Into arctic regions of our lives,
Where little else but life itself survives.

Of course some of the eulogists worked in: "His life was gentle." That is worked so much overtime that it is remarkable that Shakespeare or Bacon or whoever wrote it does not rise up and rebel. The trouble is our friends under the Dome do not consult as to the volumes of choice selections from which they draw their inspiration. Sometimes we find a new sentiment on the mortuary pages of the Record as when Mr. Underwood in his eulogy on Representative Thompson quotes:

A darkening sky and a whitening sea
And a wind in the palm trees tall,
Soon or late comes a call for me,
Down from the mountain or up from the sea:
There let me lie where I fall.

And Mr. Smith, of Iowa, gives this:

Though with bowed and breaking hearts,
With sable garb and silent tread,
We bear his senseless dust to rest—
We know he is not dead.

The southern members are prolific in poetry on these occasions. Here is one from Mr. Webb, of North Carolina. In speaking of Mr. Skiles, of Ohio, he recites these "comforting lines written by the sweet singer Whittier":

I long for household voices gone:
For vanished smiles I long;
But God hath led my dear ones on,
And he can do no wrong.

These addresses are very formal and funereal, and most of the members take occasion to absent themselves from the capitol when they occur. The preacher at such a time has been known to adopt an unusual tone of voice, but the congressman outdoes him. Sometimes there is a eulogy of great beauty. I remember hearing John J. Ingalls on Ben Hill in the United States senate. It was a perfect gem, but it was thorough agnosticism. Some years later, when president of the senate, Mr. Ingalls made a similar speech over Byrnes, of Missouri. It was full of Christian hope. I wrote an article for some paper entitled "Eschatology in the Senate," and contrasted the two speeches in praise of the senator's growth in grace and knowledge. Someone sent Mr. Ingalls a marked copy of the paper, and I soon received an autograph letter thanking me for my "very obliging comments," etc.

On the whole the people that gather from time to time under the Dome are very much like other people.

Often their fellow citizens are a queer folk as well. One of the dear people, for example, recently wrote as follows:

Dear Mister Kongresman: Sum time ago i writ yu, asking if there were anything the government cud do to make a fiten wife behave herself. I ain't herd frum yu and things is no better.

Will yu plesse let me no if you kin git me one of them poison snakes frum Afrika at the Cultural Department. I hev allers voted fur yu and this is mitey littel to ask, specially wen a man's wife is allers peckin him.

A Missionary Tour

An Interview with
G. L. WHARTON

The first missionary your "special commissioner" ever met was Dr. Holck. Very vividly do I recall from the experiences of my early boyhood the dedication of the missionary to Denmark. Since that time I have met a great many heroes of the foreign field—most of the missionaries of the F. C. M. S. and many of the great standard-bearers of other societies, like John G. Paton, Mackay, of Uganda, Timothy Richard, Thomas J. Comber and James Chalmers. Of the many men devoted to carrying the gospel to the heathen whom I have met with and heard speak I believe none has impressed me with a deeper conviction of his lovable character and his eminent qualifications for his chosen work than G. L. Wharton. Brother Wharton was born in Monroe Co., Ind., in 1847. Until the age of 21 he lived on a farm, but finally graduated at Bethany college.

Brother Wharton has just concluded a missionary tour of a portion of the west and southwest, and I took advantage of his passing through the World's Fair city to ask him, for the benefit of CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST readers, a few questions about his work.

"Will you give me, in brief, your points of stoppage?" I began.

"I left Hiram college on the 21st of March. I attended the Disciples of Christ congress in Chicago, and from there I went to Jacksonville and Quincy, Ill., Hannibal, Kirksville, Mexico, Fulton, Chillicothe, Mound City, Columbia, Marshall, Nevada, Joplin and Carthage, Mo., Addison, Topeka, Fort Scott and Parsons, Kan. In Oklahoma, I went to Oklahoma City and Norman, where the preachers' state institute was held. In Texas, I was at Bonham, Dallas, Waco (at the Christian university), Gainesville, Weatherford, Fort Worth and Taylor."

"What was your general impression of the feeling in all these places as regards missionary work?"

"I feel very much encouraged at the outlook. There is a desire for information—such a desire as any one who had the information could wish. There is a feeling in the churches and among the preachers that if you have anything to say on missions, they are ready and want to hear it. I could not go to anything like the places where they wanted me to go. They said, 'If you will only go out in the country where they never saw a missionary, we will give you thousands to listen to you.' There is an anxiety to hear such as I have never seen before. They are willing to do, too, and are coming up very nicely. I am traveling somewhat in the interest of the Bible college of India, and of the $25,000 we expect to begin with, we have over $15,000 promised and nearly all paid. The younger ministers of our people are just as hopeful as can be. They are to the front."

"You find there is more missionary spirit among the young men than among the older ones?"

"The old men have the spirit, but do not know how to do things. They seem to have formed habits of life and of church work that are not so effective in securing results."

"And the young men?"

"The young men get around and hustle, and say, 'This thing has to be done, and if some of the plans we have been working on do not do it, we must get hold of something else.' This makes the outlook so encouraging."

"You find a difference between the younger men, for instance, those who have been to college and those who have not?"

"The experience of Bro. McLean and myself has been that every college man is up to the front; we don't have to tell him to get interested in missions, to take an offering; he is ready. Our college men are the hope of the church. That is why I am so much interested in our Bible colleges here and everywhere. We cannot go faster than our preachers go, and the preachers are not going to go any faster than they are educated to go."

"How was it when you were in college?"

"Formerly when we were in college we heard nothing of missions. I passed through Bethany, and I never heard a sermon on missions. Now in every one of our colleges there is a mission study class, and I think in every one of our colleges there are student-volunteers, who are meeting in class, and studying and preparing to go out when the time comes. At Waco I talked to the university student volunteer band, there being thirty or forty present, seeking information, and preparing to go. That is an encouraging feature, and then our college presidents, I think, without a single exception, are missionary men."

"Do you find amongst these other men, who are not college men, opposition—or, perhaps, indifference is the better term?"

"There is no opposition; there is a good deal of lukewarmness and indifference among older ministers—with quite a number of splendid exceptions. But, as a rule, the older ministers have not had the training, and I would not feel like condemning them. They were brought up under an older system of teaching than we have now, and they have to be pretty live old men to change and keep up with the time. That is the explanation of a few of our older preachers being soured on the churches and brethren generally. They stopped studying."

"What has been your most effective method of work on this trip?"

"The most useful thing I have done on my trip—the most good I have done, I am sure—hasn't been the speeches, but it has been putting in the missionary libraries. I have not counted up yet how many libraries of sixteen volumes each I have put into the churches where I have gone, and I can't tell you how many missionary maps of the world, fourteen feet by seven, giving two hemispheres and showing the Mohammedan, Roman Catholic, Greek, Protestant and heathen world. I have sold one of those in nearly every church. A man can't preach on missions without a map any more than he can sell real estate without one."

"What interest did you find in general Christian effort?"

"The work, generally speaking, is exceedingly interesting. The secretary of our mission work in Oklahoma told me yesterday afternoon that since last October twenty-eight churches have been organized in the territory of Oklahoma, and thirty new houses have been built. All we have to do now is to go out in a little town, pick out the brethren that are there, and say, 'Are you ready for a church?' Find a hall or a place to meet and organize, the money will be subscribed, and in a few weeks they will have a house up. All through Texas we have such good churches. I went into so many fine churches there, good buildings, good houses, and with good pipe organs."

"You do not find the west so wild as one who lived in India so long would expect?"

"They are cultured and educated people where I have been. As cultured audiences as I have met anywhere I have met in Texas. They are fine people. We have some of our best preachers out there."

"Do you find them a reading people?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you find our papers everywhere you went?"

"Yes. There was one place—I don't remember where—where one of the members asked me if he could make the announcement, and stated they were going to have a club of fifty for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST; and the minister got up and seconded the resolution. McLean made this statement out there, and he makes it in nearly every meeting: 'You can gauge our people's condition largely by the number of papers they take. The missionary churches will take our missionary papers. It is true everywhere I go. I can tell pretty well what to depend on from the church by finding out what religious papers they take. If we could get every family in our churches to take some religious paper, I am sure that our offerings for missions would be doubled in one year.'"

The Story of Josefa. By E. A. Layton, M. D.

How God Used a Congolese Cripple.

This apostle of the Congo Christian church came "as a root out of a dry ground." His biography is brief. The known facts of his former life are few. He is perhaps 30 years old now. But after the first few moons, even the Congolese mother forgets the age of the child. Born even before the light of discovery had penetrated darkest Africa, he made his home where the Congo crosses the equator in its southern course. At his baptism, he was re-named Joseph, with whom, the missionary thought, he had some experiences in common. In the Bantu tongue, every word must end with a vowel, and as the language has been reduced to writing on a phonetic basis, "Joseph" becomes "Josefa."

Josefa has had a hard life, struggling heroically against sin and sickness and suffering. As a child, he may have seen a few happy hours. Congo children laugh, play curious games, try to thrive on the bitter cassava bread with an occasional piece of putrid meat or smoked fish, and sleep on the mud floor of the low, thatched hut. They differ from our own children chiefly in having a heathen heritage. Early they are made heathen at heart by the environment—and who is responsible for that?

Josefa was a slave. Ethiopia was ever enslaved or enslaving. The over-sea slave trade was the "open sore of the world"; domestic slavery remains "the heart-disease of Africa." Girls are soon sold for wives or slaves—the same thing. A master, fearing a man-slave, puts him out of the way. This human traffic is largely on credit; an African is not true to tradition, unless in debt. These debts lead to frequent interchange of marketable goods—wives and slaves. In some such way, Josefa, as a child, was carried into captivity by the Bankundo, a strange tribe and tongue. Seen by an English missionary, he was set free from slavery and at that mission heard the good news and found salvation from sin.

In Congoland, a day brings great change. On the morrow the mission where Josefa came, was demoralized; forces and fruits alike were scattered. When, in course of time, Bolengi was transferred from the A. B. M. U. to the F. C. M. S., the "mission" consisted, ostensibly, of buildings and grounds. But confined in the "boys' house" was a helpless and hopeless cripple who was destined to be the most important factor in the establishment of a native church. Again one of God's treasures was hidden beneath a rough exterior.

Following his conversion, Josefa was tried in the fire of affliction. A terrible disease (not described in the books) attacked flesh and bone. Violently contracting muscles broke the diseased bones and the body was covered with boils and ulcers. He suffered excruciating pain. Bent and broken, his body is beyond repair, and he remains as uncomely as a leper.

Yet Josefa did not curse God and die. Through long years, no comforter was found among his own people, for he was the only one who knew and trusted God. The medical missionary ministered to him; the Unseen Comforter was there. The Congo native dies easily; almost all deaths are premature and preventable. As one lies down to sleep, so it seems to me, the ordinary native, becoming sick or believing himself bewitched, lies down without hope and soon falls into the sleep of death! With Josefa it was the triumph of the spiritual over the material—he had some object in living. Through it all his faith remained firm, his hopes bright, enduring with fortitude.

Sitting at the door of his little room where he had been imprisoned for years, I first saw Josefa about three years ago. His head rested upon his knee and at that time he had limited motion in his left arm and the first two toes of the left foot. Getting better acquainted it was found that he was self-supporting! He was seen weaving fish-nets, holding the cord between teeth and toes and using the left hand. He made the rope of bark or raffia-leaves. Holding a piece of hoop-iron between his toes, he filed out a saw and made a handle for it. The Bantu have no name for "toes," all the twenty digits are fingers and are used as such. Then he made deck-chairs and small benches and chicken-coops. True to negro instinct he kept fowls and had eggs and chickens for sale. With his nets or bamboo traps he sent someone fishing and they divided the "spoils." His den was the only place in Nkundo where valuables might be stored; of course he couldn't run away. Thus he did a banking business with profit. He was the one person who could be relied upon to tell the truth and whose word was never disputed. Natives are indolent and illiterate; Josefa is industrious and learned from the school-boys how to read and write. Natives are profligate and poor; Josefa is a Christian and always seems to have "cash on hand."

Living in this fashion Josefa found the heathen at his very door. Twenty-five or thirty young Bankundo occupied the berths of that rude dormitory. At sun-down they came from class-room, work-shop and field to prepare the single and simple meal of the day. Sitting around the camp fires they rehearsed the events of the day and Josefa, the stay-at-home, would hear an accurate account of all the white missionary had said and done. He never went to church or school in those days, although he could hear the singing at the services. But he came to have the reputation of knowing well "the words of God." He held a meeting every night even though but one or two might come. There in that grove, in darkest Africa, was held a primitive prayer-meeting. There, indeed, many members of the church to-day sang that first Lunkundo hymn, "Yesu andanga"—"Jesus loves me," and offered their first prayer to any god to "Fafa o le nd' eola"—"Our Father who art in heaven."

"God chose the foolish things of the world That he might put to shame them that are wise;
And God chose the weak things of the world That he might put to shame the things that are strong."

Now, in the early days of our work, Josefa was overlooked, and no wonder! He was an invalid, unable to move or to be moved. Moreover, his tongue was partly paralyzed and his vocabulary was a mixture from three dialects. He stammered an almost unintelligible speech. The value of his life and labors was at last thrust upon our notice. "Josefa's meeting," more than any other, increased in numbers and interest and power. In time it seemed necessary to change from camp-fire to chapel. Josefa thought he might go; he had not been there since he was a boy. Not without pain he was carried in a deck-chair by four. Later, he made a carrying hammock, in which he could ride with more ease. He became much stronger with this exercise. At these meetings he would say but a few words, but his presence in the pulpit was essential. The house was packed night after night; the interest became intense. The beginning of 1902 saw a spiritual awakening up and down the Congo. Locally, it came at a time when least expected; five of the seven missionaries had gone home for health. One day a penciled note came from Josefa. It read: "Bondele, below are the names of people who have asked me to tell you that they want to be instructed in the way of the Lord more perfectly with view to Christian baptism." There followed twenty names and the number was increased week by week until it reached more than eighty. This was the "inquirers' class." As the months passed by many were asking, "What must we do to be saved?" and some had "brought forth fruits worthy of repentance." The mission was now re-inforced and at the close of the year, our first convert on the continent of Africa was baptized. It took courage for Lonkoko to stand alone and, facing his fellows, make the "good confession"—"Njolamba Yesu; njolimeja te, ale Bona wa Nzakomba, Bosikoji okam." He was then buried by baptism in the water of the Congo and arose indeed "to walk in newness

The Surprises of the Judgment*

BY W. L. WATKINSON.

The unconsciousness of genius is a subject that has often been treated. Columbus never knew that he discovered America; he died without any idea that he was the grand pioneer we now know him. It was years before it dawned upon geographers that a new, vast continent had been found. What would he think of his discovery now? Some of the greatest painters would be immensely astonished if they could revisit the earth, and find that pictures painted by them in poverty and sold for a few shillings are the masterpieces of famous galleries. Many inventors and discoverers never understood the significance of their experiments: for instance, Franklin had not the least idea that his kite was a sign in the heavens betokening a new age. And Emerson sings beautifully touching one of the greatest of artists:

"The hand that rounded Peter's dome,
And groined the aisles of Christian Rome,
Wrought in a sad sincerity:
Himself from God he could not free;
He builded better than he knew;
The conscious stone to beauty grew."

There is an unconsciousness of goodness as there is an unconsciousness of genius. Good men are usually unaware of all that their actions imply and to what they lead. Everything done by them seems trivial beyond expression so far as it meets their eye and the eye of others. They have to do with "the least of these." The situation they hold is known as "a poor job." Their contributions to various causes are never large enough to get a line to themselves, and are ignominiously lumped with "small sums." They are generally spoken of as being people "without influence." In fact, they are "lumped" in everything; throughout life they are merged in the insipid million. And so thousands of noble people see only the meager aspect of their circumstances, and they live and die without having once felt the intrinsic and the relative greatness of what they were and of what they did. Indeed, we hardly know more of the essential grandeur of our human life, of the significance of our services, gifts, sufferings and influence, than the oyster in the dark gulf knows of the precious pearl it secretes, or the coral worm of the magnificent island it slowly builds out of the depths of the sea.

Size is the merest accident. The vast and the minute are kindred in glory and worth. We may be sure that it is the same with the doings of human life. Our actions are petty, obscure, microscopic, unnoticed in the doing, and when done instantly forgotten. Everybody can see the charity of Peabody in the immense blocks of buildings that he erected for the poor; everybody hears from fame's golden trumpet of the magnanimity of Shaftesbury; he that runs may read on the page of history of memorable deeds of justice, honor and humanity; but the duties, offerings and sacrifices which make up the life of the multitude absolutely lack emblazonment or distinction. The fierce light of the last day will, however, reveal these hidden things of insignificance, and picture them in large characters on the great white throne, as minute life is disclosed on the screen of the naturalist. Then it will be seen that the bald and contemptible things of humble life are one with historic and immortal achievements. In that day multitudes of lowly souls will learn with unutterable wonder of the breadth, seriousness and glory of actions which once appeared so small; they will look upon the revelation of themselves with a delighted surprise, as we might suppose the microscopic creatures would do if they could see their transfigured forms in the magic of the lantern.

We do not know the far-reaching influence of small acts. We perform a deed of simple honesty, justice, pity, helpfulness, and straightway forget it; we do not think of the mustard-tree that is to grow out of the smallest of seeds. It is said that the fuchsia was introduced into England by a sailor-boy, who brought it from a foreign clime as a present for his mother; she exposed it in her modest window, it became an attraction, and that plant pioneered all the fuchsias of the country. How little that sailor-boy knew what he was doing! He did far more than he thought. He has gladdened thousands of eyes and hearts. If he could come back to-day and see his plant blooming on the window-sills of the poor, in the gardens of the rich, in the conservatories of connoisseurs, how surprised and gladdened he would be! If he is a public benefactor who makes two blades of grass grow where only one grew before, what shall be said of him who makes a million plants bloom where not one bloomed before? So we perform nameless acts of kindness, forbearance and equity, we speak fugitive words of truthfulness and courtesy, and these have a self-propagating power and go on reproducing themselves in endless harvest. How much good to the race shall spring out of the little fidelities and humanities which make up the life of the ordinary good man, who shall say? Lord Byron awoke one morning and found himself famous; let us do our little task with all our heart, and we too, unknown to-day, shall wake up in the morning satisfied and wondering at the large meanings and consequences of a short life.

"With aching hearts and bleeding feet
We dig and heap, lay stone on stone:

We bear the burden and the heat
Of the long day, and wish 'twere done.
Not till the hours of light return,
All we have built do we discern."

of life." Since then the Lord has added more than three score souls to the Congo church of Christ and they remain faithful to this day. Josefa has company now at the Lord's table. He is loved and respected by all. The Christians see in him their father in the faith. He now goes in his hammock even to villages beyond the swamps to preach the good news.

Josefa lived where "darkness covers the earth and gross darkness the people" as nowhere else to-day. But even of darkest Africa we can say:

"The people which sat in darkness
Saw a great light,
And to them which sat in the region and the shadow of death,
To them did light spring up."

A FOOT RACE

Minister vs. Boy

"Facts are facts and stubborn things indeed," says a Michigan clergyman who had a memorable food experience.

"The fact is when a man gets all out of sorts physically because of a derangement of the stomach so that his heart action is bad, is very nervous owing to physical organs impaired and nothing he can eat of an ordinary kind will properly assimilate, it is time to call a halt. Such was my case two years ago last March when I commenced using Grape-Nuts according to directions and have continued their use up to the present time with the result I am in better health physically and mentally than I have been for many years, having passed my 63rd year.

"To demonstrate this fact I proposed a foot-race with my 11-year old boy who was very fleet on foot and he being barefoot imagined he could outrun his Pa but I was besting him until a slip of my foot on a muddy place caused me to stumble and I found myself rolling in the mud in the road. I soon found my footing again undamaged and had to join in a good, hearty laugh with my wife and daughter.

"Why should I not recommend Grape-Nuts to my friends when the food has done so much for me for I am confident that had it not been for the help this excellent food supplied I would to-day have been past recovery. Instead of growing old now I feel younger than I have for years with more mental strength as well as physical and can preach better sermons than ever before." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Grape-Nuts makes far healthier, keener brains. A dull worn out brain can be remade on this food. There's a reason.

Social Influences in College.

There is much to be gained in college life aside from what is obtained in the class room. Of course the class work is the backbone of one's college career, but there are various influences which make strongly for the development of character and the completion of the whole man that are entirely aside from the class room routine.

For example, the social life of the college community is by no means to be despised. Many a young man or woman entering college says to himself early in his career, "I have no need to observe the various social obligations of this community. I have no time for such things. I am here to train my mind, and not to attend social functions and busy myself with social proprieties." After such a one has been in college for a time, he changes his attitude, if he is wise, and begins to learn that social affairs have a great deal to do in his development.

He learns, for example, that dress counts. Personal appearance goes a long way in the determining of his position in the college community. The day of "the long-haired grind" is past. The man who has no time to trim his hair, but gives his whole attention to studies to the neglect of personal appearance, is no longer the typical honor man in our American colleges. Most of the honor men these days are men of sufficient mastery of their time to enable them to pay some attention to personal appearance. It is oftentimes the man who has most to do who finds most opportunity to care for minute details. It is a mistake to suppose, therefore, that clean linen, the daily shave, carefully polished shoes and well brushed clothes are an impossibility with busy men.

A student from a neighboring college, discussing a certain professor there, declared that he could never go into that man's class room and feel comfortable unless his shoes had been carefully polished that day. This was a high tribute to that professor, who by the way, was the most scholarly man in that institution.

Not long since two returned missionaries, one from China and one from Japan, were dining together and discussing the value of attention to social amenities in their respective fields. They agreed that many a new fledged missionary who came to the Orient with the idea that he had not time to pay social calls and to fulfill social duties, was absolutely harmful to the work of missions in those far eastern lands. Attention to such detail was considered absolutely necessary to the effective work of men on the firing line of Christianity. And attention to these affairs is stimulated and cultivated in the best colleges of to-day.

A student there learns that he should pay all calls promptly, is under obligation to call wherever he has been entertained, at reception or dinner, should write his bread-and-butter letter wherever hospitality has been extended to him over night, should answer promptly every letter that comes to him, no matter who may have written it—for who would dare refuse to speak when spoken to?—and all such details of social conduct.

He learns in college a certain respect for superiors, which alas, is all too uncommon in the business life of our commercial age. A student touches his hat to every professor whom he meets on the campus or on the street, in a good old fashion of respect for seniority. He learns the general consideration for old age, not so much from his reading of De Senectute as from the general atmosphere of the place in which he lives and moves. I never can forget my father's saying to me once concerning a certain young man:

"He will rise in the business world to a high place."

"Why, father?"

"Because he never fails to lift his hat at sight of my gray beard."

And I know of a certain young college man who has attained the greatest popularity of any young man in the city of 200,000 where he lives, by his deep respect and unflinching consideration for old people.

In short, college life at its best stimulates and ought to stimulate a general kindness of attitude and self-forgetfulness, which is the true heart of all politeness. After all, what is courtesy except the ability to remember other persons and to put one's self in their shoes? College life cannot impart that unselfishness, but it can accentuate and develop whatever innate courtesy there may be in the student. There are those who never saw the inside of college walls, who are never at fault in any social circle, and always know how to do and to say the right thing in the right place—and some one has said that this knowledge is education. Bobby Burns was one of these, and honest Abe Lincoln, and Saul of Tarsus. Ability to efface one's self is the kingliest courtesy; and the sturdy college world, if it cannot teach a man to efface himself, oftentimes effaces him.

So, though colleges are the last places in the world to encourage the frittering away of time in social frivolities, they are the best places in the world to impart that balance and equipoise which knows how to discriminate between true social duty and mere social frivolity.

community: "The Most Rev. Dr. O'Dwyer, bishop of Limerick, begs to acknowledge the receipt from Miss B. O'Grady, 4 Pembroke road, Dublin, of £1,660 (one thousand six hundred and sixty pounds) for masses for the repose of the soul of her late sister, Mary O'Grady, and of her parents and relatives, and of herself, and also charitable purposes in Limerick and Patrick's Well." That, observes Mr. McCarthy, is a paltry windfall to the bishop. "Why did it not occur to him to offer to found with it a scholarship for the proposed Catholic university?" The Irish priests, according to Colonel Ross of Bladensburg—a Catholic witness on the commission called in vain by Lord Cadogan—"are not experts in educational matters." But Mr. McCarthy, referring to this unflattering opinion, remarks caustically, "No; but they are decidedly experts in the art of making money meanly."

BAD DREAMS

Indicate Improper Diet, Usually due to Coffee.

One of the common symptoms of coffee poisoning is the bad dreams that spoil what should be restful sleep. A man who found the reason says:

"Formerly I was a slave to coffee. I was like a morphine fiend, could not sleep at night, would roll and toss in my bed and when I did get to sleep was disturbed by dreams and hobgoblins, would wake up with headaches and feel bad all day, so nervous I could not attend to business. My writing looked like bird tracks, I had sour belchings from the stomach, indigestion, heartburn and palpitation of the heart, constipation, irregularity of the kidneys, etc.

"Indeed, I began to feel I had all the troubles that human flesh could suffer, but when a friend advised me to leave off coffee I felt as if he had insulted me. I could not bear the idea, it had such a hold on me and I refused to believe it the cause.

"But it turned out that no advice was ever given at a more needed time for I finally consented to try Postum and with the going of coffee and the coming of Postum all my troubles have gone and health has returned. I eat and sleep well now, nerves steadied down and I write a fair hand (as you can see), can attend to business again and rejoice that I am free from the monster Coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ten days trial of Postum in place of coffee will bring sound, restful, refreshing sleep. There's a reason.

THE PASSOVER.—

Matt. 26:17-30.

Memory Verses 26:28.

GOLDEN TEXT.—For even Christ, our Passover, is sacrificed for us.—1 Cor. 5:7.

Old and New Things.

It was characteristic of the method which Jesus pursued throughout his ministry that old forms and ordinances were preserved as long as they could be made serviceable and did not interfere with more vital and more important things. He was revolutionary in his principles, but was as conservative as possible in regard to methods and customs. He would not put the new wine of his teaching into the old bottles of Jewish narrowness, nor make his truth a mere patch upon the worn-out garment of Judaistic legalism, but he did not ignore the pattern of the old garment, nor did he waste such portion of the old wine as yet remained in the old bottles. He was a Jew. He kept the law. He went up to Jerusalem to the great feasts of Israel. He taught his disciples to offer sacrifices in the Temple, and approved of the tithing even of mint, anise and cummin. He observed the Sabbath, neglecting, to be sure, the minute specifications of pettifogging ecclesiastical lawyers, but not rebelling against the old law. The case of the Sabbath illustrates exceptionally well his attitude to the old customs. While keeping the law and avoiding any unnecessary opposition to the current teaching, he put into it the great new principle that "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath." Having laid down that principle, it was safe to leave the old religious customs and ordinances to take care of themselves. There was no need of either commanding their observance or formally abrogating them. They would abrogate themselves when they had outlived their usefulness. And so they did.

So now, pursuant to his custom, our Lord prepares to observe the Passover. And in this, too, he is about to add a new meaning to an old form and so transform it into perpetual serviceableness to the spiritual life.

The Triumphal Entry.

Some striking events had transpired during the past few days. The long journey to Jerusalem had ended in the triumphal entry—an episode which must have stirred up conflicting emotions in the heart of Jesus: joy because of the recognition that was being given to his mission, and because the sincere acclamation of the children could but give him real pleasure; sorrow, because he knew that it was but a superficial victory and that the hosannas of the crowd were backed by no true understanding of his mission and message and indicated no real acceptance of himself as the spiritual savior of men. Indeed, knowing as he did the hearts of men, the so-called "triumphal entry" must have been understood not as a triumph but as the first stage in that mockery which culminated in the reed-scepter and the crown of thorns.

Following this had come that strange scene, the driving of the money-changers out of the Temple; some remarkable discourses about future things; and a day of quiet retirement.

The Last Assembly.

When the Passover was come, the feast for which ostensibly Jesus had come to Jerusalem, he calls together the Twelve for the last time before his death. The Passover was eaten in family groups, and it was as a family that they gathered now in the upper room where the Passover had been prepared. The tie which held them together was the strongest bond on earth for them, strong enough even to take the place of the family tie which was the most sacred of all relations to a Jew. It is to be noted that among the early Chris-

All Humors

Are impure matters which the skin, liver, kidneys and other organs can not take care of without help, there is such an accumulation of them.

They litter the whole system.

Pimples, boils, eczema and other eruptions, loss of appetite, that tired feeling, bilious turns, fits of indigestion, dull headaches and many other troubles are due to them.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills

Remove all humors, overcome all their effects, strengthen, tone and invigorate the whole system.

"I had salt rheum on my hands so that I could not work. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla and it drove out the humor. I continued its use till the sores disappeared." Mrs. IRA O. BROWN, Rumford Falls, Me.

Hood's Sarsaparilla promises to cure and keeps the promise.

tians the relation among believers was thought of as a family relation, and that the common meal and memorial supper, which were partaken of in imitation of this last passover, gave emphasis to this idea.

The Betrayal Foretold.

Less than three years of constant companionship and teaching had done wonders for the twelve, but they were still sadly crude in their ideas and undisciplined in their work. To leave in their hands the performance of so mighty a task would seem the height of folly in any human judgment. But it was not through ignorance that Jesus trusted them. He knew them. He knew even the betrayer and at this last supper foretold his perfidy. Judas could not have been altogether a bad man at the start. Certainly he was not without capacity for usefulness. There must have been some reason why he was chosen. Perhaps it is not too fanciful to say that he was a man of very great natural abilities, and that in his fall we have the case of a talented man who went wrong. In the parable, it is the man with one talent who hides it in the earth. How much greater is the loss when the ten-talent man put his talents to wrong uses.

The New Passover.

Not distinctly as a church ordinance—for there was no church yet—but as a memorial to be observed when believers met in the family of faith, Jesus instituted the Supper. The meaning of it was clear and simple. It was no mystic sacrifice. Its observance required no priestly hands. It was to help the Lord's disciples to remember his death and to remember that the remission of their sins is obtained through him. Let us forever eschew all subtlety in dealing with this theme. It was not meant to be argued about, but to be used. And as often as we do it, let us come face to face with the facts of our own sins, face to face with the fact of our redemption from them—if we have made it a fact by accepting the means of grace—and face to face with God, through Christ Jesus our Lord.

SEEKING THE LOST.

"For the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost."—Luke 19:10. (Read also Luke 15.)

A standing criticism on the part of the scribes and Pharisees against the conduct of Jesus was that he kept company and even ate with the publicans and sinners. They felt scandalized by the fact that one whose own life was otherwise so exemplary, and who was confessedly a teacher of great ability, should be willing to be found in company with these disreputable classes of people. In defending his course against this criticism Jesus points out the fact, which his critics do not seem to have apprehended, that his mission into the world had to do with that kind of people—that he had come "to seek and to save that which was lost."

A Universal Principle. In further defense of his course in mingling with this despised class of people, he showed that he was only following a universal custom. Men everywhere seek anything that belongs to them which has become lost. There is, for instance, the man in the wilderness with one hundred sheep, who, when one of them becomes lost, leaves the ninety and nine and goes in search of the lost one until he finds it and brings it back rejoicing. If a woman having ten pieces of silver loses one, she immediately makes a search for the lost piece, and when she finds it calls in her neighbors to rejoice with her. Why should an exception be made in the case of a lost man?

The Lost Boy. Carrying out the application of this same principle which his critics would approve, he cites the instance of the man who had two sons, one of whom left home and spent his substance in riotous living. When at last, ragged, hungry, dispirited, penitent, he found his way back to his father's house, is it strange that the father welcomed him, clad him with his best robe and made a feast for him? How many thousands of prodigals have been touched by that inimitable story revealing God's attitude toward penitent sinners!

Motive for Seeking Lost Souls. If men seek lost property, how much more should they seek lost humanity! "How much better is a man than a sheep." It is the value of the human soul in the sight of God that makes it worth seeking and saving. It is love of humanity that must lead us, as it led Christ, to seek and to save the lost.

Who Are Lost? All those who are away from God, wandering in forbidden ways, finding their pleasure and their happiness in things that are unholy and contrary to the will of God—these are the lost. To be out of one's proper place is to be lost. Man's rightful place is allegiance to God. In so far as the world is without the life of God and finds its highest satisfaction in things ungodly, it is a lost world. Are you lost, or have you come to yourself and gone to your Father?

What is Our Duty? If our Lord came to seek and to save the lost, is it not the duty of those whom He has called into fellowship with Himself to engage in the same work? Are we not saved to serve? Are we fulfilling the expectations of our Lord if we are putting forth no effort to save the lost? Do you know that you have ever led one soul to Christ?

Prayer. Our Father in heaven, as Thou didst send Thy Son into the world to seek and to save the lost, so has He sent us into the world to be co-workers with Him in the same great mission. May we recognize this obligation and seek more faithfully to discharge it, through the grace and truth which Thou dost supply in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

WHAT CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IS DOING
IN MISSION LANDS.—Luke 1:49-55.*For the Leader.

While the organized phase of the young people's work known by the name of Christian Endeavor has been known less than a generation, yet the activities of the church in the early centuries were in the spirit of true Christian Endeavor. The great movement that has swept not only our own, but all lands, is calling the people back to the unity and zeal and prosperity that characterized the church when it was not divided into rivaling and, sometimes, warring factions. It is also in keeping with the missionary spirit of the first century. There are no anti-missionary Christian Endeavor societies. Did you ever hear of one? If so, something was wrong in that locality. It was not a true society of Christian Endeavor. Why, among us as a people, the anti-missionary people are opposed to societies of any kind. How could they have a society of Christian Endeavor among them? A topic, then, such as we have tonight, "What Christian Endeavor is doing in Mission Lands," is the true endeavorer's delight. Let us inform ourselves as to what we as a church are doing to carry out the last words of our Master.

For the Members.

1. In foreign lands: Christian Endeavor is doing in a general way in mission lands just what it is doing in the home land. It is a school of spiritual development for the young people who are converted by the gospel preachers in all the mission lands. Some great revivals have broken out upon the foreign fields of India. I heard a great native preacher, who was on a visit to this country, and attending the great endeavor convention at San Francisco in 1897, say that someone said to him after a great revival in India, "Now, what are we to do with these young people?" "I said," said he, "bring in the Christian Endeavor societies." He said the young people took hold of the Christian Endeavor work there much as they do in this country.

As to special work of the endeavorers, what is more inspiring than the work of caring for the support and education of orphan boys in the orphanage of the foreign society of our church at Damoh, India? Here is a clipping from the report of our national superintendent of Christian Endeavor, R. H. Waggoner, made at our last national convention at Detroit in October last:

"The amounts are given in round numbers as reported by the secretaries of the different boards:

Received for Porto Rico.....	$ 900 00
Ministerial Relief (107 societies in twenty-one states).....	700 00
National Benevolent Association....	200 00
F. C. M. S., the C. E. societies support 300 orphan boys; ten societies support native evangelists).	7,000 00
C. W. B. M. (from 242 Intermediate and 2,041 Junior societies in 46 states, territories and provinces)	10,500 00
Church Extension.....	100 00
Total .....	$19,400 00

"It is estimated that this is only about 10 per cent of what is contributed by our Christian Endeavorers for all purposes in church work."

When literature comes from the foreign society to your society, see that it is read at the business meeting and considered, and that it is read before the society at some Sunday evening meeting for the information of all. Keep your society in touch with the work of the church.

2. In home lands: Christian Endeavor is the stay of home missions just as it is the stay of foreign missions. Some years ago the older endeavorers will remember having helped build a church in Utah. This year the endeavorers are helping the Porto Rico mission work. Our new missionary there in charge of the work is E. M. Pardee, who went to that field from Iowa after Brother Taylor's return on account of failing health. Here is part of a recent letter from him to the endeavorers:

"Five years ago there were lepers walking the streets of San Juan, asking alms. To-day there are thousands of spiritual lepers in every district of Porto Rico, going everywhere spreading the germs of sin and death. The lepers are now out on lepers' island, cared for in a splendid manner by the insular charities, and the spiritual lepers are beginning to be cared for in an equally splendid manner by our Christian young people. But the work is only begun. The churches are reaching only a fraction of one per cent. Think of the 19,940 people in the Bayamon district, with less than one hundred and fifty professing Christians. You may ask, What can our society do to help? I reply, Much, very much.

"First. Pray for us every Sunday evening.

"Second. Write to Bro. W. M. Taylor, Chattanooga, Tenn., asking him to visit you and tell you about the work that is being done here.

"Third. Interest your society in one of the missions, and help support that mission.

"Fourth. Better yet, why not your society support a native preacher all the time? Who will be the first?

"Fifth. If you desire further information about special work for your society, write me, asking as many questions as you choose, and I shall be pleased to answer them.

"We trust that every Y. P. S. C. E. will have a part in this great work. We thank you for all you shall be enabled to do, and pray that the dear Lord will keep and bless all his young people.

"Very truly your brother,

"E. M. PARDEE."

Bring all communications upon Porto Rico before your society. Have a part in this great work.

A Chance to Make Money.

Having read how some have made money preserving eggs, I will give my experience. I have had wonderful success. I bought eggs four years ago at 8 to 10 cents a dozen and sold them in the winter at 25 cents to 40 cents a dozen. I preserved them by the American system, which keeps them perfectly fresh without using either lime or salt. I made $250 the first year; I saved the money and invested in eggs the second year, and cleared $910.12; the third year I made $3,421. Eggs were high and scarce. You can buy eggs cheap now and sell them for 30 cents to 40 cents a dozen. You can figure the profit yourself. Anyone can make money in the egg business. To preserve them costs a cent a dozen. Any person can get full directions for nothing for preserving eggs by the American System by writing to the Dairy Supply Co., 16 Chase St., Cincinnati, O. T. W. P.

Our Budget

—Look out for the May anniversaries.

—The following important conventions meet this month: Indiana state convention, at Lebanon, May 17-19; Ohio state convention, at Cleveland, May 24-26; Illinois state convention, at Cuba, May 24-26.

—Children's day June 5. The schools are all preparing for this annual festival of the children, and Brother Rains writes, "I think we are going to have the greatest children's day in our history." Why not?

—The World's Fair grows completer and more beautiful every day, but will not be fully complete for many days yet. There is plenty there for one to get his money's worth, but those who can make but one visit should postpone it until later.

—Our World's Fair pavilion is now receiving its coat of paint on the outside, and it will then be complete. Nor will anyone who visits it during the coming summer and autumn be ashamed of it—though some may be ashamed of themselves that they have not helped to pay for it. The building is now ready for the exhibits, or will be by the time this is printed, and such interior decorations as the various organizations using it may desire to give it.

—Estimates of the attendance at our national convention, Oct. 13-20, run from 25,000 to 50,000. When the secretaries came over and saw the city, the Fair, the music hall and coliseum, and heard what our local committee on preparation was doing, the latter figure was the only one that would satisfy them. It isn't easy to see why any member who can come will be willing to stay away.

—J. R. Parker has begun work at Portland, Ind.

—Busy days ought to mean happy days, and they do with most preachers.

—L. A. Chapman will close his work at Grand Valley, Ontario, June 1.

—J. A. Brown has begun work at Auburn, Ind., where the church is but two years old.

—E. L. Powell will deliver the commencement address of Hamilton college on May 26.

—On account of ill health Loren Howe has resigned at Spencer, Ia., and will remove to Pasadena, Cal.

—E. J. Wright, who has succeeded well at Burlington, Kan., has accepted a call to the First church, Leavenworth.

—The church of Christ at Maysville, Mo., will be dedicated the third Lord's day in June with L. L. Carpenter in charge.

—The dedication of the church of Christ Christian Endeavor hall at Yountville, Cal., has been postponed until May 29.

—No recent occurrence has given Cotner university such wide notice in the state, writes J. D. Hilton, as the recent arbor day celebration.

—A. F. Stall, for three years minister of the Central Christian church at Muncie, Ind., has accepted a call to the Third church of Christ at Akron, Ohio.

—We are assured that the Reading, Pa., church building "will be a gem when the new platform, frescoing and carpeting are in place for its beautification."

—H. Randel Lookabill, Crawfordsville, Ind., says that the beautiful house of worship just dedicated by Brother Carpenter is the result of the work of eleven scattered Disciples.

—Remember the foreign society is ready to furnish, free of charge, all necessary children's day supplies for the first Sunday in June. Address, F. M. Rains, Cor. Sec., Cincinnati, O.

—F. D. Power is to deliver the baccalaureate sermon for the University of West Virginia, this being the first recognition of us as a people, we believe, by this state university.

—A card received from Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cox, of New York City, announces the marriage of their daughter, Bessie Winona, to Rev. Samuel Guy Inman, on Tuesday afternoon, May 31, at the church of the Disciples of Christ, West Fifty-Sixth street.

—Eleven hundred sermons and 1,333 additions to the membership! That is A. C. Smither's fine record at the First church, Los Angeles, Cal., up to and including Easter Sunday.

—Just prior to his departure from Australia, Wren J. Grinstead reported six baptisms. Two of the candidates were Congregationalists, one a Presbyterian and one a young half-caste Chinese.

—J. H. Hughes, who has just entered upon the pastorate at Macon, Ga., is a Kentuckian by birth, so his removal from San Jose, Cal., will take him to what ought to prove a congenial sphere.

—The church at Augusta, Ga., to which Howard T. Cree has just gone, gave $106 to home missions last year. This year it will become a living link church. Brother Cree is "moving things."

—The Central Church of Christ at Decatur, Ill., will lay the corner stone of a splendid new $30,000 building on May 22, with appropriate services. F. W. Burnham is the enterprising pastor of the church.

—B. H. Melton, Richmond, Va., has declined a call to the presidency of Atlantic Christian college, Wilson, N. C. Brother Melton's church expects soon to erect a new building, the present one being overcrowded.

—We have received the following telegram from J. N. Jessup at Little Rock, Ark.: "Brother Sweeney with us. Called for $15,000, raised $20,300 on $30,000 new church." This is self explanatory and will rejoice many hearts.

—Allen B. Philpott, pastor Central Christian church, Indianapolis, has been invited to deliver a series of five addresses on religious and ethical topics at Chautauqua, N. Y., assembly. The days are from Aug. 22 to 26 inclusive.

—E. G. Bagby, who has been appointed excursion manager for Maryland, Delaware and the District of Columbia for our national convention in St. Louis next October, is already agitating the matter. Let the brethren elsewhere do likewise.

—The church at New Douglas, Ill., desires to secure a preacher for one-fourth his time. Arrangements, it is thought, can be made with other churches close by to use the other part of the preacher's time. Address I. A. Olive, or Dr. B. H. McKinney, New Douglas, Ill.

—Burnet J. Pinkerton, who fills the chair of philosophy in the Campbell-Hagerman college of young women, Lexington, Ky., will preach the baccalaureate sermon for the senior class of that institution next Sunday morning at the Central Christian church of that city.

—William R. Jinnett, who has entered upon the pastorate of the Central church, Columbus, Ind., is a Bethany graduate, and was born in North Carolina. He had an excellent reputation at college, where he was valedictorian. He is a speaker of ability and cultivates poetry.

—Nearly 3,000 schools are already preparing for children's day. This is a prophecy of mighty things for the first Sunday in June. Last year 3,310 schools observed children's day, the first Sunday in June. It now seems that a larger number will be in line this year. They are planning to raise $60,000.

—O. C. Bolman, of Pleasant Hill, Ill., sends us the account of one day's work: "Two sermons, ordination of a minister, one baptism, one 'good confession,' one wedding and twenty miles of driving in mud and rain." And he adds, "It was a great day, too, and a happy one." John W. Pearson, who was set apart to the gospel ministry, has, according to Brother Bolman, splendid qualifications for his work.

—The congregation of our church in Buffalo, N. Y., is encouraging the grace of liberality. In March they decided to become a living link church. Since then they have raised over $100 for home missions and $103 for the Christian institute. B. S. Ferrall, the pastor, writes us that, best of all, "joy attends the way of these givers." Referring to the anniversary services of the brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, he adds, "Our preachers would do well to look into this organization."

ROOMS FOR World's Fair Visitors

Which are advertised in the Want Column of this paper are in the homes of the membership of the Christian Church in this city. We recommend those who anticipate a visit to this greatest of Expositions to correspond with the advertisers before coming, if possible, confident of receiving kind and considerate treatment.

Make Reservations Now Before the Rush is On —Our children have given $515,667 for heathen missions since 1881. At the present rate of increase it will not take them many years to pass the million dollar line. They gave nearly $52,000 last year.

—Last week the board of church extension received its 111th gift on the annuity plan. $500 was sent by a friend of the board in Michigan. The board could use $50,000 of annuity money at once if friends would contribute that amount. For information concerning the annuity plan write to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 600 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

—A brother enclosing $5 for the World's Fair pavilion, writes: "I have felt all the time that I would like to have sufficient interest in the building to entitle me to a seat occasionally—if there are any seats." There will be seats if we can get the money to buy them, and if all our readers will do as our brother has done they will enjoy sitting in them all the more.

—"The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is a great paper, and is becoming continuously better, and is growing in great favor with our people."—J. W. ELLIS.

Such a commendation we appreciate all the more because Brother Ellis is exceptionally well qualified to form literary judgments, as we are assured by a gentleman whose authority in newspaper matters is very high.

—The East Dallas Christian church, which has become a living link church, has but 165 members and is less than six months old. They have secured as their evangelist John A. Stevens. A month and a half ago this church had never had a regular pastor; now it has two preachers, Brother Stevens and Bro. W. A. Fite. Brother and Sister Fite are delighted with Texas, the city of Dallas and the church with which they are laboring.

—Simpson Ely is in a meeting at Thayer, Kan. This is in Neosho county adjoining Wilson county, where Brother Ely and his brother took a government claim in 1870. There he preached his first sermon and had his first converts—we might add, there he lived when he was married. We are not surprised that there is a deep interest and full houses attending the ministry of Brother Ely.

—J. P. Pinkerton, who has been called to take charge of the church at Plattsburg, Mo., as successor to B. F. Hill, is very highly esteemed and loved by the people of the town. Bro. J. W. Ellis writes: "He is a good preacher, a good worker, loyal to all missionary appointments, earnest in pastoral duty, a royal companion, a consecrated Christian, and a ready fisherman." Improvements in the church building so as to render it more serviceable have been made, and all departments of the church work are flourishing. Brother Pinkerton has been chosen to preach the baccalaureate sermon of the public schools next Sunday evening.

—Christian college, Columbia, Mo., has had the most successful year in its history. The graduating exercises began on May 13 and extend to commencement evening, May 25, when Prof. W. D. McClintock, of the University of Chicago, will deliver the address. J. J. Morgan, of Kansas City, is to preach the baccalaureate sermon next Lord's day evening. The number of graduates this year will be in the neighborhood of fifty.

—One of the largest Sunday-school classes of adults in the state may be found at the Christian church at Kirksville, Mo. It is composed of about 125 osteopathic students, and its teacher is Dr. W. R. Laughlin, professor of anatomy at the A. S. C. Beside the study of the lesson the professor is also giving a systematic study of the miracles of Christ. Brother Thompson, the new pastor of the church, seems to be giving great satisfaction and doing a good work.

—H. H. Ambrose, a native of North Carolina and now in attendance at Atlantic Christian college at Wilson, N. C., expects to leave that city early in June with the intention of attending Christian university at Canton, Mo. Brother Ambrose a few years ago left his home in Washington county, N. C., and started out in the world with only 35 cents to begin with. He has a desire to secure a good education, and thinks his chances will be better in Missouri.

—Upon the program for the eighth district C. W. B. M. convention, which is to be held at the Christian church, Clarksburg, Mo., May 27, 28 and 29, are a number of our well known brethren and sisters. J. M. Rudy, of Sedalia, is to speak upon "How Can the Pastor Help the C. W. B. M.?" and he will also deliver a missionary sermon. Crayton S. Brooks will preach and lecture, while Elder S. J. Vance, of California, is expected to deliver a sermon. The gathering promises to be both interesting and profitable to all who may attend.

—Barclay Meador has been chosen as assistant minister to I. J. Spencer, of Central church, Lexington, Ky. Mr. Meador was for eight years assistant secretary of the St. Louis Y. M. C. A., and was prominent in religious work in the city, being a member of the Mt. Cabanne church and associated with the business department of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. He is a noble young man and it is believed can render very great assistance in the field of work which has been chosen for him. He expects to graduate in June from the Bible college at Lexington.

—No doubt there are cases of extortion in charges in hotel rates, in St. Louis, as the papers report, but there are plenty of accommodations in St. Louis for reasonable rates if people will take pains to find them. Send to the Publicity Department, World's Fair, for a printed list of hotels, boarding houses and private dwellings that take roomers, with prices and location attached. See also our want columns, where a number of our own members advertise to furnish accommodations at reasonable rates. One can get a good room for a dollar a day, and good meals for from twenty-five to fifty cents. That is not excessive for a World's Fair.

—Dr. W. T. Moore held a unique religious service recently with the "Unity Christian church" in Audrain county, Mo. The morning audience, owing to heavy rains, was small in number. Dr. Moore announced the usual service for the evening, but before time for assembling people began to telephone the preacher urging that, in view of the threatening weather, all families should be connected with the circular telephone and Dr. Moore should hold services and preach a short sermon over the wires. At the appointed time all answered to their names, and hymns were sung and prayer offered. The reading was the 11th chapter of Ecclesiastes, the fourth verse being selected as a text. This reads: "He that observeth the wind shall not sow, and he that reckoneth the clouds shall not reap." It was evidently thought an extremely applicable text for the people and the occasion. The sermon was perhaps the shortest Dr. Moore has ever delivered, for it only occupied twelve minutes, and the newspaper, which is our source of authority for this news item, says: "It is believed that the Audrain people will not allow threatening clouds and high winds to keep them away from religious services at another time." If Dr. Moore can work such results, he may prepare himself for a series of engagements all over the state. We are sure the services of any man who can make the people forget the rain and the Missouri mud will be in great demand by the preachers everywhere.

—The general committee in St. Louis, charged with caring for the National convention, October 16-20, is already actively at work. It is planning for the greatest convention in the history of our people, the jubilee convention in Cincinnati, 1899, not excepted. They are expecting not less than 25,000 delegates, and some are enthusiastic enough to look for 50,000. At any rate it will doubtless be the largest religious convention of any one communion in the history of Christianity. The exposition building has been secured, which with its three auditoriums can seat about 19,000. Three sessions may be conducted at the same time without one interfering with another.

—An effort is being made to establish a Chinese mission in San Francisco. This kind of work in Portland and Los Angeles has been a success, and Brother Wong Shin King, who comes from Honolulu, Hawaii, and has for several years been a preacher, teacher and soul winner, has recently been carefully studying the conditions in San Francisco and it is believed by many of the brethren there that a gospel mission school can be opened with promise of rich fruit. Brother Wong came into the Christian church under much persecution, and is willing to give his life to the salvation of his people. Northern California churches are asked to contribute a small amount monthly to give an opportunity to demonstrate what can be done with the many Chinese in the Golden Gate city.

—Frank G. Tyrrell, whose labors with the Mt. Cabanne church close with the first of June, will be open to engagements during the month of June for the dedication of churches, lecture courses, or single lectures, both popular and sociological, or special addresses; and also after August 7 he will be open to the same kind of work. The interim from July 1 to August 7, will be taken up by the Colorado Chautauqua at Boulder, Colo., which he is to conduct the present year. Brother Tyrrell desires also to hold a few union evangelistic meetings during the year, and we are sure that in this kind of work also he will meet with splendid success. Brother Tyrrell is too well known to our readers to need any special commendation from us. He may be addressed at 5020 Morgan street, St. Louis.

—It is not often that a religious work gets such an unqualified endorsement from a great daily as Dr. Moore's recent book receives in the following notice from the Globe-Democrat: "'Man Preparing for Other Worlds,' by William Thomas Moore. (Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis.) It is doubtful if the majority of persons in Missouri know that there is in this state a publishing plant capable of turning out so thoroughly excellent a piece of work as this new volume. In this respect it is equal to the volumes from the most skilled of the eastern houses. In so far as the contents of the volume are concerned, the strongest praise would not be inapplicable. It is a scholarly and serious work, dealing with religious problems of wide interest and combining dignity with the right kind of liberality."

—The pavilion of the Christian church on the World's Fair grounds, St. Louis, is now completed. The exhibits of the missionary societies, publishing houses and colleges will be instructive. Our people are invited to make this building headquarters when on the grounds. It will be a convenient place to meet friends, to receive mail, rest when overtaxed by sight seeing, to write a letter, and, in a word, be at home with your own brethren. The building is well situated, across the street from the Texas building, and between the Oregon and South Dakota buildings, and east of the Fine Arts building. It can be easily found. hang on the outside. Miss Jessie D. Nesbit, who is in charge of the missionary exhibits, will cordially receive all friends. Miss May Gowan, the hostess, will welcome all strangers, introduce people to each other, keep a register of visitors, and act as a sort of bureau of information for inquiring friends.

—In an unpublished letter from Herbert Spencer appearing in a recent number of the Independent, he says: "In efforts toward ethical culture there is constantly overlooked the one effort more important than all others, the effort to suppress militancy. Abundant proof exists that with war come all the vices, and with peace come all the virtues." That is perhaps stating it a little strongly, but there is no question but that war in itself is a great evil, and that it brings in its train a long list of other evils. If the twentieth century can establish and bring into universal practice a substitute for war as a method of settling international disputes, it will have contributed vastly to the triumph of the kingdom of God on earth.

—The Christian Endeavor hotel, located just outside the Fair grounds, is trying to demonstrate that a hotel can be run without a bar, on moral and temperance principles, at a reasonable rate and succeed. From what we hear of its success we are glad to believe that the predictions of its enemies that it would fail, are likely to prove false. The saloon interests have been specially hostile against it, and the daily papers even have been quick to publish certain false rumors which were circulated about its being "condemned," "burned down" and "confiscated." But in spite of all this, it is receiving, will receive and ought to receive a large share of public patronage, especially from those who believe it possible and desirable to run a hotel without a bar.

—A cablegram from Europe announces the death of Miss Annie Powers, of Warrensburg, Mo., librarian of the State Normal School at that place. She had gone to Berlin a few weeks ago to meet her brother, Dr. Powers, and his wife who are studying there, and to make a tour on the continent with friends. The cablegram gives no particulars of her death. Miss Powers was a young woman of unusual strength and beauty of character, of fine intellectual attainments and a consecrated Christian. The editor of this paper has known her from her childhood and loved her almost as a daughter. We share in the sorrow of her brothers and sisters, and sympathize deeply with their bereavement and that of the Christian church at Warrensburg. Heaven is richer for the passing into it of such rare spirits, and the earth is better for her having lived in it.

—Geo. Gowen, who has left the Broadway church, Louisville, Ky., for the pastorate of the Vine street Christian church, Nashville, Tenn., is but returning to his own people. He was born in Tullahoma and after entering the ministry preached there, and also in Murfreesboro and Fayetteville. He went from there to Kentucky, where he filled several pulpits. He has just received a cordial and hearty welcome to his new church. He told his people that he was well acquainted with the situation, knew the difficulties to be met and conditions to overcome and was willing to take his full share of the responsibility of grappling with them. "There must be no white flag of surrender," he declared. "No note of retreat, no backward step. 'Progress' should be the watchword." It may be remembered that this church has been served by W. E. Ellis, R. Linn Cave, Philip S. Fall and Samuel Kelley.

—DEAR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: The Broadway church, Louisville, Ky., has released me from my acceptance of the call to their pulpit. The church here was not willing for me to leave, and petitioned the Louisville congregation to release me. Three additions Sunday. Offering for home missions exceeded our apportionment considerably. I begin a meeting at Bowling Green, Ky., Monday, May 9. Fraternally,

Owensboro, Ky. R. H. CROSSFIELD.

The churches may as well let Brother Crossfield alone. The church at Owensboro has a cinch on him, and it proposes to hold on to him. Blessed is the church that knows a good thing when it sees it and has it!

J. H. Smart, whose acceptance of the pastorate of the First Christian church at Danville, Ill., we have already noted, has entered upon the work there and writes very hopefully of the outlook there. In a personal letter to the Editor he says:

"Danville is quite a city of 25,000 people or more. We have three churches here and two missions. The Third church was dedicated yesterday (May 15), J. H. Gilliland, of Bloomington, being master of ceremonies. It is a beautiful building costing about $18,000. Ten thousand was to be raised at dedication. They succeeded in getting the amount with something over $300 as a margin."

Brother Smart, it will be remembered by our older readers, was for several years on our editorial staff, and has promised to write occasionally for us.

"Two white-haired men, a trifle bent, walking with a somewhat halting gait, their faces showing years of study and their countenances telling one of the knowledge behind them, these men walked along without the air of distinction that seemed to belong to them, entirely oblivious of the stares of the people. Both are full of the enterprise of young men, and it is probable that were they a few years younger they would make a distinct success as evangelists." The above appears in a New York paper and refers to J. G. Encell and his brother John, who have returned to Pennsylvania. J. G. has been serving as pastor at Troy, Pa. But desiring to accept a call from the church at Alba, Pa., where he served as pastor over forty years ago, his brother John became his successor at Troy, and the newspaper reference is to the two venerable evangelists being together on the street just prior to their separating.

—Bro. T. Henry Blenus of the Church street Christian church, Jacksonville, Fla., has evidently been meeting with some unpleasant visitors. He writes:

"How long will the balmy air and salubrious climate of this state of ours be the excuse for making it the dumping ground of wheezy religious cranks? The churches are not by any means innocent of much of this unfortunate business. Of all liars, deliver us from the sanctimonious, religious crank-liar. About a year ago a young man of somewhat gentlemanly appearance came to the writer bearing a letter from one of our prominent churches north of us. We took him in, and in less than six months he took us in—or at least one of our brethren—to the tune of one thousand dollars of hard earned money. The writer has the letter of church commendation, and our young church has had a lesson which will last us for some time to come. Our faith in church letters is somewhat weak, in spots. If this dumping business continues we will establish us a crematory, giving these gentlemen a foretaste of what is in reserve for them."

—The Youngstown Semi-Weekly Telegram contains a strong sermon by J. L. Garvin, pastor of the First Christian church of that city, on "The Glory of the Church," based on Ephesians 1:22, 23. It is a good idea to use the local press as far as possible for such sermons, in order to correct popular misconceptions of the church and Christianity. The following extract will give the reader some idea of the sermon. Speaking of what the church is not and of what it is, he says:

"It is not a court of justice; it is more. It fills all men with desire to see justice done. It is not a court of arbitration; it is more. It fills men's hearts with the spirit of conciliation. It is not the police court or mayor's office or city council; it is more. It fills men with strength to fight their own lusts, passions and sins and to protect innocence against the vicious. The law was not made for righteous men, and the church is the school of discipline for righteousness. It is the bed rock of civilization, the soil from which all goodness springs. It is the repository of ideas, ideals, convictions and symbols which have done more to socialize the human heart than all other movements combined. It spiritualizes life, wealth and poverty. It is the embodiment of the golden rule and teaches to all classes the inalienable rights of others. It is the friend to man, and his best friend."

—Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Bishop, of St. Louis, celebrated the forty-ninth anniversary of their wedding on Monday. Brother Bishop is the oldest son of Gov. R. M. Bishop, who was one of the stalwarts of Christianity and one of the most generous contributors to the Christian churches in Ohio. Brother and Sister Bishop, neither of whom is in robust health, are members of the First church, St. Louis. A very large number of friends—old and new—will rejoice with them in this happy anniversary and pray that they may be spared to celebrate their golden wedding next year in the midst of all their children.

Receipts for World's Fair Pavilion Fund.

Since our last published receipts, the following additional contributions have been received:

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind.....	$ 50 00
Eureka College, Eureka, Ill.....	40 00
A. Teachout & Son, Cleveland.....	100 00
A. W. Jeffress, Marine, Ill.....	20 00
E. J. Jeffress, Edwardsville, Ill.....	5 00
A. Marshall, Hannibal, Mo.....	2 00

We had hoped to hear from many others before going to press, as the building is now completed and ready for the exhibits, and many of the bills are yet unpaid. Besides, we should have something for fitting up the rooms inside to make them comfortable for our visitors. It is difficult to understand the tardiness with which the brethren respond to these appeals for an enterprise that so deeply concerns us all. We urge prompt attention to this matter on the part of all who are interested in the success of this work. Send through this office, or direct to the treasurer, J. H. Allen, 104 S. Main St., St. Louis.

Ministerial Exchange.

Ernest H. Boyd, evangelistic singer, is open for engagements for an indefinite time, either with an evangelist or regular pastor. He is highly recommended. Address him at Ireton, Iowa.

L. A. Chapman, Grand Valley, Ont., has resigned to accept a call elsewhere, and the pulpit there will be vacant after June 19. The church is in splendid condition, with a good parsonage, and can pay a fair salary. A good pastor is wanted, married man preferred. Address George Nodwell, Grand Valley, Ont.

L. D. Sprague is open for engagements as soloist and leader of song. Address California, Mo.

Olean, Mo., 28 miles south of Jefferson City on the Missouri Pacific, wishes to secure a preacher for part of his time. Address W. E. Allen, clerk.

W. O. Thomas has closed his work with the Central Christian church, Kansas City, and is open for future work. Address 1527 Cherry St., Kansas City.

E. L. Burch, 1114 Octavio St., San Francisco, desires calls for evangelistic, with preference for union meetings.

Charles M. Fillmore, secretary of the national Bible school association, and pastor of the church at Carthage, Ohio, will be in the east during July, and can be secured as a supply for some pulpit for the early part of that month. Address him at Station P., Cincinnati, O.

Carl C. Davis, after a brief visit at home (Packwood, Ia.), will be ready to locate again.

Dr. James Millard Philputt.

J. M. Philputt was born in Tennessee in the year 1860. Both he and his wife are of Disciple parentage. Mrs. Philputt's father was Almon F. Reynolds, one of our pioneer preachers in New England. Brother Philputt graduated from the Indiana university at Bloomington in 1885, and received from that institution the degree of A. M. two years later. He graduated from Union theological seminary, New York city, in 1888. The honorary degree of doctor of divinity was conferred upon him by the university of New York in 1896. His first pastorate, during his college course, was at Salem, Ind. His second, during his seminary course, was at 169th street church, New York city. In 1889, he founded the Lenox avenue union church, New York city, beginning with six members, and leaving it after thirteen years with a membership of 325. He was called to the Richmond avenue church of Christ, Buffalo, January 1, 1902, but relinquished the work after one year on account of illness. Since then he has been spending the time in Florida, Arizona and southern California, in which time he has regained his health. He has received a unanimous call to the Union avenue Christian church, of St. Louis, which is composed of the Central and Mt. Cabanne Christian churches. The call is as a temporary supply looking to permanency. He is to arrive from southern California on Friday of this week, and will occupy the pulpit of the Central Christian church, on Finney near Grand, on May 22 and 29. After that, until the two congregations meet together, he will probably alternate between the two pulpits. Brother Philputt comes to us in the prime of his manhood, and with the prestige of a successful ministry. His wife is an active, consecrated Christian worker, and a singer of unusual power. We congratulate the church in St. Louis on this valuable accession to our forces.

Now is the Time to Visit Hot Springs, Arkansas, via the Iron Mountain Route.

The season at the great National Health and Pleasure Resort is in full blast. Climate unsurpassed. Hot Springs Special leaves St. Louis daily at 8:20 p. m., making the run in less than twelve hours. Three other fast trains daily. Handsome descriptive literature can be obtained free by calling on, or addressing our City Ticket Agent, S. E. Cor. 6th & Olive Sts., St. Louis.

Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia.

J. L. McDonald, of Hiram, Ohio, has purchased a farm on the eastern shore of Maryland and moved near to Snow Hill. He is ministering to the church at that place.

David M. Wetzel, of Cooperville, Wis., has accepted a call to the Fulton avenue church in Baltimore, where W. R. D. Winters had to resign on account of serious illness. We are glad Brother Winters is much improved.

O. G. White has begun a meeting at 25th street church, Baltimore. The writer is leading the songs.

R. A. Abbott reports Harlem avenue, the mother church, in best condition of any time during his pastorate of nearly ten years.

Peter Ainslie reports the loss in the fire of the plans for their temple, but they are endeavoring to push the work forward, having completed the raising of the first $3,000 for the work.

The work in all the Washington, D. C., churches seems to prosper. At Vienna, Va., the date of dedication has been changed from May 29 to June 12. J. A. HOPKINS.

Wisconsin Notes.

I closed my work at Footville May 1 and go to Baltimore, Md., to locate with the Fulton avenue church. I expect to begin my work there May 15.

H. F. Barstow, Ladysmith, Wis., has been elected by our state board to succeed me as state secretary. I bespeak for him your most hearty co-operation. If you have not already done so send him an offering for state missions and make his heart glad. I consider the work that we have undertaken among the Scandinavians the most important ever entered into by our brethren in Wisconsin. Three-fourths of our state is foreign, and the only way to win these people is through their own men. We ought to have in this state at least 100 men speaking the German and Scandinavian languages.

F. M. Hayes comes to Footville May 8 with the expectation of locating with the church. It is hoped that both parties concerned, the church and the minister, may decide at once to co-operate in this work so that there may be no interruption.—W. M. Thomas, Ridgeway, Mo., began work last Lord's day with the churches at Monroe and Twin Grove. This is a good field and we may expect to hear of church growth in the future.—H. F. Barstow reports one addition at Ladysmith and Brother Harlow two at Superior not yet reported in these notes.

If you have not made an offering for home missions do so at once. Remember, brethren, that our state is liberally helped by the home board and that we should show our appreciation of this by our generous gifts to the home society. D. N. WETZEL.

From the South.

I spent three weeks in April with Frank Lanehart and the disciples at Leesville, La. Brother Lanehart is held in high esteem by all the people and justly, for he is one of the best of men. He says he desires to become a country evangelist and go away out where others try to keep from going. Should he do this he will be a mighty power in an important field.

Four weeks in April and May I spent at Shreveport with Claude L. Jones and the Disciples there. Brother Jones and his wife are held in high esteem by every one in the city and throughout the state. He is an untiring worker. He was the first resident minister of Shreveport, and is still with them finishing up six years of earnest toil. In these two meetings there were about thirty-five additions to the churches—substantial people who can be counted next year as well as this.

The church in Birmingham, Ala., has been finished and it is a thing of beauty and a joy to all Disciples. It cost nearly $25,000. A. R. Moore is the popular minister. Just as I told the brethren here many years ago would be the case when we got a churchhouse, Brother Moore keeps his baptistry full all the time and uses it constantly. This church has a great work before it as well as a splendid record behind it. We are making progress at Mobile, Tampa, Sumpter, Rome, Charleston, New Orleans, and when we get first class houses in all these and other centers this will be the district of our country that shall, under God, make the great reports of splendid achievements for the gospel of Christ. We must give some attention to Natchez, Vicksburg, St. Augustine, Munroe, La., Eufaula, and Talladega, Ala., and other great and growing centers. A gospel tent or tabernacle, a preacher and singer can plant a self-sustaining church in nearly any of these places with about three months' hard work. Why not do it? We have the men and the money.

Missouri State Mission News.

This is the day and year for paying off church debts. The very latest seems to be the happiest of all. Word comes from Joplin that every dollar of the debt, which has been a great source of dread to quite a number of the church at that place, has been pledged to be paid by Jan. 1, 1905. This is truly wonderful. Following so closely upon the great meeting and the establishment of the new church in South Joplin, it marks a step forward in the right direction. They have not as yet burned the mortgage, but they did burn the preacher's hat. Brother Harlow was with them for several days, and assisted greatly in the enterprise.

The church at Huntsville, under the leadership of J. R. Perkins, is going on to better things. The secretary was there last Sunday, and though it rained, there was an audience of between 50 and 75, and the offering for state missions was $31.75, one of the best offerings taken this season, when you consider the size of the audience. The whole church has fallen in love with Brother Perkins, and he deserves it. That same night was spent with the church at Brunswick. It was our first visit for several years, and we missed the faces of several who were prominent in the church in days gone by. They have gone to their reward. Bro. E. G. Merrill is now preaching for them, and he is a leader whom they are happy to follow, and in following they are doing splendid service for the Master. The rain had made it impossible for us to have a large gathering, but they gave the best offering (nearly $50) they have given for a number of years. The example of these two congregations is one worthy of imitation by a large number of churches throughout the state. In fact, something of this kind must be done, or else we will go to the convention with the very humiliating report that we have a deficit in place of a balance in the treasury. The board asks the especial attention of the churches and ministers to this fact, and asks at their hands the heartiest co-operation.

It is now time for all eyes to be turned in the direction of Carrollton. It is hoped to have the greatest convention we have had for years. It would seem that with the leaders of our own convention working in connection with those of the Bible-school, C. W. B. M. and C. E., a very large and enthusiastic convention would be the inevitable result. The matter, however, lies in its latest analysis—in the hands of the preachers of the state. They can make this convention a success or a failure, as they will.

Let all who are intending to go to the convention send their names at once to E. H. Kellar, the pastor of the church at Carrollton. This is important. They want to know how many they will have to entertain. It is but courtesy to them to send them this word.

The railroad fare to Carrollton, we are sorry to say, is a fare and one-third for the round trip. We made a desperate effort to get the one fare for the round trip, but the railroads were determined that we could not have this concession. Remember, now, that you purchase tickets at your own railroad station for round trip, paying one fare and one-third for them. You do not need any certificate or anything of that kind. Purchase your ticket at the starting-point to Carrollton and return. They will be on sale in all stations.

The church at Carrollton sends to every Disciple of Christ in Missouri a hearty invitation to come and share with it in this feast of good things. T. A. ABBOTT.

Northern California.

The dedication of the West Side church in San Francisco has been definitely settled for May 29. This is a very practical structure, costing $35,000.

Dr. P. Brett Morgan announces the immediate construction of a small building for the Twenty-fourth street mission and we hope soon to see a strong church out there.

Dr. Geo. Greenwell reports the work at Tenth avenue progressing very well. When their house is completed we look for decided advancement.

The Berkeley church is "building" in earnest now. The foundations are in and the frame work is going up. This will be a roomy "workshop," costing at least $12,000.

Several meetings are in progress. Bro. R. L. McHatton closed at Willows with 44 added, 38 of them by confession and baptism. That was a great shaking up for Willows.

Sister Clara H. Hazelrigg closed a splendid 18 days' meeting at Los Gatos with 31 additions. Now she is in a meeting at Saratoga, a suburban community; 20 added the first 12 days. This board is proud of her work as one of our state evangelists. Pacific Grove will be her next stand on the coast. We have tried hard to hold her here, but business matters seem to make it necessary for her to go east after the Pacific Grove meeting.

A. L. Platt and D. W. Honn, a new team employed by the state board, began a meeting at Chico May 8, and we expect that they will turn this part of the world upside down.

Our finances are in splendid condition and our missionaries have added 575 during nine months. This, with superb weather, bountiful crop outlook and a climate not to be excelled anywhere on earth—well, we should be ungrateful if we were not happy.

I am still prospecting land for that Christian colony site. It looks as though by June first I will have something definite to say.

Healdsburg. J. P. DARGITZ, Cor. Sec.

Western Pennsylvania Notes.

The semi-annual convention of the churches of Christ, in western Pennsylvania, met May 3-5, at Park church in New Castle, Pa. The general remark was that this was the best ever held in the district. The reports were all encouraging, the speeches well prepared and to the point, the fellowship and entertainment delightful and the best.

During the seven months since the annual convention five mission churches had become self-supporting and asked the board to use the money in a more needy field, viz., Bristol street, Pittsburg, Wilkinsburg, Indiana, Homestead and Second Johnstown.

Evangelist F. A. Bright, supported jointly under the A. C. M. S. and W. P. C. M. S., reported eight meetings held, resulting in a total of 275 additions to the churches.

The C. W. B. M. have now a missionary at work, J. D. Dabney at Herron Hill, Pittsburg. This is their first work in this district.

J. A. Joyce reported, as evangelist for the A. C. M. S., supported by Thomas W. Phillips, work in five points with 103 accessions. One new field was entered, Meadville in Crawford Co., with a church now of 42 members.

The Christian Endeavorers have undertaken to raise the means to support the work among the foreign population, especially in the Polish languages. Already over $400 has been promised.

J. F. Allen has resigned at California to take up work in Ohio, and Oscar W. Riley is preaching for California and Phillipsburg. —W. L. Fisher is the new minister at Park church, New Castle. He comes from a successful pastorate at Somerset, and enters upon his new work with great hope and promise. —W. R. Warren, editor of the Christian Worker, is holding a meeting with the Second church, Washington, Pa., W. B. Reed pastor. —Edgar Salkeld, of Hiram college, has taken the work at Homestead, and is on the field. —E. J. Barnett is the new pastor at Scottdale. —Andy J. Ritchie is preaching for Monessen. —A. W. Place has accepted a call to labor for the Bellevue church. —R. J. Bamber, after four years of faithful service at Turtle Creek, has accepted a call to the church at Versailles, Ky., and has removed to his new field. —The church at Knoxville, Fred M. Gordon pastor, laid the corner stone of the new church building Sunday, May 8. —The annual convention will meet at East End, Pittsburg, W. J. Russell pastor, in September.

McKeesport, Pa. J. A. JOYCE, Cor. Sec.

The Land of "Manana."

Bro. Stephen Davis, of Canton, Mo., sends us the following extract from a letter he has received:

SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO, April 25, 1904.

Perhaps I have been here long enough to get what is known as the "manana" spirit, which is, being interpreted, "Never do to-day what you can do to-morrow." This differs from "spring fever" in that it is spring all the year around. This manana spirit is a serious hindrance to the island's progress. It is variously called indolence, shiftlessness and laziness. Hundreds and even thousands of our young men idle away their days on the streets, throwing dice or playing dominoes, while the young ladies of the better class sit on the front balconies and try to look pretty. I know only one young lady who is helping to support herself, and she learned this by traveling through the states and seeing the vigorous young ladies of our cities.

When I first came here, Ramon Sosa, one of our young native helpers, would not be seen carrying a bundle. That would make him as belonging to the laboring class. Although very poor and needing every cent, he would hire a "muchacho" to carry any little package he might have, even though it weighed less than five pounds. But yesterday after walking with me four blocks while I carried a valise which weighed 25 pounds, he took the valise and carried it two more blocks to the street car and seemed to think nothing of it. We Americans are watched very closely and are idealized far more than we suspect. The people are learning more by example than by precept.

Among the lower and laboring classes there exist deep poverty and instability of character. Porto Ricans live only for the present. In every district of the island there are thousands of acres simply growing up to weeds and shrubs. An acre of land set out to bananas, bread fruit and vegetables will support an entire family. Porto Rico is chiefly agricultural and must depend on the land for its revenue. They do not know how to tend their ground and must be taught. For, as Booker T. Washington has said, "He who make two bushels of potatoes grow where only one used to grow is a benefactor."

Mr. Lindsay, our commissioner, is now in Washington consulting with President Roosevelt regarding our educational problems and planning for greater work next year. Congress has voted to pay for 600 Porto Rican teachers who will go to the states this summer to receive normal instruction. Every one of them will return to teach how to sing

"America" and "Star Spangled Banner" more lustily than before. The island must be awakened out of its lethargy. It is said that the United States has already done more than Spain in the last 100 years. Illiteracy has decreased from 87 to 60 per cent. American capital has planted about 50,000 acres of waste land. Y. M. C. A.'s are being organized and are doing good work. Missions, mission schools and orphanages are doing the work of the Master all over the island.

Let us hope that with the United States at the head of affairs of state and through the consecrated prayers and purses of Christians in the states Porto Ricans will soon be in pure life, and, above all, honor the God who placed them in such crowning natural surroundings. We trust you will remember us in your prayers and even hope you may find it in your hearts to help us financially. Any money that may be sent will be credited by the A. C. M. S. ***

Marriage and Divorce.

There are perhaps no themes that more demand attention from the leaders and conservators of social life than these, marriage and divorce. The new psychology and new education are showing us with ever increasing clearness the fundamental and determinative influence of the home upon individual and, therefore, upon social well being. As the foundation of society is the family, so the foundation of the home is marriage. As in theology the determining factor or organizing principle is the conception of God, so in sociology all relations and obligations rest back upon the conception of marriage in its inner, essential nature.

The subject has been one of delicacy and difficulty, especially to the pulpit, and there has been far too little courage manifested by the church in dealing with the matter. If wisdom and understanding were increased, perhaps there would come a fresh access of courage. Knowledge is not only power—it is oftentimes an urgent inspiration. Therefore the church should welcome the assistance of science, especially when its deliverances accord so fully with the spirit of Christianity as it issued from its source. The writer believes that social science is to-day furnishing the Christian preacher with most helpful data for the emphatic declaration and illustration of the eternal validity of Jesus' teaching upon this subject.

As illuminating and vitalizing to the discussion it is worth the preacher's while to read some of the novels now issuing from the press—not all of them, God forbid!

Messrs. McClure and Phillips, New York, have just published a story from the pen of Mrs. H. A. Mitchell Keays, of Chicago, the widow of a well known minister. The title, "He that Eateth Bread with Me," does not indicate, even to the most penetrating, the contents of the volume.

It can scarcely be said that the author has hit upon an original or unusual idea. Indeed it is but a repetition of the idea worked by Thos. Dixon, Jr., in "The One Woman." A man tires of the colorless life he leads with his ideally blameless wife and, attracted by the flaming signal of another who promises full response to all his insurgent cravings, he secures a divorce and marries the other woman. But the forsaken wife has high ideals of marriage and does not believe that her husband's unfaith looses her from her sacred vows. She still loves and is true. Moreover, she sets herself to redeem her husband, and with him the sinning woman who has wronged her. She holds to the sacredness and inviolability of the second marriage as well as the first. It is woman's moral instinct versus her judgment and the judgment of the world. In process of time and chiefly through the influence of his love for his boy, who figures largely in the story, Mackemer's erring heart returns to its first love, and he realizes his vast mistake. He would again secure divorce and remarry his first wife, but she repulses him and holds him sternly to his duty to the second wife. Through her moral integrity in the midst of life racking sorrow, she effects a transformation in the man's character. He learns the lesson of renunciation and self-sacrifice. At the close wife number two is accidentally or providentially killed by the always serviceable train, and we are given to understand that love and right finally triumphed even here below. She who was good all the time and he who became good through much pain and discipline were reunited.

The author arraigns both state and church for their share in sustaining the iniquitous institution of divorce, and her most effective appeal is based upon its injustice and cruelty to children of separated parents.

The story is well written and the dark side is relieved by a breezy and interesting courtship running throughout, between a big-hearted, domestic young physician and a dashing, piquant girl who knows a thing or two and can talk in a most direct and entertaining way. Here are some of her sayings:

"Oh, I've had surgical operations performed upon my outlook on life to-day."

"All the men admire me tremendously, but they stick fast at admiration; and there's nothing satisfying to the soul in that."

"If I found out that I had married a man like Clifford Mackemer, I'd have made it my everlasting business to see that he was kept busy worshipping the ground I walked on."

"If I had suspected that he was wandering from the domestic fold, I'd have hustled out and wandered with him. I wouldn't stand magnificently by and let fate mangle things with a free hand."

CHAS. M. SHARPE.

METTA A. DOWLING, Editor The Young Evangelist.

***

This New Paper is issued weekly and consists of eight pages of three columns each, printed on fine book paper, brand new type, in the best style of the art, and as far as appearance is concerned, will not suffer in comparison with any similar paper in the land.

For Whom Intended. THE ROUND TABLE is a paper for wide-awake, bright-eyed Boys and Girls in their "early teens," who are a little too old for The Young Evangelist and not quite far enough along in years and in their tastes and acquirements to be greatly interested in the material which goes into the columns of Our Young Folks, which is intended for young men and women who are engaged in Bible Study and Christian Work, especially along Sunday-school and Endeavor lines.

Its Contents. THE ROUND TABLE is quite distinctly a "Story Paper," five of its eight pages will usually be occupied with Serial and Shorter Stories, always pure in tone and instructive in character, with fine illustrations. The remaining pages will be filled with Table Talks on a great variety of themes; Odds and Ends of useful information; Outlines of the Sunday-school Lessons and Endeavor Topics; A Puzzle Drawer full of Riddles, Charades and Problems, to exercise the wits of young readers, and in each issue a sufficient amount of Pepper and Spice to keep its readers awake and smooth out any wrinkles that may have a tendency to gather in their faces.

Subscription Price. One copy, one year, 50 cents; in clubs of five, to one address, 40 cents each; in clubs of ten or more to one address, 36 cents each. Quarterly subscriptions at proportional rates.

H. A. Denton's Defense.

I am sorry that Brother Denton has thought it necessary to respond to some remarks which I made concerning his impassioned little speech, which he made during the Missouri Lectureship.

Brother Denton's contention is that he simply took exceptions to certain portions of Dr. Clarke's "Outlines of Theology," and not to everything in the book. No one supposed that he was objecting to everything in the book; nor was this the point of my criticism. Brother Denton made the impression upon those who heard him that he regarded the book as dangerous, and consequently a book that ought not to have been discussed in the Lectureship. If Brother Denton did not mean this then his intense mannerism and severe denunciation were out of place. Nobody objected to Brother Denton's criticising any part of the book or the whole of it, if he wished. That is why the book was on the program, and that was what the members of the Lectureship were there for, also. If Brother Denton had simply selected some portions of the book and had proceeded to criticize the same in a calm and reasonable manner I would personally have been delighted to hear him and might possibly have agreed with all he had to say, for I do not endorse the book in several points of its contention. But Brother Denton's style was not in the spirit of criticism at all; it was simply the style of denunciation. If we had believed what his manner indicated we would all have been justified in reproving ourselves severely for having admitted into our councils a book which was wholly unworthy of such a place. Now, I am satisfied that Brother Denton meant all right. He is incapable of treating his brethren disrespectfully, and he is too good a man to place himself in such a position as he did on that occasion. Personally I have the highest respect for him, but he must excuse me if I cannot approve of his manner in treating most solemn and important questions such as we raised in the discussion concerning Dr. Clarke's book.

Were I so disposed I think I could show why it is needful to discuss such works as the book referred to. In my judgment the time is past when epoch-making books can be set aside by excited declamations, simply because they contain things which are contrary to the traditions of the fathers. There is much in Dr. Clarke's book which may be seriously questioned on critical ground, but I do not believe that his conclusions can be set aside without careful consideration of all the facts of the case. But, however this may be, it is certain that a Lectureship is no place for the kind of criticism in which Brother Denton indulged.

Oklahoma Christian Ministers' Institute.

What everyone pronounced a most helpful, and what all the older members declared was the most successful ministers' institute ever held in the history of the association, convened at Norman, May 10 to 12.

The Christian ministry of the territory was well represented, and from the very beginning a spirit of earnestness and devotion was manifest. J. T. Ogle, of Guthrie, presided with grace over the entire session, and to his executive ability is largely due the system and dispatch with which the different divisions of the program were given. The different places on the program assigned to the Oklahoma ministers were all ably filled. As a whole, the standard set by the papers and speeches of the 1904 institute would do credit to any set of ministers in any state. The paper of B. D. Gillispie, on "The Church and Innocent Amusements"; the paper by Isom Roberts on "Doctrinal Preaching"; the talk by J. M. Monroe on "Church Discipline"; and the speech by Granville Snell on union meetings, were especially helpful and worthy of mention.

Probably the institute, as a whole, expected most from the lecture of S. D. Dutcher, and surely there was no disappointment. The subject was "The Educational Value of Christian Missions," in the delivery of which Brother Dutcher captivated his audience. This effort was really a good-bye to the brethren of Oklahoma, and left much sadness, for although we congratulate Omaha on securing the services of this able, godly man, we are loath to relinquish our claim upon him.

The great inducement offered to the ministry, in the appeal to attend the institute, was that M. M. Davis, of Dallas, Texas, was to be with us and deliver four addresses. Brother Davis came. To those who know him enough has been said; to those who know him not, suffice it to say that his addresses were veritable sledgehammers of truth, and caskets of grace and beauty of spirit. Aside from the educational value of his visit, his presence was a benediction, and his every word one of encouragement and hope.

An unexpected treat came in the visit of the beloved G. L. Wharton, of Hiram, Ohio, who is soon to depart for the third time to India.

The reports given by our corresponding secretary and by several of the territorial living link evangelists, were most encouraging. There are 365 organizations in the territory, other organizations are being effected, and arrangements have been made to establish the cause in the new towns as they spring up along the lines of railroad that are being builded.

Isom Roberts, of Kingfisher, was elected president of the institute for next year, the meeting to be held at Oklahoma City, the Tuesday after the second Lord's day in May.

We separated Thursday evening with the final, gracious words of Brother Davis as a sweet savor, and the higher conception of life and duty gained by the helpful, fraternal association as our inspiration. "May God watch between us till we meet again."

Echoes of the Great May Offering for Home Missions.

I enclose check for $25, the May offering of this mission. I aimed to secure an offering from every member and nearly succeeded, if seventy-five per cent is nearly. Our people are grateful for the aid extended, and realize that we are cared for as a Father careth for his children. The average in the above offering is about 60 cents for those who gave, and 45 cents for the entire membership.

ORILAS G. WHITE.

25th St. Church, Baltimore, Md.

Hope to make it $50. This is an increase over last year.

WILL F. SHAW.

Charleston, Ill.

We have gone beyond our apportionment. I pray God the day may soon come when this congregation shall be a living link in the home work.

BENJ. S. FERRALL.

Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y.

The May offering was not quite finished when I left this morning. Will be gone twelve days in a meeting at Bowling Green, Ky. Had no trouble in raising $150.

Owensboro, Ky.

R. H. CROSSFIELD.

I enclose $126.50, being proceeds of collection from Harlem Avenue Christian church.

Baltimore, Md.

JACOB B. THOMAS.

Enclosed find draft for $47.13. This is the first offering, so far as I can find, that the Island church has taken for home missions.

Wheeling, W. Va.

J. N. SCHOLES.

Enclosed please find a check for $44.45. I tried hard to raise $50, but could not succeed.

I am proud of this much when I think of the hard winter the miners have had. Our membership consists very largely of miners. One brother who gave $2 lost $300 in his business last year. One miner, who said that he makes about $300 a year, gave $10. So when I think of the sacrifices that many have made, I have reason to be proud of this offering.

Last Lord's day we took the offering at Phillipsburg church (P. O., California, Pa.) So far I have about $14. I will try my best to bring it up to $25. You are pretty sure at any rate of $60 from these two churches, whereas neither gave last year.

OSCAR W. RILEY.

California, Pa.

I presented the work of home missions one week ago, and the offering received yesterday was $415, and there are a number who will give and swell this amount considerably. I solicited all the larger pledges personally, and then by letter, and from the pulpit appealed to others. I am sure that you rejoice with us. It will not surprise me that our offering should reach the $450 mark.

HARVEY H. HARMON.

Columbus, Ind.

We finished raising our $300 yesterday for home missions, and so became a living link. We had to try a second time, but am glad we kept at it.

CAREY E. MORGAN.

Paris, Ky.

We will have about $60 when it is all in. The offering is considerably larger than any in the past history of the church.

H. L. VEACH.

Metz, Ind.

My husband, J. S. Richardson, and my daughter, Elizabeth Richardson, and myself want to contribute a dollar each to home missions. We haven't any church nearer than Shreveport, a distance of about one hundred miles, so we have decided to send it to you, feeling assured you will use it in the interest of our state.

MRS. J. S. RICHARDSON.

Delta, La.

I enclose draft for $57.16, almost double the amount given last year.

C. H. WHITEMAN.

Walla Walla, Wash.

Offering for home missions yesterday over $400.

EDGAR D. JONES.

Cleveland, Ohio, May 16.

We have just closed at Little Rock the most satisfactory meeting in the history of mission work in Arkansas.

The array of talent from without the state was superior, consisting of such representatives as A. McLean; Albert Buxton, of Dexter, Mo.; President Zollars, of Texas Christian university; G. W. Muckley, of Kansas City; George Snively, of St. Louis; A. J. Bush, of Texas. There were more of the preachers of the state in attendance than we have succeeded in getting together before. The C. W. B. M. held excellent meetings, occupying one half day and evening. Mrs. Cunningham, of the national board of the C. W. B. M., added to the interest. The ministerial association held a morning session consuming the forenoon of one day. This was very helpful.

The report of the mission board showed that the equivalent of about ten years' work for one man, had been done in the mission field at an outlay of about $2,750 of mission money, resulting in 300 baptisms, 500 other additions (making a total of 864), the building of four houses, the organization of four churches, pastoral care being provided for ten churches in towns of from 2,000 to 12,000 people. We begin the new year feeling much encouraged. The meeting closed on Monday noon. Many of the city pulpits were filled by visiting preachers on Lord's day. This feature was satisfactory. The next convention goes to Paragould.

ALABAMA.

Selma.—Evangelist W. T. Brooks and State Evangelist S. P. Spiegel closed a remarkable meeting, for the south, with the church at Selma, Sunday, May 1. We used the largest auditorium in the city and had immense crowds from the first. Fifty-two were added—thirty by confession, ten from the denominations and twelve by letter. Hundreds heard our plea for the first time. Brother Brooks presented it in a manly way and the spirit of kindness and courtesy left no room for criticism. Brother Spiegel led the chorus of sixty voices with splendid effect. We finished paying for the best located lot in the city last fall, on which to build a new church. The closing night of the meeting we raised money to begin the building this winter, and expect to erect a $15,000 house.—JESSE C. CALDWELL.

CALIFORNIA.

Watsonville, May 11.—Our meeting closed last Sunday night with 26 additions—16 by baptism. It was a great but a good meeting, and there will be no reaction. The work steadily improves. About 40 have united with the church since our work began about four months ago. We are planning for larger things all along the line. This is a noble people, and California is a great place.—M. D. CLUBB.

Ukiah, May 9.—A fine young man made the good confession last night and was baptized the same hour. We have large audiences. We had 183 in Bible-school yesterday.—OTHA WILKISON.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Washington, May 11.—Three accessions to H street church Lord's day evening—two confessions and one by statement. There were 25 additions reported at the ministers' meeting Monday, May 9. Our association enjoyed a visit from Peter Ainslie, who is doing such a great work in Baltimore; also a visit from J. A. Hopkins, our district secretary.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR.

FLORIDA.

Jacksonville, May 10.—One confession last Sunday; four since the meeting closed.—J. T. BOONE.

ILLINOIS.

Waverly.—Mr. and Mrs. Guy B. Williamson, song evangelists and helpers, can be secured to assist in meetings in June and July. Address them at Waverly, Ill.

Milton, May 11.—Work at Milton is moving along nicely. We took the offering for the home work the first Lord's day in May, which amounted to over $20.—C. C. WISHER, pastor.

Peoria.—There were thirteen accessions to the Central church here on Sunday, May 1. Our work is very prosperous and we expect to employ an associate pastor soon. Our third annual banquet, at which Bro. C. S. Medbury was chief speaker, occurred May 6. It was the best banquet we have ever had.—G. B. VAN ARSDALL.

Pleasant Hill, May 9.—Bay church will have a rally May 28 and 29. Several brethren will meet with us and preach during the rally.—O. C. BOLMAN.

Camp Point, May 14.—Our meeting at Chanute, Kan., resulted in the reorganization of the church with 90 members. Next meeting at Perryopolis, Pa.—R. A. OMER.

INDIANA.

Muncie, May 14.—We are in the midst of a stirring revival at Central church. Eight added—six by baptism. Will continue one or two weeks longer. I am being assisted by Brother Le Roy St. John, of Terre Haute, Ind., as soloist and chorus director. He is new among our people, having come recently from the Evangelical church. I say without hesitancy I have not found his equal. He is earnest, consecrated and makes himself loved by all.—CHAS. E. SHULTZ, minister.

Hammond, May 10.—Three confessions at Hammond the last two Sundays. We are planning and have begun a fund for a new church building.—C. J. SHARP, minister.

Kewanna, May 12.—One confession on Lord's day evening. The writer preached the baculaureate sermon to the high school April 24.—I. G. SHAW.

Greenfield.—I began pastorate here May 1 with five additions by relation. One baptism last Wednesday. One at Gladesville, W. Va., on my way from Washington, D. C.—F. D. SAPP.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

South McAlester, May 13.—I recently baptized 16 persons and received four otherwise as a result, in part, of a union meeting held by Oliver Bray.—J. H. TEEL.

IOWA.

Keokuk, May 9.—One by letter here last night. Two by confession at Sugar Creek recently where I assisted M. S. Ackless for some nights. Had to close on account of bad weather when prospects seemed excellent.—J. W. KILBORN.

KANSAS.

Faulkner, May 12.—We have just closed a glorious meeting at Monett, Mo. The meeting continued three weeks. We had 57 additions during the meeting; four the last night of the meeting. The brethren and pastor say it is the best meeting ever held in Monett. Bro. Joe Deatherage is the faithful and untiring pastor. I am ready to answer calls to hold meetings anywhere in the United States.—ELD. J. P. HANER, evangelist.

Lyons, May 9.—One confession and five baptisms at prayer-meeting on last Wednesday evening.—GEO. E. LYON.

Thayer, May 19.—We are in a good meeting here. It is nine days old and there are six additions to date. There is a deep interest and full houses.—SIMPSON ELY.

MARYLAND.

Hagerstown, May 10.—The church in Hagerstown goes forward encouragingly. I shall soon begin my fourth year as pastor of this church. There have been 27 additions to the church since the first of January. Our offering for foreign missions was $126.75, and we will give as much or more for home missions, and not any less for state work. Don't forget to send the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST at once. When one is hungry he does not like to wait.—H. C. KENDRICK.

MICHIGAN.

Saginaw, May 9.—Great service last night. 12 added, seven by letter and five by baptism.—J. S. RAUM.

Saginaw, May 9.—Closed a meeting at St. Louis Friday night, May 6, with 48 additions, eight at the last service. Bro. F. L. Taylor and Sister Edna Young each led the singing two weeks, and rendered splendid service.—J. S. RAUM.

MISSOURI.

Kansas City, May 9.—There were two added at Budd Park congregation last night.—E. H. WILLIAMSON.

Appleton City, May 10.—We took the offering for both home and foreign missions Sunday. It was a splendid offering. Met our apportionment. Also took the offering at Foster as here; was the best offering in the history of the church. Five added there by letter

Sermons by E. S. Ames.

These sermons seek to interpret religion in the light of modern psychology and historical knowledge, with the candor of the scientific spirit. In so far as they accomplish this, they transcend all denominational sectarianism, and promote a knowledge of the truth in which is freedom and essential union.

A series of twelve is being printed—one each month. The twelve will be sent to any address for one dollar. Remittances may be made to E. S. AMES, 5520 Madison Avenue, Chicago.

The subjects of the sermons already printed are:

The Religious Nature of Man.

A Lenten Sermon: the Temptation of Jesus.

Living in All Good Conscience.

and statement since last report.—FRANK JALAGEAS.

Elvins, May 13.—Since last report two more additions, one by confession and baptism, and the other by letter. Received a unanimous call for the second year. During the past year we raised $915, had 46 additions, and lost two of our best members. On account of the strike, the community and church suffered much in the lead belt.—JOHN G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

St. Louis, May 16.—The Sarah street mission had an interesting meeting Lord's day morning, May 15. Bro. H. Makita, a Japanese, who came to this country to attend a Bible-school and a medical school, to prepare himself for missionary work in his own country, spoke for us. He will speak again next Lord's day at 10:30 a. m. at 4442 North Market street. We also enjoyed a visit from Bro. T. B. Larimore, of Florence, Ala., on the night of May 10.—J. W. ATKISSON.

KENTUCKY.

Lexington, May 14.—The second meeting of the Central Kentucky Christian ministers' association will be held at Broadway Christian church here Monday, May 30, at 2 P. M. It is to be hoped that a large number of our Central Kentucky preachers will avail themselves of this opportunity.—W. H. ALLEN, secretary.

NEW MEXICO.

Roswell, May 9.—Three additions here yesterday, making 39 since we began here Feb. 15. I delivered the address for the Odd Fellows' anniversary celebration, April 26.—C. C. HILL.

NEW YORK.

Dunkirk, May 9.—At the invitation of the New York state board we are here as city missionaries. The work had been organized by state secretary Stephen J. Corey in September, with 12 charter members. Upon our arrival we found a lively, happy school, with an average attendance of 47. Thus far we have held Bible-school and communion services in the afternoon in an "upper room," a lodge hall, and prayer-meeting and teachers' meeting in our own home on Wednesday evening. At the third prayer-meeting there were three confessions, a father and two young ladies, one from the M. E.'s. Lord's day, May 8, another young lady confessed Christ as her Savior. We are planning to secure a more suitable room on the first floor. Brother Corey was in our home last week. His presence was indeed an inspiration to us. His report of the work in the state is most encouraging.—R. P. MCPHERSON.

OHIO.

Shreve, May 11.—The offering of the Shreve Christian church exceeded its apportionment for home missions. Apportionment, $50. Two additions by baptism at regular services on Lord's day, May 8.—E. C. HARRIS.

Bellaire, May 11.—Four more added last Lord's day—two by confession and two by statement. Ten the Sunday before, about 20 the past month. The Bible-school is running above 350 nearly every Sunday, and C. E. and Junior are both growing.—SUMNER T. MARTIN.

Moscow, May 9.—J. M. Helm, of New Richmond, closed a very successful meeting at this place, on May 1, with 31 additions—21 by confession and 10 by letter or statement. Brother Helm preaches the gospel in love and simplicity.—P. H. POWER.

Mansfield.—One added from the M. E. church recently.—HOWARD CRAMBLET.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Kingfisher, May 9.—At prayer-meeting last week Judge Amos Ewing, one of our business men and oldest citizens, made the good confession and was baptized.—ISOM ROBERTS.

Oklahoma City, May 8.—Five additions yesterday. Interest continues good. I expect to close my work here on May 22.—S. D. DUTCHER.

TEXAS.

Dallas, May 8.—There have been nine additions to the church since we came, seven by confession and baptism. The C. W. B. M. auxiliary raised $30 as a result of self-denial week.—W. A. F.

McKinney, May 14.—Bro. T. P. Haley has recently spent 17 days with us, preaching both morning and evening. The meeting was more like a school than the modern revival. The audiences were uniformly large, and very eager listeners. The fundamental truths of Christianity were presented in a masterly way. Every church in the city was blessed by these services. There were 11 additions and the congregation strengthened in every grace. The spirit of unity and fraternity was encouraged. We hope to reap a rich harvest from this wise and faithful sowing.—G. L. BUSH.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Parkersburg, May 9.—One confession Lord's day May 8, and one added by statement May 4 at prayer-meeting.—J. D. HULL.

Wheeling, May 9.—Three baptisms here recently, and three received into the church by letter. Our offering to home missions, the first one ever taken in the Island Christian church, was $47. Our Christian Endeavor society is paying $15 to the support of the work in Porto Rico. I should be pleased to spend three weeks of the month of August in an evangelistic meeting with some desiring church.—J. N. SCHOLES.

"Union, Cooperation, Federation, or What?"

CLINTON, O., May 6, 1904.

CLARIS YEUELL, Columbia Mo.:

I am a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and I noticed your caption, "Union, Cooperation, Federation, or What?" which closed with, "remarks are in order." I should like to ask just one question: If you had crossed the mourner's bench and told sinners what to do to be saved, what would have been the result? Awaiting your reply, I am your brother in Christ,

S. P. MOODY.

Reply.

As the Chautauqua supersedes the camp-meeting the mourner's bench is relaxing its grip upon our Methodist brethren, and more modern methods of evangelization are being followed. The mourner's bench is not being relinquished without a struggle, but with departing emotionalism its use is growing gradually less. As a human expedient it has very largely outlived its usefulness. It is not objectionable, necessarily, only when regarded as a divine institution, which it is not; or when it has been made a barrier between the penitent sinner and obedience to the gospel, as it often has been. We should be careful to discriminate and not be carried away with prejudice against any method just because it has been misapplied, or even abused. The mourner's bench and the campmeeting have played very important parts in the history of the church, and especially in the history of the United States, and I believe in the main we are a better people for them. That we have outgrown, or are outgrowing them, does not detract from their past usefulness. It only illustrates:

"Our little systems have their day,
They have their day and cease to be.
They are but broken lights of Thee
And Thou, oh, Lord, art more than they."

It will be seen that I approach this question probably from a little different standpoint from that of my good Brother Moody, but then we have "liberty in opinions and methods" as well as "unity in faith." The services in which I participated with the Methodists were not held for the purpose of telling "sinners what to do to be saved." Their object was to tell "saints" what to do in order to keep saved and to urge them to help save others. They were union meetings between two congregations of Disciples of Christ, presumably saints rather than sinners, with a specific aim in view, which was mutually understood, and Brother Moody can certainly not object to that aim. What would have been the result had I told sinners what to do to be saved, outside of any other considerations, would have depended very much on the spirit in which I had told them, and I may say that incidentally I did tell them by quoting the great commission, in all of its fullness several times, and I also read the whole of Acts 2—but in no spirit of pugilism or pharisaism.

Sinners were impressed deeply by the union services. It is by such means that they are to be influenced to believe that God has sent Christ to be their Savior.

The mourner's bench is going. In losing the bench I fear we are losing the mourners. The spirit is going with the form. The cold blooded and heartless methods of making and taking confessions so much in vogue now are much less effective than the mourner's bench. We might do much worse than "cross the mourner's bench," and much better than tell sinners what to do to be saved in such a way, and then not so much for the purpose primarily of converting them, as to make some believers mad who are as anxious for the salvation of sinners as we are, but who differ with us as to the modus operandi and in their philosophy of conversion, but who have extended Christian courtesies to us in the interests of Christian unity, brotherly kindness and the extension of the kingdom of God to the uttermost parts of the earth. To do such would not be manly and gentlemanly, leave alone Christlike, and would outrage all sense of propriety, and for my part I will never take advantage of such hospitality. For whether we have "union, cooperation, federation or what" we must have courtesy.

CLARIS YEUELL.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—That statement of the Christian Companion that "the church is not built on Christ personally but on the great truths concerning him," is significant, and really marks the unbridgable gulf between those who regard the Christ as a person in the past, whose sole touch with his church is through history, and those who believe in the risen, reigning, immanent Lord who, as spirit, is now living in his people and without doing violence to their will is shaping their actions to divinely appointed ends. It is the difference that exists between traditional religion and vital Christianity, and if organic cleavage takes place among Protestants, as seems quite possible, it will be along that line which marks the boundary between tradition and the life.

Yours sincerely,

FRANCIS M. CUMMINGS.

BARBER.

Daniel Barber was laid to rest in the Oxford cemetery, May 10, 1904, after having lived over 80 years. The funeral services were conducted by Bro. Chas. Roberts, of Grant City. Bro. Barber had for many years been a faithful member of the Christian church.

J. A. MCK.

CHANDLER.

Died, at Blairstown, Mo., May 9, in her 19th year, Jennie Reed, wife of Clarke Chandler. A faithful young Christian from her early life, she was ready for the summons. A mother, a twin brother, a husband and a little son are left to mourn her loss. A very large gathering of tearful friends attended her funeral. The writer preached the sermon, assisted by Bro. Goodwin, of the Cumberland Presbyterian church. S. W. CRUTCHER.

GOFF.

Mrs. Mable A. Goff departed this life May 8, 1904; aged 16 years and 8 months. She leaves a husband and infant son to grieve her loss. The funeral was conducted at the Honey Grove U. B. church. She was laid to rest in the Honey Grove cemetery.

J. A. MCKENZIE.

HOOK.

Mrs. Martha Hook, beloved wife of Elder W. H. Hook, a faithful and efficient minister of the Christian church for more than thirty years, fell asleep May 6, 1904; aged 62. Her affliction from which she had been a patient, yet cheerful sufferer for a long time, was consumption. Hindered from the services of the church for a few years, her ministries in the home circle were heightened, and thereby her loss became the greater to the family which she tenderly loved. The three daughters and one son, all members of the church, joined Bro. Hook at the bedside to receive her parting counsel and witness her sweet resignation to the Master's will. Bro. J. A. Headington assisted at the funeral service. "She hath done what she could," is fitting of her also.

Mexico, Mo.

JONES.

Helen Cox Jones died at Palmyra, Mo., April 12, 1904. Whereas, death has removed from us our beloved sister, we desire to honor her memory by testifying to her faithfulness and constancy as a Christian, as a member of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, as a helper in the aid society, as an active worker in the Christian Endeavor, and we feel we have lost a loyal member. Her presence, her voice, her willingness to know and do, have left with us a memory most dear and inspiring. We extend our sympathy, which is but a feeble expression of what we feel, to her husband, and to all the sorrowing loved ones.

May God sustain them in this trial, is our prayer.

MRS. JIMMIE L. MOORE,

MRS. MARY HULL,

EDDIE McCULLOUGH.

PETERSON.

Sister Silas Peterson, a lifelong member of the Christian church at Darlington, the wife of one of our most honored Christian pioneers, was buried May 7. We preached her funeral sermon.

Current Literature

Any book reviewed in these columns (except "net" books) will be sent postpaid by the Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, on receipt of the published price. For "net" books, add ten per cent for postage.

Churches of Christ, by John T. Brown. (John T. Morton & Co., Louisville, Ky. 700 pages, half Morocco binding $6, postpaid; linen cloth, $5, postpaid.)

Mr. Brown has been ambitious and, to an extent, has succeeded in his ambition. But the very greatness of the task must of necessity defeat the highest purpose of any editor. The book which he has produced will satisfy a large number of the members of the churches of Christ, but others will feel that the field has been by no means covered, and that careful pruning and less commercialism in the book would have added much to its real value. In the very nature of the method of selling the book men who would hardly be called representative are represented, while others who have long been identified with our cause and have been very prominent forces in its advocacy have no place in its columns. The book begins with a lengthy account of "The Restoration Movement" by J. B. Briney. This is followed by accounts of the movement in Australia and in England from the pens of J. J. Haley and W. T. Moore; then the Canadian churches have a chapter devoted to them. Following this are articles on the different missionary societies and accounts of state work. Large cities are then brought to notice, following which are some articles on our different educational institutions. Space is next given to some of the pioneers and others who have been prominent in the restoration movement. Some of our best known evangelists and university and college presidents are then disposed of, and following a brief account of "our benevolences" come photographs and sketches of different churches and workers.

From Talk to Texts, or A Likely Story: Likely Enough, by Addison Ballard, D. D., professor of logic, New York university. (Longmans, Green & Co., New York, London and Bombay, $1 net.)

The object of the author in this little volume is, as he tells us in his preface, "to point through nature an easy way to faith." The peculiarity of his method consists in the fact that instead of taking a text and drawing from it certain conclusions, he takes certain facts or principles in nature and, reasoning from them, reaches the text with which his discussions usually close. The chapter on "The Unobtrusiveness of Nature's Principles" leads him up to the text that the "kingdom of heaven cometh without observation." In the same method the "Parallax of Pain," "The Dial and the Wheels," "Unity and Diversity," "Nature's Guarantee for the Prosperity of the World," "The Likelihood of a Resurrection," "The Psychological and Pneumatical Bodies," etc., are discussed. These are only specimen chapters of which there are twenty-five. The style of the work is original, pungent, suggestive. It has the seeds of sermons in it for thoughtful readers. It is another method of presenting "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," or, in other words, of showing how God's laws run through nature and grace.

Pictures from Pilgrim's Progress, by C. H. Spurgeon. (Fleming H. Revell Co. Price $1 net.)

C. H. Spurgeon was one of the remarkable gifts to the Christian church. He was a past-master in the art of commenting, and was especially steeped in the literature of the old theological writers. He would naturally revel in Bunyan's great allegory, and this commentary on portions of it will be found of much interest and help to those who like simple and clear cut expositions. There is evidence that these addresses were delivered at Mr. Spurgeon's Monday evening prayer-meetings with the special purpose of edifying such as had just begun to go on pilgrimage. The great preacher never had opportunity to revise the addresses, although his son Thomas, who writes the introduction, says he had intended to do this. As it is, we have them very much as he uttered them. They are not the less valuable because unrevised.

The Flame of Fire, by Joseph Hocking. (Fleming H. Revell Co. Price $1.50.)

Mr. Hocking has made some success as a depicter of the life in Cornwall, England, especially the life of the dissenting Methodists. It is a field he knows thoroughly, for it is part of his own life, he having been born and reared in that western portion of the little Island Kingdom. His last book takes us into new fields and gives one the impression that Mr. Hocking had taken a six weeks' trip into the land of the Don to get local color. The story will please young people who like things that are improbable, but that hang together well on a thread of love. It is a story of the inquisition and of good English blades defeating the wiles of Spanish Jesuits. It is full of the swashbuckling element and will appeal to readers who are fond of this kind of thing.

Among May Magazines.

In her article on "The Women of India," contributed to The Youth's Companion of May 12, the Countess of Jersey permits one to look for a moment into the zenanas. She pictures with a graphic pen the contrast between the women who are still severely secluded and those who have eaten of the tree of knowledge and envy the liberty of their European sisters.

Miss Jane Addams, of Hull House, Chicago, contributes to the May Chautauquan an illustrated article on "The Humanizing Tendency of Industrial Education." She urges the development of home crafts—spinning, weaving, etc.—among various classes of people, believing the tendency will be to bring the different classes into closer relation, thus promoting good will and co-operation.

The American Review of Reviews for May, has for its leading article, "The Great Fair at St. Louis." "The Warring Nations of the East" is also rather exhaustively treated. Hudson Maxim discusses "Torpedoes and Torpedo Warfare." There is a timely treatment of Verestchagin, the Russian painter, whose recent death at Port Arthur is lamented by the world of art, together with a wide treatment of Current Topics and Events.

We have made an extract from the interesting article in the Booklovers Magazine on the "Break-Down Gang." There are, as usual, in the May number a profusion of pictures, in color and half-tone, illustrating the newest things in the realm of contemporary art. A character sketch of Senator Quay is a very timely and interesting article, while another that may not be relished by the "geniuses" is one that affirms there is no such thing as "brain-fag"; all they suffer from is "eye-strain."

We may make a more lengthy reference to the important article on Journalism by Mr. Pulitzer in the North American Review. It is followed by an article by Count Cassini, the first he has written in many years. The Russian ambassador states his country's position in the eastern war at the present moment. There is also a paper on the peace commissioner's decision on the Venezuelan episode and one on the Russo-British situation as regards Tibet. Many will be interested in the discussion of the British government's plan to make it possible for Great Britain to grow all her own cotton in her own colonies.

Prof. Goldwin Smith writes on "The Immortality of the Soul." He treats the subject from the historical point of view first, then considers the present development of thought upon the subject, and in a reverential spirit goes into a discussion of the necessity for the human being at the present time to have a belief in some kind of existence after death.

The frontispiece of the Century for May is the latest picture of President Roosevelt, Henry Norman, M. P., under the title, "The Mother of Parliaments," discusses very interestingly the British Parliament, with illustrations. Dr. S. Weir Mitchell continues his "Youth of Washington" told in the form of an autobiography, and told in a most fascinating manner. The supply of fiction is good. Under Topics of the Times, the editor discusses the St. Louis Fair as a "Festival of Peace," "The Arena," edited by B. O. Flower, is practical, or nothing. It deals in a vigorous way with such questions as "Municipal Ownership," "The Supreme Court in the Northern Securities Case," "The Future of Santo Domingo," "Business Reasons vs. Morals," etc.

The opening chapters of the May Atlantic are made brilliant and entertaining by the first installment of Professor Norton's series of letters of John Ruskin, illuminated by his own delightful and illustrative comments and explanations. Colonel Higginson continues his recollections with a paper entitled "Intensely Human," which contains many salient and pathetic reminiscences of the characteristics of the negro race, more especially of the days before and during the war of the rebellion. The Atlantic's series of articles on advertising, which has been so favorably received, is continued with a paper on "The Humors of Advertising," amusingly treated by Rollin Lynde Hartt. Other delightful essays are, "An Hour with our Prejudices," a characteristically humorous paper by Samuel M. Crothers and "The Work of the Woman's Club" by Martha E. D. White.

The World's Work presents a variety of suggestive articles of contemporaneous interest. The recent Ware Service Pension order gives special interest to "Our Enormous Pension Roll," which is an illustrated statement of startling facts and figures. Business events fresh in the public mind give "Making Cotton Pay," which is richly illustrated, and "Cotton Again King" a fresh value. "The Americanization of Porto Rico" is explained by John Ball Osborne, with many illustrations. "Can Labor Unions Be Destroyed?" by William English Walling, shows the significant growth of the employers association movement. In "Professional Training for Business" H. S. Person tells of an interesting educational step, and "A Flower Garden for Every Child," by J. M. Bowles, tells how a whole city is being beautified. Of timely interest is William Thorp's article, "Our Problem in Santo Domingo." In "The Day's Work of the Mayor of New York" Franklin Matthews writes of the official whose power is second only to that of the president. There are other articles of value and the departments of The March of Events, Among the World's Workers and Some of the Best Books on the Far East maintain a high standard.

From Home Acres.

By R. W. Gilder.

A sense of pureness in the air,
Of wholesome life in growing things,
Trembling of blossom, blade and wings,
Perfume and beauty everywhere—
Skies, trees, the grass, the very loam,
I love them all; this is our home.

Million on million years have sped
To frame green fields and bowering hills:
The mortal for a moment tills
His span of earth, then is he dead:
This knows he well, yet doth he hold
His paradise like miser's gold.

I would be nobler than to clutch
My little world with gloating grasp:
Now, while I live, my hands unclasp,
Or let me hold it not so much
For my own joy as for the good
Of all the gentle brotherhood.

And as the seasons move in mirth
Of bloom and bird, of snow and leaf,
May my calm spirit rise from grief
In solace of the lovely earth:
And though the land lie dark or lit,
Let me but gather songs from it.

Coffee-Pail Ezra.

"No, I can't go," and Ezra looked reproachfully at a pail of hot coffee which he had set down close by, under the shadow of the big ore bin.

"Oh, bother!" said Jack Evarts, "your uncle doesn't need that stuff. He's well now—been well this two weeks."

"I know, but Grandma Hillis thinks he needs it."

"Well, he doesn't. You know, half time he doesn't touch it."

"And sometimes he scolds you if you get in the road of his pick," put in Herbert James.

"Yes," and Ezra stroked the long ears of Nancy, the burro, meditatively. "But, then, you see, he might want it to-day, and it wouldn't be there. And, besides, grandma depends on me to take it down to him."

Still he looked at the coffee pail with no friendly eye. If he had had a mother, or even a Sunday-school teacher, he would have learned long before that duty is duty and must be done, however hard it seems, but he had no one except a feeble, old grandmother and a big, busy uncle, who worked down in the mine. At precisely 10 o'clock every day the boy was sent to him with hot coffee, and the task had grown very wearisome to him. At the first, when Uncle Tom was so weak, and the coffee seemed to do him so much good, Ezra was glad to take it. But, for two weeks past, Uncle Tom himself had protested against it, and Ezra felt that he was making a goose of himself in the eyes of everybody, except grandma. She could not be made to see that Tom no longer needed it.

"No, I can't go," said Ezra, again, taking up his pail and turning toward the engine house.

"It's all nonsense, I tell you," said Jack; "grandma'll never know if you don't tell her, and your uncle doesn't want it."

"I know," answered Ezra, resolutely, "but it is my business. Grandma depends on me," and then he began climbing the hill as fast as he could go, which, although he did spill some of the coffee, was the very best thing he could do, for he was the sooner out of temptation. It was no wonder that when Jack and Herbert proposed an expedition out into the sage brush after cotton-tails, Ezra looked at his coffee pail in deep disgust. Every day since Uncle Tom had the fever, grandma had sent the boy with the coffee for him.

At the top of the shaft he gave one rueful look at the two boys and the burro out in the shimmering, sunny valley, and then climbed into the car, nodded to the engineer, and slid down into the dark, close mine. The engineer knew his errand, but he had to scramble out as fast as he could to let the car go on to the seventh, from which ore was being hoisted. At the fifth level, that day, the air seemed unusually close.

"I s'pose it's because I wanted to go after cottontails so much that it seems uncommonly hot and nasty down here to-day," thought Ezra. He lighted his candle, and plodded his way along the low-walled drift. He was in the "old works," long ago stopped out, at the far end of which the company had a gang of men making a vertical shaft, or "upraise," as it is called, to the level above. At irregular intervals, cross-cuts came in from the darkness at either side, leading sometimes only a few feet, and sometimes from some distant ore chamber. Ezra was eleven years old, but to pass the black mouth of an unused cross-cut was still an ordeal to him. Something about its thick silence and darkness and its unknown depth awed and troubled him. He had walked some little distance, trying to keep up his spirits with whistling, when he suddenly halted. His breath was coming quick and short and he began to realize that he was breathing smoke. Where did it come from? Lifting his candle, he peered about carefully. He could see no sign of fire, but the drift was gray with smoke—a heavy, curling mass that was coming toward him in sullen silence.

His first thought was to run for the shaft. But no—where were Uncle Tom and the other men? If the fire was in one of the cross-cuts, the smoke would seek the open shaft, as it would a chimney, and the men would have no warning until the whole drift was ablaze and it would be too late. He must find where it was, and he must reach them if they did not already know. He hurried on, but his light grew dim in the smoke, and his feet stumbled over the uneven floor. His breath was growing painful, and his eyes smarted unbearably. He remembered instinctively having read somewhere that one must not breathe smoke, and he stopped and looked back toward the shaft. He could see the faint twinkle of the light that hung over the car track, and he held out his hand toward it as toward a friend. But he knew that his way led in the other direction. He must find the men. He stumbled on, groping with his eyes shut, every breath a stab of pain and his mind holding but one thought—to reach the others before it was too late. Once he fell headlong, but it was a fortunate fall, for the lid of his coffee pail flew off, and half the contents were dashed in his face. Quickly righting the pail, he dipped his handkerchief in the remaining coffee—one of the big red cotton handkerchiefs of the mining camps—and tied it over his head and face. He could have cried from the feeling of relief that it gave, and the way grew easier until the heat dried the handkerchief and forced him to take it off. Then he groped and stumbled and fell, and picked himself up, and ran on and fell again, and then on once more. His strength was giving out, and the curling, lead-colored mass wrapped about him closer and thicker. It was the battle of a child against a relentless, unreasoning foe, and it was bravely fought. But he could not fight always. His foot caught beneath a loose board, and he fell at full length. Vaguely he felt that the struggle was over, and he was glad he had done his best. He gave a little gasp—and then sat up and looked around him in surprise. The air was clearer, and he could breathe. There was smoke, certainly, but still he could see and breathe. Where was he? How did it happen? And then he saw what made him more anxious still for the men in the upraise. His fall had carried him just past the mouth of a deep cross-cut, from which the smoke was pouring in thick, leaden masses toward the shaft. He could hear the dull crackling of the burning timbers, and he knew that the time was short. He stood up and tried to run, but his mind was in a whirl, and his legs tottered beneath him. Still he would not give up. The worst was past, and as his head grew clearer in the better air, his strength began to come back also.

In less than five minutes the men in the upraise were standing about him, and he was telling them as quickly as he could of their danger and of their one chance of escape.

"We must make a dash for it," said Tom Hillis, who was always the leader. The men nodded, threw down their picks and shovels, and marched grimly out into the drift to meet the foe. How Ezra got through the second time he never knew. He remembered being dragged along by hard, kind hands and, at the last, being lifted on a pair of strong shoulders and carried "pick-a-back" like a baby, but when he opened his eyes he was in the hoisting room, and the superintendent of the mine was there, too, looking very grave and anxious.

"Will he live?" he was asking of the doctor, who was stirring something in a glass.

"Oh, yes. He'll not die yet. He's a plucky chap. He will be all right in a little while."

"It is strange how things happen," the superintendent went on. "It is certainly strange. If this boy had not been going about his plain, everyday business this morning, these men would have been smothered, and the whole mine would have been in such a blaze that we couldn't have stopped it."

When Jack and Herbert came home that night with four cottontails they were very much surprised to find that "Coffee-pail Ezra" had become a hero in the camp, and was to be taken into the superintendent's family to go to school with his own boys.

"It' mighty queer how lucky some folks are," said Jack.

"Tain't so queer," answered Herbert, "when you consider how plucky some folks are."

"Humph. I guess anybody would have warned those men!"

"Maybe they would, and then maybe they wouldn't. But what I am thinking is that there isn't more than one boy in the camp that would have been down there with that coffee-pail when the other boys were going out hunting. That's were the pluck comes in, I'm thinking."—Clara E. Hamilton, in Southern Churchman.

May Flowers.

How the first May flowers must have cheered the hearts of the Pilgrim fathers after that dreary winter at Plymouth! Their trailing pink and snowy bloom is intertwined with many an unwritten story of those days of hardships and adventure, when the arrows and tomahawks of the red men made doubly welcome those sweet-scented visitants in a strange land. They must have been blooming fragrant and fair in the warm, sunny spaces around the cabins, and away deep in the pine forests at the right and left, which stretched away behind the infant settlement in leagues of wilderness, full of perils from wild beasts and murderous Indians, in that early spring day when Samoset stood in the village square in savage gear, shouting his greeting, "Welcome, Englishmen!" By that time maples were in bloom, outlining themselves like trees on fire, and willows and poplars were hanging out their catkins like caterpillars, like tufts of gray wool, like soft, furry pussies, or, all in golden green, dropping dust of gold.

Pleasanter greeting to those pathfinders of old were those pink and white blossoms, lifting themselves up through the slush and lingering drifts, than even the friendly voice of the Indian Sagamore. In a sense it was the greeting of the new land to the strangers, and offered some sort of compensation for what they had left behind in old England—the primroses, hyacinths, eglantines, and all those fair flowerets which Chaucer, Shakespeare and Spenser have celebrated in their verse. We can imagine the Puritan children brushing away the dry leaves in many a hidden recess, and gathering at their will the fragrant offering or the dainty nosegay which their mothers—those stiff, old fashioned dames in their grosgrain gowns, stamen petticoats, kerchiefs and coifs—placed in their quaint mugs or pitchers of delft, to set where the homely rooms would be made pleasanter for their sweetness and bloom.

And the Pilgrim daughters, sweet Mary Chilton and graceful Priscilla Mullins, the heroine of Longfellow's "Courtship of Miles Standish," doubtless, as maidens do now, wore the pretty things on their bosoms or in their hair. It is pleasant to think of this bit of romance in their hard, prosaic lives, and the flowers, "modest and sweet," as the poet says, are excellent types of Puritan maidens. Doubtless Priscilla many a time brought in the "Puritan flowers," to shed sweetness in the home of John Alden, whose "Mayflower" she was, and where she spun like the "beautiful Bertha, the queen of Helvetia," choicest picture that we have of those primitive days.—F. M. Colby in New York Observer.

"Yes, sir, I allus have believed providence does everything for the best."

"How 'bout that March harricane?" "Split the trees to kindlin' wood—stove length."

"Well, how 'bout the airthquake?" "Swallered the land ten minutes 'fore the sheriff come to levy on it."—Atlanta Constitution.

The Green Witch.

CHAPTER XI.

Perhaps it was a mistake for George to make the long journey to the cattle shed on successive nights, since he was unused to long walks. But he was anxious to have his duty done for that week, and though he dreaded a second encounter with the "Green Witch," he set forth Tuesday night, resolute to keep the promise he had made Spot Stoner. His apprehensions were unrealized. He did not encounter Margaret, though as he wrote Spot's name, the sight of the bloody signature just above was like a ghostly presence.

The next day when he drove up before the sidewalk in front of the grocery store, Mr. Stoner was standing at the door.

"You look sleepy," said the grocer, looking keenly at his employe. "I'm afraid you're carrying this studying-business too far. Just as sure as you try to hold to business with one hand and education with the other, you'll be pulled to pieces."

"I did not study last night," George replied.

"They don't any more go together," pursued the other, "than hot biscuits and ice cream. I'm not complaining of your work, for you're all right. And I've a notion to promote you. But I've got to feel sure you're what I want. I want a person that thinks his business and nothing but it! All this Latin and mathematics and gim-cracks you're loading up with, will just make you run slower through the world. You've got your living to earn, and there's a living for you with me. Will you have it? The less cargo you have aboard, the swifter you'll travel. Will you clamp your mind to your business, and keep it clamped? You're wasting time studying at nights. It's not only that you ought to be asleep so you can work with better spirit the next day; it's more than that. You're filling your head with a whole lot of stuff that is inconsistent with the necessities of your condition. A fellow's head is like a balloon; the more you crowd into it the lighter it gets."

"Mr. Stoner," said George, with some hesitation, "if I ever fail in my duty to you, I shall deserve dismissal. But as long as I work faithfully, I hope you won't insist upon my giving up everything. I mean to make a man of myself. I know there is a high place for me in the world, and I shall do all I can to reach it, without neglecting duty."

"I believe there is a high place for you, George, and I like you and respect you, and will help you to it, if you agree to drop your foolishness. I'll make a man of you, for your own sake as well as for your father's. And the way to make a man of oneself is to make money. You've got to have it to be anything. Money isn't in Latin, or science, or literature; it's in hams and corn and wheat and potatoes. You want to reach a high place? Money will buy the ladder to the highest places in this country. Look at the long-legged, worried-faced, spotted-clothed school teachers over the county, with enough geography and arithmetic in their craniums to lay off a world just like this one, and estimate the cost of it. They work in knowledge, just as a miller does in flour, but how much is thought of them? Not one has as much influence and power in the community as a successful stock-dealer, however ignorant, who has thought nothing but cattle so long that he is humped over and droop-headed like one of his own bulls."

"And you want me to be like that?" asked George laughing.

Mr. Stoner looked fixedly at George and said, "Will you give up this education nonsense like a sensible fellow?"

"Mr. Stoner," said George, "to give up that would be giving up the part of myself that I honor most. I suppose I am not by nature a business person. I know money is important, but I can't help thinking other things are more important, too."

"We're wasting precious time," said the other abruptly. "There's a load for you in the house." George dejectedly entered the store, and carried out the various packages. "And the sack of flour is for Tuck Hootin," said Mr. Stoner, completing his directions in a dry voice. "Know where he lives?"

"Ye-es, sir," said George, his spirits falling still lower.

"Lives in a tent—Hobbs's addition," said the other entering his store. George drove away, realizing that he had lost the chance of promotion. Yet he felt that he could not have acted otherwise. As he drew near "Hobbs's addition" he almost forgot his conversation with his employer. The recollection of Tuck Hootin's threats came vividly to mind. He fancied he saw the drunken man, disheveled and armed with a stick, hiding in his tent, ready to rush forth and offer battle. "Hobbs's addition" appeared queerly deserted. No one was to be seen in the narrow, ill-kept lanes. The tent came in sight, grimy, silent, sinister. The front curtains were tied back with greasy ropes showing that someone was at home. Even Old Poll sniffed the air suspiciously. As George climbed from the wagon, he wondered if Tuck had ordered the sack of flour to get the young man in his power. Feeling somewhat like a soldier sent to face certain danger, George drew the sack upon his shoulder and passed through the space where once had stood a gate. At that moment a man issued from the tent. It was Tuck Hootin.

The former delivery-man was tall and thin with a hard, dry, wrinkled skin, heavy black eyebrows, a nose like an eagle's beak, black and rather small eyes, and a long suit of hair. The condition of his hair usually indicated Tuck's degree of sobriety. On the occasion of George's former visit to "Hobbs's addition," this hair had risen like a threatening black tide from behind, had run riot over the face, had overflowed the collar. Now it lay in peaceful repose, pasted low upon the brow in two symmetrical scallops.

"Ah, my son," said Tuck in a genial voice, "this way, my son, this way! Strange to see another delivering from that wagon! But the world itself is strange; I am strange; you are strange. Follow me." He bowed his towering form, and entered the tent. George obeyed with hidden reluctance. The tent was thrown together into one large circular apartment, but certain looped-up curtains showed where, at night, it was divided into rooms. There was a board floor not very neat, and bare of covering. Mattresses, covered by red spreads, were upon the floor, and the air was faintly suggestive of them, though it spoke louder of a pot of cabbage which was blubbering on a rusty stove. Before the stove sat a large, hard featured woman with an iron spoon in her hand. Upon the floor sat a girl, of about George's age, dressed in rags. The woman was untidy and meanly clothed. There was, indeed, no evidence of aspirations above sordid poverty, save in the two glistening black scallops upon Tuck's brow.

"Set the sack in this goods box," continued the master of the tent in his friendly voice, "and at the same time receive my thanks for burdening yourself with the load."

"Hain't he paid to do it?" said the woman suddenly, rapping the tin top of the cabbage-pot with her spoon.

"Mr. George Clayton," said Tuck, as the other slipped the load from his back, "this is my wife."

"I hain't his first one, nuther," remarked Mrs. Hootin, who did not appear in an agreeable humor. "I hain't the only fool of the name."

Tuck looked thoughtfully at the large, forbidding lady, and apparently gave her up. "And this is my daughter, George," he said, nodding toward the girl who sat upon the floor. For the first time she lifted her face, but George had recognized Marget at the first glance. There was a dull red glow in her cheeks. Her hair was unkempt, and the condition of her garments heedless and dirty. Her eyes met his defiantly—thus he interpreted the steady gaze. He bowed and turned away.

"The other children are all at school, or I would present them," said Tuck. "Except Lizzie—she hires out; she's a steady girl and helps her poor father and mother earn a living. She's only thirteen, too. Marget—she sits before you—will not turn her hand to work. But we have to put up with what is pushed upon us. I do; you do."

Marget bowed her face again, and plucked nervously at her short skirt. George murmured something about being in a hurry, and left the tent. Tuck followed him to the wagon.

"My son," he said, "when you were passing here one evening, you found me not exactly myself. Not being myself, I threatened you, and said it was my intention to punish you for depriving me of my job. I hope you have forgotten my foolish words. Of course I know it's not your fault that I lost my position. I would not have spoken so, had I been the original Tuck. But people cannot be always themselves. The world is constituted along those lines. I can't always be; you can't; who can?"

"I am very glad, sir, to hear you say this," declared George heartily. "I have been very much troubled by the thought of exciting your enmity. I did nothing to displace you at the store. It was just—just luck."

"Yes, yes, my son, say no more about it. What did you think of my wife? Isn't she a large, able-bodied person?"

"She is quite large," responded George, gathering up his lines.

"Yes, so she is," Tuck responded not without enthusiasm. "I just got her about a week ago. She's a large woman. Well, good-bye, my son."

George had not driven far from "Hobbs's addition," when he was hailed by Mr. Teeny, who wanted a lift to town. As the teamster climbed upon the seat, he observed, "I see you a-comin' outen pore ole Tuck's tent. You'd better of took my warnin', George, an' not a-come a-nigh him."

"I was obliged to bring his sack of flour," responded George.

"It is fur you, of course," replied Mr. Teeny indifferently, "to choose betwixt a sack of flour an' a busted head. When I've warned a man, I've did my dooty; an' ef he gits ran over by the engine after that, he must not lay his injuries to the injustice of our social system."

"I am glad to say," replied George, "that Mr. Hootin is quite friendly with me, and doesn't bear me ill-will for getting his position. He spoke frankly and, in a way, apologized for what had happened."

"There air two Tucks," said Mr. Teeny didactically; "drunk Tuck an' sober Tuck. The two ain't nothin' similar. To be on the safe side of my brother-in-law—or, as I may say, my half-brother-in-law, now's he's got him another woman—I say, to be on the safe side, you must make friends with drunk Tuck and sober Tuck. They don't know each other. Him a-layin' hisself out to be polite when free from the influence, won't cut no figger with drunk Tuck. Like as not, he's pitfallin' fur you right now, so that when he's under the influence, he kin git you easier by the gills. When you fust went to workin' at Stoner's, I heerd Tuck 'low he'd trim you. He hain't never done it, has you he?"

"Certainly not."

"Well, now, ef you get ran over, don't say they warn't no signposts up, with 'RAILROAD CROSSIN'' on 'em in white letters. An' no wonder! Pore ole Tuck have had enough troubles to make him sour. It don't matter how sweet an' juicy yore fruit is when you go to preserve it; ef you don't put in sugar, but contrary-wise, add vinegar, what sort of a mess do you concoct? Thus has it been with pore ole Tuck. He was as good a peach as ever growed, but society when it put him up, left out all the sugar of prosperity. He's sour to the seed. Do you blame him? I blame society. But it matters not who we blame; the effect will be the same, if he meets you alone while under the influence. He have cast about fur some sort of anchorage. You see his new wife, I reckon. She's a large woman."

"Yes, sir," said George.

"Yes, Tuck have got a strong, massive woman. But Mag Hootin still idles an' sulks an'—did he tell you the plan?"

George shook his head. The conversation was enjoyed only by Mr. Teeny.

"He's goin' to send her forth into the world'. He's goin' to set her upon her own responsibility. Work or shirk, do or rue, it's to her to make decision. She won't do nothin' at home, she won't hire out, she won't obey her pa. Tuck's new wife says to send her forth; and Tuck's a-goin' to do it."

"How will he send her forth?" inquired George, mystified by the rolling phrase.

"He'll lead her to his tent-door," said Mr. Teeny, "and wave his arm and say, 'Mag, there lies the world. Go an' dig yoreself a hole in it!' And she'll go, or pore ole Tuck will know the reason why! But she needn't come to me. It's all I can do, under our social system, to earn enough for my own fambly; I can't divide with a girl, though my niece, who won't lay her han' to a lick of work ef she know's what it is!"

"Oh, Mr. Teeny!" cried George in distress. "What will become of her if she is thrown out of her home among strangers? She is just a girl! Surely her father won't force her to go away. Think what may become of her—of any girl her age—without money, or friends, or a home."

"She's no 'count, George, she is too onry to live, rohow. Nobody deserves sympathy who isn't willin' to work to earn it. What 'll become of her, I don't know. Ef she'd fall to work, it 'ud be different. It all depends on her, not on us."

This conversation with Mr. Teeny

A MILLION FROM A MILLION LEAVES A MILLION MORE.

That is to say, a million dollars from a million disciples for Home Missions would not impoverish, but enrich. Every heart would be rich toward God. Every contributor would be confident of treasure laid up in heaven. The cause of Christ would be set forward a decade. We ought to average one dollar a member for Home Missions.

We are asking for only $200,000 this year to answer the appeals which already amount to double our spendable income of last year.

depressed George for the remainder of that day. All the stores had agreed to close of evenings at eight o'clock until spring, and this gave an extra hour for study; but as the young man sat alone in his room, he was unable to fix his mind upon his books. There floated before him the vision of the waterfall with the moonlight over it, a form seated upon a prostrate tree near by, and the red and brown and yellow leaves falling ceaselessly. He seemed to see Marget's face, and upon it a haunting appeal, an unutterable longing, a charm, the very embodiment of the hazy, ethereal beauty of October. He heard her voice mingling wonderfully with the nature-music of the stream; he caught her words,

"There's no place so dreary as the place that I call home."

Orders continue for "Sunlit Way," a children's day exercise of rare merit. 5 cents each, 55 cents per dozen, $4.25 per 100.

We have at last secured an American Revised New Testament, in full cloth, for 20 cents, postpaid. We have the Bible for 45 cents, postpaid.

Not a complaint has come to us from those ordering our baptismal suits, showing all are well pleased, and why not? They are the best made, while the price is the lowest.

The remarkable book offer, which has been standing as per our announcement, goes out in one week from this issue of the paper, so the tardy ones must now move quickly or be left for good.

The offers for "Helping Hand" come from the young people who wish to post themselves on the Y. P. S. C. E. work in all its organization and workings, and 25 cents is well invested with that in view.

Our stock of marriage certificates and booklets has been greatly reduced this last week, but is again fully supplied, so you need not wait, but on with the ceremonies, then the certificates. Price, 20 cents and up.

For those wishing help in their service at the Lord's table, "Half Hour Studies at the Cross" is just the thing, while the companion volumes, "Alone with God," and "Heavenward Way" help us in private devotion and meditation.

For a first class American or Oxford Bible, write us, as we have all the grades and prices; but we are advising teachers to use the Nelson, as it has surely come to stay, and the sooner we familiarize ourselves with it the better for us and our work.

In Bible-school work, we still urge the use of the "Guide Book," 25 cents, as it takes up all the various phases of the school, discussing fully the officers, teachers, exercises, committees, indeed all the features of the school and its successful operation.

We have one set of the Standard Dictionary in full morocco, the finest made, market price, $26, and we will send it to the first one that orders it at Raccoon John Smith, at 50 cents, has had just such a run as was expected, for never before has such a book been offered at such a price. One pastor has been putting them into the hands of his brethren for loaning among their neighbors, and good results will come of all such reading.

"The future, after all, will not usher in so great a change as some imagine. This mortal must put on immortality, but we will hold to the types of character which we have formed here. It may be that we take up our future life very much at the place where we lay down the present." Dr. W. T. Moore's very suggestive treatment of this subject in "Man Preparing for Other Worlds" (500 pages, crown, 8vo, $2), is but a part of an exhaustive analysis of the spiritual man's career. It is the most original book written on this subject.

A brother in remitting for other copies of the Life of John Smith, asks, "How can you sell such a book in such binding at 50 cents?" Well, we just can't, but then, we said we would and we are going to stay with it, at least one week longer; but unless the offer is renewed it goes out then. Tidings of Salvation is the cheap book this week, and in boards at $1.25, prepaid, is as cheap as "John Smith." But the stock is limited.

In a lengthy review of "Man Preparing for Other Worlds," price, $2, the Christian Century says: "We have here a big theme and a big book.—Dr. Moore has given us a readable book and one that suggests profound thought and inspires high living.—The author has no fears of the finding of the modern scientific spirit. Neither evolution nor criticism has any terror for him.—The book is what the author wished it to be, practical. Its spirit is always thoroughly Christian. It abounds in the Christian graces, faith, hope and charity. The author's faith in God and love for man are so real and so large that he is always optimistic. Human life begins well, has its ups and downs, but ends gloriously. Of the fact of God's fatherly love and the hope of the glorious issue of man's discipline, the book leaves no doubt."

If your hands become hard and chapped from frequent washings, examine carefully the soap you use. A cheap toilet soap, you will find, is greasy, harsh and does not rinse easily. Ivory Soap makes a profuse lather that removes the dirt and yet rinses readily. The natural oil of the skin is not removed and the skin is left soft and smooth.

Ivory Soap is 99<sup>44</sup>/<sub>100</sub> Per Cent. Pure.

Christian University.

On last Monday we moved into the new university building at Canton, Mo. Appropriate services were held in the morning at chapel exercises and the students had a bon-fire and general canonading at night, at which time about 20 pounds of powder were burned.

The building will accommodate about 500 students. It is the finest modern school building in the state; many others are more costly, but none are better suited for the purpose for which it was built.

It has 36 rooms, including reception rooms, library, chemical, mechanical and recitation rooms for music, art and business department; also a gymnasium for the boys, another for the girls and separate wardrobes, wash and toilet rooms for each. The chapel is furnished with modern folding seats, a large rostrum and double swinging doors for all rooms.

The building is lighted by electric lights and heated with steam heat, and all classes, including opening and closing of school, are regulated by a large $200 automatic clock with three subordinate automatic locks; and electric bells and speaking tubes are connected with each room from the president's room.

There is running water from an artesian mineral well, which for medicinal properties, I suppose, is not surpassed by even the famous White Sulphur Springs of West Virginia.

As a health resort for a large body of students, Canton furnishes unsurpassed advantages. Board, house rent and tuition are reasonably low, so that the future of the school cannot but be prosperous, and nearly all this building has been done by the people of Canton.

Now if the brotherhood of the state will endow it as it should be, Christian university can be made the most influential school in the country.

Current Events

The Cuban republic is two years old. That is a greater age than many administrations have attained in Latin-American republics, and, as there is no imminent probability of a revolution, it must be conceded that the Cuban government has earned for itself a very considerable measure of confidence from the world at large. On May 20, 1902, the American flag was lowered at Havana, the single-starred Cuban emblem was hoisted, and General Wood, with his troops, sailed away from the island. Cuba has had her troubles since then. Some of them have been serious and one, the question of paying the members of the so-called "Army of Liberation," is not yet satisfactorily settled. But, thanks to the kindly care and wise oversight of her foster-mother, the infant republic has escaped the most dangerous diseases of infancy. The commerce of the island has very greatly increased over that of the most prosperous years of the Spanish regime. The history of the past five years has proven several things. It has proven the wisdom of introducing a people to self government gradually when they have not been accustomed to it. It has proven that hauling down the flag is not necessarily either a dishonorable or an unwise procedure. It has proven that, under proper conditions and with the necessary safeguards, a composite Latin-American people may be capable of governing themselves reasonably well, and so it has justified the attitude which the United States took in the war with Spain that Cuba should be free.

Notable among all the notables who are to visit the United States this World's Fair year, is Prince Pu Lun. Prince Pu Lun, crown prince of China and heir apparent to the throne of that ancient empire. He comes ostensibly as Chinese commissioner to the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, but a less exalted dignity could have filled that position quite as well, and his office is really a much larger one than that. He is an ambassador extraordinary to the American people and also an educational and industrial commission to find out everything worth knowing. During his tour through the United States he has adopted as democratic manners as possible to enable him to come into close touch with the people who represent the enterprises in which he is interested. He does not speak English, but the genial and accomplished Mr. Wong, who accompanies him as vice-commissioner, serves as interpreter. During the past few years the United States has had a few Chinese visitors who have given us a new idea of the possibilities of their race. First came the great Li Hung Chang, who was perhaps more great than good. Then Minister Wu delighted us with his eloquence and surprised us with his opinions. Mr. Wong himself has made the best possible impression. And now the imperial crown prince, by the very fact that he is willing to go so far from home and to express his eagerness to learn what he can for the improvement of his people, has won our respect and quickened the hope that he may, when he comes to the throne, give China a genuine reform administration.

The rule against employing married women as teachers in the public schools has been in force so long that we have almost come to consider it a natural and inevitable arrangement. Attention has been called to it again by the recent case of a teacher at whose death the fact was revealed that she had been married for eleven years, but had kept her marriage secret even from her closest friends so that she might hold her position. Probably there are not a great many cases of this sort. But, however that may be, the working of the rule is of doubtful value. It was intended to prevent married women from teaching. Its effect is to prevent teachers from marrying. These two things are not the same. The fundamental error which seems to underlie the present rule is the assumption that the distribution of positions in the public schools, at least so far as women are concerned, is a sort of charity which should be bestowed upon the most needy applicants, and that unmarried women need the money more than married women do. The second of these assumptions may or may not be correct. The first is perhaps more posterously inaccurate than any other one proposition which could be made about the teaching profession. Our schools are not eleemosynary institutions, and it is not the bestowal of charity to give a woman a place on the teaching force. The pay roll of the public schools is about as far from being a pension list as anything could be. Considering the increasing demands that are being made upon the teaching profession, and the more and more rigorous demand for efficiency, it seems almost time to eliminate spinsterhood from the list of necessary qualifications for obtaining or holding a position in the public schools.

The "Cleveland peril" refuses to go down; not because there is any probability that the nomination will fall to him, but because there seems to be no probability that it will go to any other one person. The Hearst boom was called dead after the decisive defeat of his supporters in the Indiana Democratic convention last week, which was considered rather a crucial point in the campaign. But the almost simultaneous convention in Iowa elected a Hearst delegation. As the matter stands now, 122 delegates have been elected with instructions to vote for Parker, and 76 for Hearst, while a considerably larger number of the delegates already chosen will go to the convention uninstructed. The Hearst managers are still claiming that they will control more than one-third of the votes in the convention and will thus be able at least to exercise a veto power under the two-thirds rule, and dictate terms.

The Republican leaders are trying to find men to fill two important vacancies: the nomination for the vice-presidency and the chairmanship of the national committee. It is rumored that Mr. Cortelyou will resign from the cabinet to accept the latter place. The national chairmanship is an immensely important place, and the tendency, as it seems to us, is to make it too important. To be an eminently successful chairman, a man must be, or must for the time become, more a partisan than a statesman, and in so doing he inevitably acquires a sort of reputation which disqualifies him from rendering the highest possible service to the country.

As to the vice-presidency, Mr. Cannon is busily denying his candidacy, and Mr. Hitt, of Illinois, admits his own willingness to be considered in that connection. The history of the vice-presidency does not warrant the spirit of levity in which that office is usually viewed. Eight men who were elected as vice-presidents have later occupied the presidential chair, three by election and five by succeeding to the office on the death of the president.

Two state contests have attracted very wide attention. Mr. Folk has now enough instructed delegates to insure his nomination for governor on the Democratic ticket of Missouri. He has not attempted to dictate the ticket, but it is very clear that if a man like Mr. Cook, who is clearly not in sympathy with Mr. Folk's ideas, be chosen as secretary of state, the Missouri electorate will not only put themselves in an anomalous position, but will do much to defeat all progress in the direction of purer government. In Illinois, in the greatest "deadlock" fight on record, the Republican convention adjourned until May 31. After fifty-eight ballots there was little change in the situation, other than that Governor Yates's chances for re-nomination seem very slim. But by throwing his forces to any candidate he can name his successor. Who will it be? Deneen, the upright young Chicago attorney, is our own choice. He is much the stamp of man that Mr. Folk is.

The Methodist conference at Los Angeles has been unique in more than one respect. Perhaps the most striking event up to the time of this writing has been the break in the ranks of the episcopacy. No less than eight vacancies were created by death and retirements, five of these being superannuated by vote of the conference. This is an unheard-of proceeding. Dr. Merrill, who has for thirty-two years been a bishop and for nearly sixty years a minister, voluntarily preferred a request to be placed upon the retired list. Bishop Foster, who since 1896 has lived in retirement in Boston, and Bishop Hurst, now dead, made a second and third vacancy to be filled. Then the conference did the unusual. It retired five bishops by reason of age and infirmity. None of these distinguished Methodists is incapable either physically or mentally. This fact made it all the more heart-rending and there was quite a respectable minority against the proposal, yet the majority of the conference believed that the church as a whole could be better served if these beloved and tried servants should in active duties give place to younger men. Long journeys and the constant burden of responsibility were the reasons for the change. So Bishop Andrews, noted as a skillful administrator, Bishop Foss, scholar and educator, Bishop Mallalieu, of evangelistic fame, Bishop Walden, administrator and publisher, and Bishop Vincent, founder of Chautauqua and one of the inspirational men of this age, have been relieved of the active required duties of their office, though they will retain general episcopal functions, such as being advisers of the church and members of its chief committees and, in emergency, or at request, may act as chairmen of conferences. After six months they will be on half-pay. There is no degradation of these distinguished leaders in this act of the conference. If the mere loss of active office should be felt by any of them he may take consolation in a remark once made by a good Methodist bishop that "there will be no bishops in heaven." And it is not a question of the "dead line." That varies with the man. Many a preacher of sixty or seventy years of age is to-day more effective in his work and more valuable to the church than many a one just out of college or in middle life. But while a man of seventy may give unequalled counsel he may be far from the best person to go on a hunting expedition.

The World's Fair executive and St. Louis newspaper men had as their guests during the whole of the past week, journalists from every part of the United States and many countries abroad. It was a great gathering and has accomplished much, we are sure, that will count in the interests of good, right and truth. One of the most interesting speeches was that of Captain King in the opening of the World's Press Parliament. The editor of the Globe-Democrat very briefly contrasted the difference in the numbers of the newspapers one hundred years ago and to-day. Then there was but one newspaper in all the Louisiana purchase. To-day there are over 7,000, or more than there were one hundred years ago in the entire world. The 1,000 people of St. Louis had no means, one hundred years ago, of "printing the momentous fact that the United States had suddenly expanded to continental dimensions. It was only by hearsay and the slow speech of hunters and trappers that the news was carried to the 50,000 inhabitants of the acquired territory of 1,000,000 square miles, in which there is now a population of 15,000,000, or one person for each dollar of the original investment. There were then but 220 newspapers in the whole country, not so many as there are now in Oklahoma. Four years passed before the first American newspaper was established west of the Mississippi." Now there are great newspapers in all the large cities and they are of metropolitan rank in all but circulation, and compared with New York journals they probably reach a wider circle of readers, when the populations of cities are compared. As Captain King said, the newspapers "constitute a permanent and potential force in the world, helping to shape those steps of destiny which we call the march of civilization." And one of the notable expressions at this parliament was the repeated wish that the press be above everything else "an agency of peace."

It is believed by many keen observers that not the drink curse, but the betting evil, is the great open sore in the life of England. It would be difficult to say which of these vices of the old country is the more regnant in our own country. From the open enemies it has made, the drink evil seems to be greater, it having even a political party pledged to its annihilation. But the ramifications of the gambling evil are very wide. A great blow has just been delivered to it in the decision of President Clowry of the Western Union Telegraph company to discontinue that company's special race-track service. If now a national law could be passed prohibiting newspapers containing betting news from passing through the mails, the greatest source of evil connected with horse-racing would be very much minimized. Chicago recently abolished what are known as "tickers," but the newspapers still supply betting tips and publish the "odds." The information is not so up-to-the-minute, but it is none the less a great source of evil. In New York an effort is now being made to close the pool rooms, and it is positively declared that last year's policy of suppression at Saratoga will prevail this year.

The war news is very unreliable. Many rumors are in circulation. Some minor and unimportant skirmishes have taken place, victory being on one side and then the other. One report says the Cossacks stopped the advance of the Japanese on Mukden. And the Russians claim the capture of three Japanese cruisers. The most important report, were there truth in it, would be the repulse of the Japanese in an attack on Port Arthur. This attack has been expected, and if the Japs have been repulsed, even though the rumored 15,000 loss be greatly exaggerated, it may mean a serious blow to their plans and their ultimate outworking.

Not all policemen are bad, but the majority of them, unfortunately, are under the control of Police bosses. The conviction of Thuggery. of Patrolman Flynn, of St. Louis, may be a warning to both police and wire pullers that the public not only has rights, but can, when it will, insist on them. Flynn failed, according to the evidence, to do his duty and connived at thuggery practices at a recent election in St. Louis. But much has yet to be done before citizenship can claim its victory over rowdism. The conviction of Flynn, however, is an important initial step.

"Dr. Harris and the Agnostic School-House."

Soon after the meeting of the National Educational Association in Boston last year, we published in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST an extract from an address by Dr. W. T. Harris, United States Commissioner of Education, in which, arguing against the introduction of religion into the schools, he was reported as saying that "the attitude of mind cultivated in secular instruction is unfitted for the approach to religious truths," and that the mood of mind suited for the acquisition of an education "is necessarily hostile and skeptical in its attitude towards religious truth." Without having read the whole speech, we ventured to criticise the statement as ill-considered, as out of harmony with the facts, and as well calculated to injure the cause of religion. We insisted that there was no such hostility as the statement from Dr. Harris indicated between the method of acquiring religious knowledge and that of acquiring any other knowledge, and that the remark seemed to us to indicate the lack of a clear apprehension of religion as a normal and essential part of our human nature.

We have seen no other criticism of the address until recently, when our attention has been called to a pamphlet under the above title written by Timothy Brosnahan, S. J. This shrewd Roman Catholic scholar has seized with eagerness what he calls the "frank admission" of Dr. Harris, and makes it the occasion of setting forth Roman Catholicism as the champion of religion and of religious instruction as against Protestantism, which favors methods of instruction hostile to religion. We are pleased neither with the spirit nor the apparent motive of the pamphlet, but at the same time it clearly points out the erroneous character of the statement of Dr. Harris, and uses it with great effect to buttress the Roman Catholic position in relation to the public schools. There is apparent justice in the point he makes that while Protestants have been very quick to denounce Roman Catholics as un-American for calling our schools "ungodly," they seem to have become as "silent as the dumb dogs of Isaias" in the presence of this statement of Dr. Harris. We do not know whether the address was criticised at the time of its delivery or not, but we have not noticed any adverse criticism in the religious press since then. We are sure, however, that, if the idea prevails that the training in our public schools unfits the minds of the children for the reception of religious truths, both the public schools and religion must suffer from the false idea.

It is not without force that our Jesuit brother states the logic of Dr. Harris's position thus: "The Creator has endowed us with intellectual faculties which we cannot exercise in acquiring a knowledge of His creation and the laws by which He has ordered all things in measure and number and weight, without becoming hostile to Him and skeptical regarding His existence and attributes." That would, indeed, be a strange fact if it were a fact. He also points out the fact known to all educators that the "principle of authority" has its place in education just as truly as in religion, and that it is impossible for children "to verify the source and to submit all tradition to probabilities of common experience." Referring to this statement, our critic says: "Fancy the boys and girls of some elementary school, or even high school, sedately verifying the sources of history, surrounded by ancient tomes, original records and the documents of official archives, delving into the public and private correspondence of historical personages, collating passages from one source with those of another, reading with ease the various languages in which diplomatic and state papers are written." The fact is, there are only a few scholars that do this sort of work, and the rest of us take it on their authority. In further satirical treatment of this theory of verification, this Catholic critic says: "The school children of the land would become a horde of sixteen million peripatetics in knickerbockers and short skirts, always on the road, verifying the existence of geographical places from the last discovery of Nansen to the remotest point reached by southern explorers, wandering from the date line in the Pacific ocean around the world back to their point of departure. Life is too short and too valuable, and skepticism too foolish and expensive."

In the closing part of the pamphlet, the author deals very effectively and, as it seems to us, unanswerably, with the statement that the methods of education necessarily produce hostility and skepticism toward religious truths. A strong plea is made also, for the religious education of the young. Protestants believe in this, as well as Catholics. The problem is how to get this moral and religious training in the schools supported by public taxation without offending a part of those whose money supports the schools. It has been understood that the two elements opposed to the introduction of unsectarian moral and religious teaching in the public schools, were infidels, who want no religion at all, and the Roman Catholics who want Roman Catholicism or nothing religious. When Roman Catholics reach the point where they will unite with Protestants and all other good citizens in recommending for use in the public schools certain fundamental teaching, as relates to religion and morality, we believe the time will be near when our public schools can be made powerful factors in molding the characters of the young.

But it is evident that such teaching must be fundamental and nonsectarian. This is one of the problems which is receiving attention from the Religious Education Society, recently formed, and we trust that it may contribute something towards its satisfactory solution.

A Tribute to the Press.

It was a happy thought, conceived, we believe, by one of our own Missouri editors, Walter Williams, of Columbia, to convene a World's Press Parliament in connection with our great World's Fair. Why should not the editors of the world come together, talk over their problems, get each other's point of view, remind each other of their responsibilities and dangers, and help each other to enlarged usefulness in their high vocation?

At the opening session of this World's Parliament on Thursday evening last, Secretary Hay, representing the nation and voicing its welcome to the editors from foreign nations, made a brilliant address in which he emphasized the responsibility and pointed out in a very tactful manner some of the dangers of the press. The following extract will be of interest to our readers:

I am not here to preach to you a gospel whose lessons are known to you far better than to me. I am not calling sinners to repentance, but I am following good tradition in stirring up the pure minds of the righteous by way of remembrance. It is well for us to reflect on the vast import, the endless chain of results, of that globe-encircling speech you address each day to the world. Your winged words have no fixed flight; like the lightning, they traverse the ether according to laws of their own. They light in every clime; they influence a thousand different varieties of minds and manners.

How vastly important is it, then, that the sentiments they convey should be those of good will rather than of malevolence, those of national concord rather than of prejudice, those of peace rather than of hostility. The temptation to the contrary is almost irresistible. I acknowledge with contrition how often I have fallen by the way. It is far more amusing to attack than to defend, to excite than to soothe.

But the highest victory of great power is that of self-restraint, and it would be a beneficent result of this memorable meeting, this ecumenical council of the press, if it taught us all—the brethren of this mighty priesthood—that mutual knowledge of each other which should modify prejudices, restrain acerbity of thought and expression, and tend in some degree to bring in that blessed time—

"When light shall spread and man be liker man"

Through all the season of the Golden Year."

In the name of the president—writer, soldier and statesman, eminent in all three professions and in all equally an advocate of justice, peace and good will—I bid you a cordial welcome, with the prayer that this meeting of the representatives of the world's intelligence may be fruitful in advantage to the press of all nations and may bring us somewhat nearer to the dawn of the day of peace on earth and good will among men. Let us remember that we are met to celebrate the transfer of a vast empire from one nation to another without the firing of a shot, without the shedding of one drop of blood.

If the press of the world would adopt and persist in the high resolve that war should be no more, the clangor of arms would cease from the rising of the sun to its going down and we could fancy that at last our ears, no longer stunned by the din of armies, might hear the morning stars singing together and all the sons of God shouting for joy.

There is something in these pertinent and wise suggestions of Secretary Hay for the religious as well as for the secular editor, if we are compelled for a while to keep up this distinction. If religious editors could be made to realize "the endless chain of results of that globe-encircling speech" which they address to the world, week after week, many things, we believe, would be omitted from their pages which now appear. If the sentiments which the religious press breathes from week to week "should be those of good will rather than of malevolence," those of religious concord rather than of religious prejudice, those of peace and unity rather than of denominational hostility, what a marvelous change it would soon effect in the relations of religious bodies to one another, and how it would increase co-operation in Christian work!

It is a high compliment Secretary Hay pays to the press of the world when he says that if it "would adopt and persist in the high resolve that war should be no more, the clangor of arms would cease from the rising of the sun to its going down." But what a responsibility does this fact lay upon the press of the world! We have no doubt that this interchange of thought and this intermingling of the world's great editors will do much to promote international amity and to hasten the era of universal peace on earth and good will among men.

Emphasis on the Spiritual.

It is strange how long it takes to efface a false impression when it has once gained wide popular acceptance. In conversation a few days since with a minister of another religious body who had become dissatisfied with his ecclesiastical affiliation and could no longer conscientiously remain where he was, he expressed great admiration for the position occupied by the body known as Disciples of Christ or Christians, but said he had understood and had been told by many persons that in identifying himself with that body he would find that they held to a theory of baptismal regeneration which he could not endorse, and he wished our opinion on that subject. He had understood that our position was that baptism, that is to say immersion, was so vitally related to salvation that where it was absent there is no salvation.

It is not difficult to account for the impression above stated. There was, in the beginning of our movement, a good deal of stress laid upon the restoration of the ordinances, and particularly of baptism, to its original form and place, and a good deal of discussion was provoked on that subject. As there are those who always grasp an external fact with far greater clearness than the principle which it embodies, so it came to pass that there arose later a class of preachers who gave disproportionate emphasis to the subject of baptism. Many were very fond of discussing that question with their religious neighbors. In this way the impression got abroad that our great specialty was immersion for the remission of sins. Add to this the party spirit that would take advantage of this state of things to bring a new religious movement into disrepute, and you have the conditions which account for the fact.

Now, as a matter of fact, there is no representative preacher or teacher among us who would not insist that without faith in Christ, without a change of heart or genuine repentance, and a sincere purpose to follow Christ in living the Christian life, baptism is utterly void of meaning or of value. It can be nothing more than the outward or visible expression of the new faith and the new purpose concerning Christ. The fact that in its form it symbolizes the burial and the resurrection of Christ, shows its relation to faith in Christ, while the fact that it symbolizes the believer's death to sin and his resurrection to newness of life, shows its relation to a changed heart and purpose, and forever makes impossible the heresy of baptismal regeneration.* It is this fact that gives such tremendous weight to the apostle Paul's argument in Romans 6: 14, where he points out the absurdity of the idea that Christians may continue in sin that grace may abound, from the fact that they are "dead to sin," as is shown forth in their burial and resurrection in baptism.

But we refer to this matter especially to urge that our pulpit and press take pains to correct this misconception of our position as relates to baptism, and to give the same emphasis to the spiritual side of Christianity that the New Testament does. The relation between the inward and the outward, the life within and the expression of that life, is so obvious that it offends the moral sense of enlightened people to reverse this order and to exalt the ordinances above the spiritual life which alone gives them any significance or value. Indeed, the only way that we shall succeed in maintaining the proper respect for, and observance of, both baptism and the Lord's supper is to see that they are filled with their spiritual content. To deprive them of this is to reduce them to dead forms, to be ignored at the will or caprice of men, or else to exalt them, as do Roman Catholics, as the essential channels of conveying regenerative power and of divine grace. Christianity is pre-eminently a spiritual religion, and only those can successfully commend it to the world who give due emphasis to that fact.

*The ablest refutation of the error of baptismal regeneration in the English language, so far as we know, is a work by one of our representative men, "The Fundamental Error of Christendom," by W. T. Moore (Christian Publishing Company).

Editor's Easy Chair.

The difference between the savage state and civilized society consists very largely in the increased number and strength of the ties which bind the people of the latter together. Civilization is but another name for the recognition of our mutual relationships and of the obligations which grow out of them. It has pleased the all-wise Creator and Father of us all to bind His children together by many ties. There is, for instance, the family tie, which groups together, in sympathy and fellowship, those of a common parentage, and makes a little world of its own. This is broadened in the tie of kinship, which extends its ramifications wider and serves as a bond of unity. There is the tie of a common language and a common origin and ancestry, which binds nations together as well as individuals. It is this tie that binds together the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon family in England and America. Then there is the tie of neighborhood or proximity, which makes the people of one city or of one state or of one locality, feel a little closer to each other than those living more remote. Observe how the people at the World's Fair group themselves in their state buildings, and note the pride which each one manifests in his own state and in its exhibit.

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead
That never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!"

But the "tie that binds" is closer, stronger and more enduring than any of those we have mentioned. All these ties existed when the earth was filled with warring nations, with walls of caste and prejudice, with slavery and feudalism, with race arrayed against race and tribe against tribe. Then a new bond of brotherhood was introduced into the world. In the fullness of time there stood by the banks of the Sea of Galilee, and sat on the grassy slopes of its mountains, One who said, "God is your Father and all ye are brethren." He brought a religion that substituted love for hatred and prejudice, kindness for vengeance, and human brotherhood for race antipathy and for individual animosities and strifes. He bound men to Him with a bond of love, and all who were thus bound to Him, were bound to each other by the same sacred tie. Under the influence of this religion of the Nazarene, wars are becoming less frequent and far more difficult; the unity of the world is being recognized as never before; national antipathies are giving way to international good will and mutual helpfulness, and the obligations of human brotherhood are recognized as making all men brothers. Of all the bonds which help to bind the world together and to fill the earth with the blessings of peace, "the tie that binds"—the tie of Christian love—is the strongest and the most enduring.

A little less than a century ago there was conceived and brought forth on this continent a new religious reformation dedicated to the proposition that all Christians, having a common Lord, a common faith, a common hope, a common love, and a common destiny, should be one—one church, one great brotherhood of believers, striving together for the triumph of the kingdom of God on earth, and animated by the spirit of mutual helpfulness, bearing each other's burdens and sharing each other's sorrows and joys, defeats and triumphs. So radical was this departure from the then existing modes of thought and feeling, that the union movement was assailed as a disturber of the church, as an innovation upon sacred beliefs and customs, and as a pestiferous heresy which must be stamped out by the sturdy orthodoxy of the time. But in these early days how these Disciples loved one another! Freed from the trammels of ecclesiasticism and of mutual jealousies and strifes, they realized the full strength of "the tie that binds," and were one in their common faith and aims and hopes. As in the ancient time, so also in that period, the world looked on and said: "Behold how these disciples love one another!" The years have brought a vast increase in numbers, in wealth, in social prestige and power, but have we not lost something of the influence of "the tie that binds our hearts in Christian love"?

What we plead for is a reassertion of the bond of unity and a truer manifestation among us, as local churches in the city of St. Louis, as a wide brotherhood of churches, of that unity, to plead for which our fathers lifted the banner of reform more than four score years ago. No increase in numbers, or in wealth, or in social power, can compensate for any diminution of that love which is the tie that binds our hearts together in fellowship and service. We should hail every opportunity of manifesting that oneness of heart and purpose both to ourselves and to the world. The chief value and significance of that pavilion standing yonder on the great World's Fair grounds, is that it is a visible expression of the unity of that body of believers who are pleading for a return to Christ, and for the unity of Christendom. It stands there, not as the representative of one section or school of thought, but as the symbol of unity for the whole brotherhood, from whatever nation or from whatever section of our own beloved country. Our missionary societies, our colleges, our Benevolent Association, our publishing houses, our churches and individual members, have done wisely to plan and construct this historic building that brings together our past and present, and that says to the whole world: "That for which our fathers contended in the beginning—the unity of a divided church—is that for which we still contend." And let this hexagonal pavilion which binds together Bethany and St. Louis, and all the years that lie between, be but a symbol and pledge of our allegiance to our common Master, and of a closer co-operation and sweeter fellowship under the sacred influence of "the tie that binds."*

Notes and Comments.

Our esteemed Kentucky contemporary quotes the following statement from the address of E. L. Powell, published in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and thinks it discovers in it some latent heresy:

"Heresy consists not in disloyalty to any man's doctrine, but in disloyalty to Christ, and as long as the individual avows his loyalty to Christ, no religious journal can have the right to denounce him as a heretic."

On this our contemporary says: "The idea seems to be that this matter is so abstract and ethereal that an individual can be loyal to Christ while ignoring and even renouncing his teaching." Oh, no, brother; that is not "the idea" at all. The idea is that a brother in Christ who is consciously loyal to Christ is not to be denounced as a heretic or an alien by any religious journal because its editor does not happen to approve some of his utterances. He may mean well, and be mistaken, just as the editor of the Companion was in saying that the church was "not built on Christ personally, but, on the truth concerning Christ." It would be wrong to pronounce Brother Briney a heretic for this statement, though we feel sure it is an error. Does he grasp the idea?

Speaking of press parliaments, as we have done elsewhere, why should not the religious press of the country have a parliament of its own some time in the autumn before the close of the Fair? Do we not owe it to ourselves and to Christianity to thus magnify our calling? It is perhaps too late to enlist the representatives of the foreign religious press, to any large extent, but we could at least gather a respectable number of the representatives of the religious press of our own country to consider some of the problems which confront us all alike.

Such a parliament or conference, it seems to us, would not only manifest the unity which now exists among us, but would do much to promote greater unity among the churches we severally represent. We could name some very vital questions for such editorial congress. There is The Problem of Advertising, Legitimate and Illegitimate; the problem of The Scope of the Religious Newspaper; The Relation of the Religious Journal to Social and Political Reforms; The Relation between the Editorial Department and the Counting-room; The Religious Press and Christian Union; Should the Religious Newspaper follow or lead Public Sentiment? What Changes, if any, Are Demanded in the Religious Newspaper to Adapt it to the Needs of Our Day? What Proportion Should be Maintained Between the News Feature and the Features of Edification and Instruction? How far may the Religious Newspaper Deal with Questions of Historical Biblical Criticism?

These are a few of the topics that occur to us on the spur of the moment, that might be most profitably considered in a conference of religious editors and publishers. Why can we not plan for such a religious press congress yet? What have the brethren of the press to suggest in reference to the matter?

In furnishing our readers a picture of the building of the Missouri Bible college now in process of construction at Columbia, which will be found on our first page this week, and the brief statement concerning the same by Dean W. J. Lhamon, we take the occasion to call attention to the importance of this movement to bring the study of the Bible to the doors of our great state universities. We know of no movement in the direction of religious education in modern times that promises greater results for the cause of religion. It is a hopeful sign of the times that these universities welcome such biblical teaching as supplementing their own courses, and furnishing an essential part of an all-around culture. The chief obstacle in the way of the largest results from this effort to bring the Bible to the students of our universities, is the fact that so far no credit is allowed to the students by the state universities for any work done in the study of the literature of the Bible. We cannot believe that this obstacle is immovable. It does not seem to be asking too much of these universities that they give the literature of the English Bible along with the other great literatures of the world in their curricula. If the poems of Homer and Virgil are worthy of a place in the course of literature, why not those of David and the book of Job? If the history of the Greek and Roman civilization is worthy of being studied, why not the history of that remarkable people, the Hebrews, as well? When the courses of study have been prepared and given that are absolutely unsectarian and undenominational in their character, it is difficult to see why credit should not be given for such studies in lieu of something else, that to say the least is no more important.

As Seen from the Dome

By F. D. Power

The church in Washington, Pa., is one of the historic churches. It is hard by the spot where things had their beginning. Its organization was effected May 12, 1831, and it is keeping its seventy-third anniversary. It has had such men in its pulpit as the Campbells, Scott, Pendleton, Milligan, Graham, Errett, Loos, Lard, Hayden, Moore, Crenshaw, Darsie, Hall, McDiarmid, and many like them. The present pastor is E. A. Cole, and the church has a membership of 650, and is in a flourishing condition. As a student in my senior year, when a boy of nineteen, I preached for them several months. It was from October to December, 1870. My habit was to ride horseback from Bethany, twenty miles distant, on Saturday afternoon, stop at David McClay's, Frank Nickol's or John McElroy's Saturday night, preach on Sunday morning and return that afternoon to the college. Often I broke the way through the snow a foot or more deep and suffered not a little from cold in those long rides of forty miles to preach one sermon. President Pendleton recommended me to the church to fill the interim between pastors. All the time I urged them to secure a regular preacher, as I was able to preach only once on Sunday and could give no time to the pastoral work which they needed. They paid me ten dollars a trip and my horse cost me two dollars, but I thought eight dollars clear was big money. They offered me more, but I said it was all the preaching was worth.

My remembrance of the congregation and services is a most happy one. John McElroy led the singing and did it well. I think of him as a strong man and one who was very kind to me. His family were Presbyterians, but made me most welcome. The church met in a house formerly owned by the Cumberland Presbyterians. Brethren Martin and McDermot were among the elders and Chambers, Hughes, and perhaps Hamilton, Nickol and McElroy were among the deacons. Smith McElroy died while I was there, and his, as I remember, was my only funeral service. David McClay and wife, the latter a sister of the McElroys, were most intimately associated with my feeble efforts in those far-off days. They were excellent people. I often stopped there. They were four miles out on the road to Bethany and I would find always a gracious welcome. She made the best cookies I ever saw and kept them fresh and abundant in the cellar, and my overcoat pockets always bulged out handsomely as I rode away on my sixteen miles' journey back to Bethany. I am ashamed to say in those days I "burned my idols" and Sister McClay had a similar weakness. Often have we sat at the fireside and smoked "stogies" together. Strange to say, neither David nor any one of the boys joined us. Then, if it was bedtime we always sang one hymn, "Did Christ o'er Sinners Weep!" which Sister McClay led, and after prayer, we retired to rest.

Brother Streator, father of Jock and Martin, is another of the old members I recall. He was a large man with a very large voice, and was not then actively engaged in the ministry. I had only one baptism during the three months, if I recollect rightly, and he did not hold out.

My most thrilling experience during this brief pastorate was a runaway on the pike a few miles from Washington. It was my custom to ride to my appointment on horseback, but on one Saturday evening Mrs. Pendleton had some social function and wished me to stay, saying A. C. Smith, one of my classmates, would drive me up on Sunday morning. He secured Col. Aleck Campbell's fine team and we easily made it in time for church. I observed he was a careless driver and the horses very spirited, and several times on the way we narrowly escaped an accident. After the service we dined at McClay's and started home. We were in a light skeleton buggy and there was no breeching on the harness and the breast straps were fastened too long. It was a cold December afternoon about four o'clock and getting dark. As we drove over the first hill beyond McClay's, my companion permitted the horses to trot rapidly downhill, against which I cautioned him in vain. The road was a straight one for half a mile before us and descending all the way, at some points very steep and rocky. The horses began to gallop, and my friend undertook to rein them in. Then the buggy came against their heels and frightened them and they ran wild, tearing down the hill at great speed. I felt we were to have a terrible accident and could only hold myself in by clinging to the back and side of the seat. As we neared the bottom of the hill the horses turned a little to the right and I was thrown heavily to the pike, striking within a few feet of a large rock which would have no doubt ended my career had I reached it. When I came to myself I could not see anything of Smith or the horses. I called and he answered from the ditch on the other side of the road. The buggy had been dashed to pieces just beyond him and the team was out of sight on its way to Bethany. Two men approached me and I told them to look after the other man; he was worse hurt. We were both taken to the house of John McClay, near by, and soon two surgeons were with us from Washington, and David McClay and his wife came over and nursed us through the night. The next day President Pendleton came with a surgeon and took us on a bed in a jersey wagon to Bethany. We came near being turned over in Buffalo Creek and drowned on our way back, but Frank Deener, the driver, jumped out and put his shoulder to the wheel, and saved us. While at John McClay's I remember he said to me: "We call these accidents, but they are all foreordained of God." He was a brother of David and a Scotch Covenanter. I did not argue the question, but thought to myself had I held the reins that day instead of Smith the Lord would have suffered the decree to be overruled.

That escapade ended my service at Washington. For six weeks I was out of the harness. Once, in January, I went up and preached on crutches, but the church secured E. B. Challenger as a permanent pastor. They were splendid people—the Lord's own, and I remember them to-day with the warmest affection. The Washington papers reported that "B. F. Powers and another young man named Smith, members of the senior class of Bethany College, met with an unfortunate accident descending the hill this side of Hamilton Davis' on the Middletown Road." They described the runaway and stated that Drs. Dougherty and Wilson were summoned and added kindly: "There is a very general feeling of sympathy for the young men. They are both gentlemen of worth and promise and are far from home and friends, one being from Georgia and the other from near Norfolk, Va."

Seventeen years after I preached again in the Washington church, and some one said to me: "You are not the boy that preached for us in 1870, but the voice is the same. We know the voice." Often since have I wondered if in heaven we shall be recognized by our voices. Jesus said, "Mary!" and instantly she knew him and answered, "Rabboni!" When I get there I shall at once look around for those dear friends of my college days. Meantime it is good to look way back as well as way ahead and see these things from the Dome.

It is not what the best men do, but what they are, that constitutes their truest benefaction to their fellow men. Certainly, in their own little sphere, it is not the most active people to whom we owe the most. Among the common people whom we know, it is not necessarily those who are busiest, not those who, meteor-like, are ever on the rush after some visible change and work; it is the lives like the stars which simply pour down on us the calm light of their bright and faithful being, up to which we look, and out of which we gather the deepest calm and courage. —Phillips Brooks.

The Spirit of the Soldier

By Olive A. Smith

Just before the close of the war a Spanish bullet had stilled the heart of David Holcomb, and his daughter was left alone to battle with the most deadly foe that can assail a woman's life. She needed no Memorial Day ceremonies to remind her of the bitterness of her lot, but when the hour for those ceremonies arrived, it found her standing by the mound in Glenwold cemetery watching the long procession winding up the hill toward the gates.

The strains of martial music came faintly at first, then in full, rich tones, crashing, swelling through the sweet fragrance of the quiet air, piercing her soul with instruments of joy or pain—she could hardly distinguish between them—she only knew that she shivered in the warm May sunshine.

Her wide black hat had fallen away from her forehead. With the instinct of the consciously beautiful, well dressed woman she adjusted it, then drew her gloves over her slender white hands. For the first time in many years the fingers were not adorned with tasteful, expensive rings. Rare jewels and rich fabrics seemed to belong to Alice Holcomb. They were a part of her personality. Her beauty was not of the spiritual type, neither was it aggressively physical, except in those hours when she was lost to everything but her inherent passion for admiration and wild pleasure. In form and feature there was a symmetry as unusual as it was unobtrusive. Her hair and eyes were in harmony with the deep, black silks and velvets in which she delighted, her skin creamy white, firm, untouched by color. Other women might play with tints and shades, it was necessary, but she knew that she was their queen in her royal robes of black, white, or gray.

As the procession neared the cemetery she recognized the leader, a florid, portly veteran, who had served during the closing years of the rebellion, returned to Glenwold clothed in honor, inherited and preserved a fortune, and was always mentioned as "our esteemed fellow citizen, Colonel Dawson." Alice was alone, and she could afford to be supremely honest. The anger of ten years' suppression blazed from her eyes. "Liar! Hypocrite! Viper!" she hissed. "How I wish this adoring community knew you! But it will never be. You are too wise, too discreet. They think they know you, and they think they know me. They are wrong, but I'll never take the trouble to tell them—not one of them. What would be the use? Oh, papa, papa!"

She rested her head upon the wooden tablet and her sobs drowned the noise of the approaching footsteps. The music had ceased.

The Holcombs were a race of uncompromising war patriots. They scorned even strategy. The family lot in Glenwold contained four graves which would receive floral offerings. Three of them were the result of the civil strife. Yet, of the four deaths, three of them might have been called unnecessary, even from the trying standpoint of battle. They courted danger. They pressed to the front and died on the ground they chose, rather than move one foot to a place of comparative safety. And the motherless, misguided girl had proved herself worthy of her ancestry. At that moment she longed to follow them still more completely; to tell the truth and dare the results. And yet—it was impossible.

"Impossible." She breathed the word as she raised her head. The gates were being opened. She moved quickly away, but not until another scene had added its share to her dreary landscape. The boys and girls from the academy were there; her boys and girls who had loved her. Many of the girls had cried, six months before, when she had been requested to offer her resignation as one of their instructors. They must not see her; she could not bear to see them. She passed through a small, side entrance into a narrow lane which led indirectly back to the town. She lowered her veil, but it was a poor protection against the continual glances from the eyes of the men and women she could not avoid meeting. Some were cold, some curious, others significant and full of insolent admiration.

She walked along, trying to realize that she was practically homeless, friendless, that her money was almost gone and that she must do something to remove the false impressions that had become settled convictions in the minds of the people of Glenwold. What friends she had! Such firm, true, patient friends! And she had lost them all; lost them all through her own perversity, her own reckless disregard of the conventionalities which she, of all others, must observe because that was what made her furious—because of that tiny, slimy stream that flowed from the wild, free land of her girlhood. She had scorned to recognize its existence, and now it had become a mighty river and was bearing her away, away, she knew not where, and there were moments when she cared not where; when she longed for that inborn spirit of abandon to possess her and end the struggle.

She entered the house which had been her father's, and was now hers. Since losing her position she had been obliged to rent it, reserving only her own rooms upstairs. She threw aside her hat and gloves and lay down. She had hardly closed her eyes when the little daughter of her tenant knocked at her door, and held out a soiled, yellow envelope. "It's a letter, Miss Holcomb," she said. "A soldier brought it; a poor fellow that's been in a hospital ever so long. He said your father made him promise that he'd bring it to you himself, if anything happened; and he's kept it with him. He wanted awful bad to see you, but he said he had to take the train north and get home."

Alice did not trust herself to speak. She smiled her thanks, took the soiled envelope in her hand and closed the door. A message from her father! That dear father, who had loved her so much that he had seemed blind to her faults and perils; her vanity, her extravagance, her reckless disregard of consequences in regard to anything that concerned her pleasure. As she held the precious missive for a moment before opening the envelope, she trembled. A strange presentiment that it contained some counsel, almost too hard for her to follow, made her hesitate. "Whatever it is," she spoke the words aloud as she broke the seal, "it comes from him; now when I must have something! I will follow it wherever it leads me."

She brushed away her tears and read:

"SAN JUAN, June 30, '98.

"MY PRECIOUS DAUGHTER:

"To-morrow we are to aid the regulars in storming the fort, and something tells me that it will be the end—for me—and that my poor, motherless girl will have battles to fight alone which are a thousand times harder to win than the one we are to fight to-morrow.

"I have been such a coward all these years, Alice. I loved my wild, beautiful child in such a weak way! I never taught her to govern her own ungovernable self. It seemed so hard, when I only wanted the opportunity to protect her. But I have been thinking about it so much the last few days; we have had some time to think, and I have seen my sin, my crime, as I never saw it before. I have thought about this wretched war business, too, in a new light. Oh, my darling, try to be a passive soldier. My time is so short, I can write only a few words, but I feel that you must understand what I mean. I know that the time will come when your passionate nature will bring a tragedy close to you; when you will seem to have no friend in all the world; when poverty will whisper to you about wearing cheap dresses and living in a poor way, which you will resent. Your love of beauty and elegance is a passion, my child. I do not mean that it is wrong, and yet, I feel that the day will come when you must fight it with every power at your command.

"There are villains in Glenwold, and they will try to rob you of your good name. They will dare to do this because of your girlish follies and indiscretions. I have never mentioned these things; it has seemed too cruel, too unjust, that they should follow you through all the years, into your mature womanhood, yet I know now that they will. You will be obliged to fight, my poor girl, but if you fight in the way that the Holcombs have always fought, you will lose, and I tremble even to think of the result. Fight your pride, your vanity, the consciousness of your beauty and power, your impatience and arrogance. Ask God to make you gentle and patient; to help you to bear the suffering that will come upon you through no fault of yours in the beginning, but the suffering which you must bear if you conquer your foes and grow into a true, respected womanhood.

"As I think of our work to-morrow, and of what it may mean to me and to you, these words are constantly before me: 'He that ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city.' I have failed of true greatness, my daughter. Forgive me that the task is harder for you because of that failure, and that I beg you, just before the hour of my greatest peril, to succeed where I have failed. If I am permitted to return home, Alice, you will never see this letter. I will speak to you of these things. But if not, my friend Jackson will take it to you himself.

"I must not write longer. I can only say, God bless and keep you, my girl. Stay in Glenwood whatever happens, until there is not a breath of suspicion attached to you. Be a true soldier, and do what you can to hasten the time when war will be no more, when soldiers like your father will cease to glory in their warfare.

"Good-bye, my darling, until you hear from me again, or until—but I cannot say that.

"Your ever loving father,

"DAVID HOLCOMB."

The last page was soiled and blotted with tears. She kissed it again and again. The joy at receiving the message had blotted out all thought of its real meaning. But as she re-read it, the meaning dawned upon her. "Oh, anything but this—to be a passive soldier!" she cried. "It is too hard! and yet, I promised"—and she hesitated—"he is right. Dear papa!"

She dropped her head upon the desk where the open letter lay. She looked into her immediate future. It was dull and gray, viewed from the standpoint her father had given her. With her brilliance, her beauty and power it was hard. Then, like a tired child, she rested in the true spirit of the soldier.

College Topics — IV.

BY BURRIS A. JENKINS.

Money for the Educational Mare.

It is money that makes her go and there is not money enough yet given to her by the Disciples of Christ to make her break any records. Not one of our institutions possesses half a million dollars of endowment, though two of them are getting rather close to the mark. Most educators consider that a half million at least is absolutely necessary to give a college permanency and to insure its future in rich America.

And even when an educational institution reaches half a million it is still on the list of the poverty stricken. It is then in the position of a small tradesman who has just been able to set up in business for himself but cannot yet afford a delivery wagon, let alone a phaeton for his wife and children. He walks to church on Sunday, no matter if it is a distance of a mile and a quarter, to save carfare and he probably pushes the baby carriage himself because there is no nurse at home to take care of the little tot. Every college we have in the brotherhood is doing the work and living the life of a small tradesman.

Yet take it for all in all, the educational mare among us, though not going at 2:-, 2:- (what is the latest record?) gait, is nevertheless jogging along at a good old pace, making a mile in five minutes and getting there in the long run. The men that graduate from our educational institutions, who go east to enter the great universities later, have left their mark and have impressed the faculties at the east as being of as high grade generally and as well adapted for advanced study as graduates of any college in the country.

A young physician in this state who is rapidly rising to the head of his profession in his county, one of the oldest and richest in the blue grass, declares that among all the men he met in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York he found none better adapted in general culture and polish and knowledge of the world for their study than the graduates of one of our own colleges who were in the institution at the time. This is a record which two or three others of our small colleges can duplicate.

But what could we not do if we had the money adequately to carry forward our work! We live from hand to mouth. We have to scurry about and beg small funds to prevent our annual deficits. We are in a constant nightmare—educational mare—for fear we shall run into debt. We give education that costs $120 a year for each student and in return we get a tuition fee of $30, or nothing. Our small endowment funds must supply the remaining $100 per pupil.

Is it any wonder that college presidents so frequently give up their work in despair? I know of three in small colleges, not a thousand miles from here, who, within the past two years, have had varied experiences. One gave up, discouraged, in about eighteen months and resigned to go into life insurance; a second died under the weight of his financial burden; and the third went crazy. There is no telling when the moment may arrive that any of our own college presidents shall meet with a like fate.

Most money that goes to educational interests goes by bequest. Harvard college began with a few hundreds, the proceeds of a sale of a library bequeathed by John Harvard. A small sum may go a long way when properly handled. Here is an old story that may not be generally known:

When Colonel James Morrison, of Lexington, wished to make his will he sent for Henry Clay. That great lawyer drew up the document, disposing of a large estate according to the wishes of his wealthy client. When the will was nearly finished, and many bequests had been made, Colonel Morrison said:

"Mr. Clay, in view of the long friendship that has existed between you and me, I desire to make a bequest for your son, who was named for me, John Morrison Clay."

"Colonel Morrison," was the reply, "in view of the long friendship that has existed between you and me, I must resist that intention. I would not have the least suspicion in the public mind that our friendship was in any degree, on my part, tainted by sordid motives."

Colonel Morrison was disposed to argue the point, until Mr. Clay finally cut him short with the words: "Colonel, you have always been my friend. If you value my friendship, sir, you must not insist upon this point. And if you follow my wishes in this matter, you will make this bequest not to my son, but to Transylvania university."

"Done," cried Colonel Morrison.

And twenty thousand dollars was given by the will to endow a Morrison chair in old Transylvania. That chair, in Kentucky university, the successor of Transylvania, was formerly the chair of history, but it is now the chair of English.

Furthermore, at Mr. Clay's suggestion, Colonel Morrison made the university his residuary legatee. From this provision in the will, a considerable additional sum was realized, at Colonel Morrison's death in 1823, and with the money Morrison campus was purchased and upon it Morrison chapel was erected in 1832-33.

Moral:—Lawyers may be of great benefit to benevolences in ways like this.

The Light of the World

By R. J. Campbell

Jesus came long ago to a weary, pessimistic world that had outlived most of its ideals. He came like the freshness of the morning; humanity renewed its youth when it listened to and followed Jesus. The simple men who gathered around him saw, though they could not have told how, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Adown the ages has come this beautiful story of the Christ. The light is shining still, in spite of all that darkness could do during nineteen centuries.

Faith of our fathers, living still,
In spite of dungeon, fire and sword—
Faith of our fathers, holy faith,
We will be true to thee till death.

But we have not always been true. The light shineth in the darkness still, in spite of the unfaithfulness and the self-seeking, even of the followers of the ever-living Jesus. Why is it that the light is shining at all? For the church of God has more than once done her best to put it out. It is because the light was never really entrusted to human hands; it is held by the Christ himself. From heaven it comes, and heaven's unceasing witness keeps the light shining. It has not been handed away; we see it shining on the face of many a saint, but the saint is not its keeper. The man who stands on the highest hill catches the light of the morning before those in the valley, but he has not the custody of the light; the light has him instead. The hand that holds the light of the world is the mighty hand of Jesus. If it had not been for that light, my friends, and for that Custodian, you and I would meet together in vain to read from any holy book, or to listen to any prophetic voice. Indeed, has it ever struck you—and I lay myself open to misunderstanding in saying this—that the firmest ground of your faith, the most immediate witness to its reality, is not even the Bible; it is somewhat prior to the Bible? Whose light falls upon the pages? It is the light divine that shines still, as it shone before, from the face of the Son of man. Pardon an acted parable.

Were I to lift the holy book away from the desk, and, symbolically speaking, blot it out, as the church blotted it out during the long and dreary ages that preceded the morning star of the reformation; if you were just as some of the saints of God in those days were, without the witness of the printed page to the Christ who speaks through it, would the light be entirely gone? I trow not; it cannot be put out. Though all the Bibles were burned, I think we should write them again, because the light shineth in the heart of the believer, and the darkness cannot overcome it. But the Bible, precious as it is, is precious just because that light that shineth in the heart interprets it, brings it home to consciousness, gives it value to our spirit, gives it meaning, and meaning in such wise that no scholarship, no criticism, no unbelief, no neglect and no contempt can ever put it out. The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness overwhelmeth it not.

This brings us naturally to the further consideration of the fashion in which this light shines through human hearts and lives, as well as through the printed page. That which is of heaven can never be overwhelmed, never extinguished, whatever appearances may be to the contrary. That which is worthy to survive does survive. You have heard of the miner's device of seeing whether, in a neglected coal shaft, there is any suggestion of choke-damp. He lowers a lighted candle, and if the candle is put out then it is unsafe for any living being to venture down. Why is the choke-damp to be found at the bottom of the dark shaft? Because it is a child of the darkness and of the sombre depths. Throw the mine open to the light of heaven and the choke-damp will soon be gone. The darkness gives it its opportunity, and its noisomeness and its power are derived from the fact that there is darkness in which to dwell. But if the miner seeks to search the depths of the coal shaft he employs another device. The light that cannot be put out, whose source is above, is sent down the electric wire and shines in the dark place, and enables him above to see, and the worker to deal with the enemy. Such is the light that is often employed, and has to be employed, if a man would deal with that which is noisome and underground. So everything noble and great and good, however tremendous the odds against it, is eternal. The light that shines therein comes from above, not from below; that which is hideous and noisome and foul has no power over it; nothing can ever put out the light.

In human history this light divine has shone with greatest splendor, perhaps, in the midst of scenes of terror and of woe. We are ourselves children of the Puritans, children of the Covenanters. We are not worthy to be named with their names, but we know what the witness costs which has such value to us to-day, who worship under our own vine and fig tree, none daring to make us afraid. Do we ever realize, can we realize, the odds against such witness, in the days when it was made? Oh, it was a dark and evil day; imagination cannot do justice to it; but never did the light of God, the light of saintly heroism, shine truer and clearer than it did in that time—the noblest time in the history of England.

The light of the world, the light eternal, of which you are not the custodian—remember that, too, which shines with a nobler lustre in the darkness—that light eternal shines at its best in the grandeur of achievement which means persecution and suffering and woe. I am speaking no false language, because I know that the men before me, whether they have ever coupled their suffering with the will of God or whether they have not, are called to suffer. Suffer you must if you would live the true life, and the manly and the noble and the good. And which of us would shrink from the condition? "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Grandeur of character is one thing, sweetness of character is another; but the blend of sweetness and grandeur, as it was seen in the character of Christ, is purchased but in one way. It is when the sun shines through the hissing black mist that would cover the everlasting hills. Never try to make any other condition with God; never make a truce with life on any other terms. Breast forward to fate, head erect, that the light eternal may shine upon the uplifted head.

WHAT THE KING EATS.

What's Fit for Him.

A Mass. lady who has been through the mill with the trials of the usual housekeeper and mother relates an interesting incident that occurred not long ago. She says:

"I can with all truthfulness say that Grape-Nuts is the most beneficial of all cereal foods in my family, young as well as old. It is food and medicine both to us. A few mornings ago at breakfast my little boy said:

"Mamma, does the king eat Grape-Nuts every morning?"

"I smiled and told him I did not know, but that I thought Grape-Nuts certainly made a delicious dish, fit for a king." (It's a fact that the King of England and the German Emperor both eat Grape-Nuts.)

"I find that by the constant use of Grape-Nuts not only as a morning cereal but also in puddings, salads, etc., made after the delicious recipes found in the little book in each package, it is proving to be a great nerve food for me, besides having completely cured a long standing case of indigestion." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There is no doubt Grape-Nuts is the most scientific food in the world.

Ten days' trial of this proper food in place of improper food will show in steady, stronger nerves, sharper brain and the power to "go" longer and further and accomplish more. There's a reason.

The Atonement—I. By D. R. Dungan

Of this word Webster says: "1. Atonement, n. i. Agreement; concord; reconciliation after enmity or controversy. 2. Expiation; satisfaction or reparation made by giving an equivalent for an injury, or by doing or by suffering that which is received in satisfaction for an offense or injury."

Some have seen in this doctrine a heathenish idea of substitution, devoid of any thought of justice or Christian teaching. They would use the letters but syllable them differently and make it mean at-one-ment, the equivalent of reconciliation, that it is not by the blood of the Christ that men are made whole, but by faith in his blood. Hence they understand that all that Christ did in coming to the world, living or dying, was atoning, or so much of the great system of atonement. His life, teaching, healing, suffering, dying and rising again were parts of the scheme, as they were so much of a pleading with humanity to become reconciled to God. Hence they suppose that the atonement is accomplished in man, not for man, not in heaven, but on the earth. No particular emphasis is to be placed on the death of Christ, except as an expression of divine love, it touches the heart and causes men to turn away from sin to the service of God.

There are others who hold that human nature is totally depraved, and that by nature no one has power to serve God until the Holy Spirit accomplishes regeneration by mystically applying the blood of Christ to the sinner's heart, thereby atoning for sin, imparting a new nature by which it is possible to do the will of Christ. These theories are not so very different from each other, only in the means employed. The former is much the more reasonable. The latter is based upon a false view of human nature, and hence relies upon forces for the purpose of the reconciliation that are quite unreasonable and perfectly unscriptural. But both alike have the atonement accomplished in men. The one theory holds man accountable for the atonement, and the other the Holy Spirit, as he has it all to do.

As to the views of Augustine, Hildersham, Calvin or Arminius, we have nothing to do. Philosophy nor human wisdom can have much to do with a subject of this kind. The Bible is our only guide, and we must look to a fair exegesis of this book for an answer to all our questions respecting the atonement. We are told that the word occurs but once in the New Testament (Rom. 5:11), and there the word in the original is the same that is elsewhere rendered reconciliation. The argument from this is that reconciliation is the thought of the Scriptures, and that therefore the idea of vicarious atonement is foreign to the word of God. It may be that there is no word in the Greek New Testament that covers exactly the meaning of atonement as defined by Webster, and yet it may be that vicarious atonement, as it is in the heart of the great body of Christians, is there.

Those who believe that the Old Testament was given by the inspiration of God will readily consult it with respect to the subject. The writer holds that view and will be excused by critics for appealing to it as authority. Kippurim—coverings; kapher, covering; kopher, a covering, are about one hundred times rendered atonements, atonement, make an atonement. The ugliness of sin and its deformity were covered out of sight by the use of blood. Gaal occurs forty-one times. It means freeing by purchase, and is rendered atonement, ransom, ransomed, etc. Padah, to free, occurs several times rendered ransom (Isa. 35:10; Hos. 13:14). This has the thought of a price paid. It will not do to say, "These passages belong to the Old Testament." God has not probably changed his mind since these texts were written. If he then thought of the plan of ransom, redemption, covering out of sight, and that all that was to be done for man, we may expect to find something like it in the New Testament. Hence the thought of ransom and redemption is not from heathenism but from the word of God.

We shall see that the atonement was not made by man nor by the Holy Spirit; is not now being made, but was made once in the end of the ages by the Christ, taking his own blood into the holiest of all not made with hands, there obtaining eternal redemption for us. The doctrine is not from Rome, nor Carthage, not from Athens nor Alexandria, it is from God, from the prophets, the Law, Christ and the apostles. Calling it heathenish substitution is not argument. That heathen men have regarded themselves as sinners and have wanted to placate divinity is true; that some man plunged into an opening in the earth and satisfied the gods, may have done for a superstition, but we have nothing to do with such things, for unless Christ was misled by such things, and the apostles influenced by the mistakes and blunders of the untaught and savage races, atonement, reparation, expiation was made by a sacrifice of better blood than that of Abel, far better than the blood of bulls and goats. We are to stand by the word of God on the subject.

In the Old Testament, kippurim, coverings, kapher, covering, and kopher, a covering, are to be found more than one hundred times. Atonement is the word by which they are translated. "Thus shalt thou do to make an atonement" is followed by the directions of the law in which blood was shed for the covering up of the guilt of the one or the many who are to have peace with God. Gaal occurs forty-eight times and has the meaning of freeing or setting free by purchase. Several times it is rendered by ransom. Padah has a similar import: "And the ransomed of Jehovah shall return" (Isa. 35:10). So in Hos. 13:14: "I will ransom them from the power of sheol." This word, padah, is rendered ransom frequently. In its make-up it seems to have the thought of bringing back by force and not simply by purchase.

One may call this heathenism if he likes, but the one thing that is certain is that it is found in the word of God. Of course this will not be much of an argument to anyone who prefers his philosophy to any statement of scripture, but to believers it makes it clear that God demanded a sacrifice of blood in order to the remission of sins, or in order that sin might be covered up or out of sight, rolled forward, or rolled away, so that the sinner is freed from the consequences of his transgression. It will not do as argument to say that it was based upon injustice that one should be given for another. For God, who is the author of these requirements, cannot do wrong. God cannot lie, nor can he be unjust.

It may be thought that such things would do for the people in a darkened period of human existence, to have such lessons of the terrible consequence of their sins, but that such demands are not to be found in the New Testament. This will prove to be a mistake. We are ready to begin the examination of New Testament teaching on this subject, and feel that we risk nothing in saying that in this last revelation of God to men, the ransom, the redemption, the purchase, the expiation by the blood of the Christ is as clearly taught as any duty or promise in any part of the word of the Lord.

It is sometimes said that God needs no sacrifice to induce Him to forgive the penitent sinner, nor to enable Him to do so. But this conclusion comes from a philosophy that is wise above what is written. I feel like the prophet Isaiah, "To the law and the testimony, if they speak not according to that word, it is because there is no day in them." God has made known his salvation to men in His word and that contains all the promises of peace which may be relied upon by any man.

Character is the product of daily, hourly actions and words and thoughts; daily forgiveness, unselfishness, kindness, sympathies, charities, sacrifices for the good of others, struggles against temptation, submission under trial. Oh, it is these, like the blending of colors in a picture, or the blending notes of music, which constitute the man.—Macduff.

Working Against War

BY H. L. MAYNARD.

If the war now raging in the far east has seemed to have the effect of stirring up the war passion in other parts of the world to an unusual degree, as may be inferred from the rumors of belligerent action which comprise a leading feature of current news, it has an equally apparent and still more striking effect in stimulating public interest, in Europe and America, at least, in projects and proposals for arbitration treaties and other means for the avoidance of war. The six months just passed have, in fact, been signalized above any equal period of time in the world's history by the number of peace compacts, either actually concluded or on a fair way to conclusion, between various nations of the world. During the very months that Russia and Japan were preparing for hostilities and while the war clouds have been hanging over the Balkan provinces, and England, Germany and the United States have been voting large increases in their naval budgets, the movement for international peace has been signalized by the conclusion of no less than seven treaties of obligatory arbitration, all recognizing the jurisdiction of the Hague court. France has been a party to four of these conventions and England three, while the other parties have been Italy, Denmark, Spain and the Netherlands. France is pressing forward more strongly in this peace movement than any other great power, and in addition to the arbitration treaty concluded with England has effected other agreements with reference to certain matters of controversy in northern Africa and on the Newfoundland shore, designed to remove all possible causes of friction between these two countries. France signed the treaty with the Netherlands on April 16, and is negotiating treaties with the United States, Denmark, Norway and Sweden and the republics of South America. The sentiment in favor of other agreements of this nature is finding strong expression in government circles in Spain and Italy. In our own country a movement has been set on foot, backed by the influence of a large number of our foremost public men, in favor of re-opening negotiations for an arbitration treaty with Great Britain. The sentiment favoring such action found expression in an arbitration conference held at Washington in January under the leadership of the Hon. John W. Foster, ex-secretary of state, a gathering which brought together a large number of earnest and influential men from all parts of the United States, who pledged themselves to immediate and positive action in the furtherance of an arbitral agreement, not only with Great Britain but with the other powers of the world. The proposals of this conference have been heartily endorsed by the executive department at Washington, and a step forward in the same direction has been taken by the United States senate in the appointment of a special committee to consider the general subject of international arbitration and report on a plan of procedure for all future compacts of this kind.* To all these positive achievements in the cause of international peace must be added such other significant and no less gratifying events as the Alaskan award, the settlement of the Venezuelan claims by the Hague court, the new and comprehensive treaty with China, the peaceful adjudication of a long-standing boundary dispute between Chili and Peru and the action of the powers in securing a limitation of the war zone in the far East. The growth and influence of peace sentiment in the United States has also been manifested in the calling of two great conventions in this country during the present year, one being the meeting of the Interparliamentary Peace Union in St. Louis, and the other the World's Peace Congress to be held at Boston in October.

It would be as absurd to suppose that all this volume of things accomplished and things promised in recent months in behalf of international concord was due to a sudden and unrelated upgrowth of public thought and feeling as it would be to suppose that the lordly Mississippi had its source as well as its ending in among the bayous of Louisiana. By a thousand rills and streams of influence flowing in upon the minds of men through centuries of time have the beliefs and convictions been formed which are now finding their visible and outward expression in Geneva awards, Hague courts, international congresses, the abolition of privateering, arbitration treaties and other things still better, soon to come. As the chief and compelling cause back of all these great and positive achievements in behalf of international peace must be recognized the aggressive, persistent and effective campaign of education and agitation which the international arbitration associations and peace societies of Europe and America have been waging for many years, and in a larger and more aggressive way recently than ever before.

Among such agencies working for the promotion of concord and good will among men and nations in recent years, a foremost place must be given to the conferences on international arbitration which have been held each spring since 1895 at Lake Mohonk, N. Y., in the region of the Catskills.

*It is understood that our state department is now prosecuting inquiries to ascertain the prospects of ratification of an arbitration treaty with France.

Here in this beautiful and romantic retreat, where "every prospect pleases," and man is not vile, some two hundred and more educators, jurists, diplomats, statesmen and business leaders—carefully selected because of their special knowledge and interest in the subject of discussion, have been coming together for nine successive seasons to consider ways and means of promoting the cause of world-wide peace through the method of arbitration. All who thus meet come together as the invited guests of Mr. Albert K. Smiley, the proprietor of the Mohonk estate, himself a member of that brotherhood of peace known as Quakers, and a man whose whole life speaks through word and deed in behalf of all things good and true. Three days are given to each conference, with two sessions daily. The emphasis of these conferences is placed wholly upon international arbitration, and to this large and inclusive theme they are strictly held. This being clearly understood at the outset, concentration, as well as harmony, is secured. Many points for cordial agreement and unity of thought and action are found in the Mohonk platform.

The coming session of the conference which will be held this year at Lake Mohonk on June 1-3, promises to be of unusual interest and to command a larger attendance than any previous session.

CLEVER DOCTOR

Cured a 20-Years' Trouble Without any Medicine.

A wise Indiana physician cured 20 years' stomach disease without any medicine, as his patient tells:

"I had stomach trouble for 20 years, tried allopathic medicines, patent medicines, and all the simple remedies suggested by my friends, but grew worse all the time.

"Finally a doctor, who is the most prominent physician in this part of the state, told me medicine would do me no good, only irritating my stomach and making it worse—that I must look to diet and quit drinking coffee.

"I cried out in alarm, 'Quit drinking coffee!' why, 'What will I drink?'

"'Try Postum,' said the doctor; 'I drink it and you will like it when it is made according to directions, with cream, for it is delicious and has none of the bad effects coffee has.'

"Well, that was two years ago and I am still drinking Postum. My stomach is right again and I know doctor hit the nail on the head when he decided coffee was the cause of all my trouble. I only wish I had quit it years ago and drank Postum in its place." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Never too late to mend. Ten days' trial of Postum in place of coffee works wonders. There's a reason.

CHRIST'S TRIAL BEFORE PILATE.—
Mark 15:1-15.

Memory Verses 12-14.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Then said Pilate to the chief priests and to the people, I find no fault in this man.—Luke 23:4.

No Trial.

Jesus had no trial in any proper or legal sense of the word. His condemnation was not the result of due process of law, but of a temporary usurpation of the judicial function by a mob. The authorities weakly consented to the usurpation, and lent their servants for the execution of the sentence of the mob, but it should be borne in mind that the condemnation was not the result of a legal trial. At first, the accusers took the trouble to go through the forms of a trial, for they suborned false witnesses, both before the sanhedrin and before Pilate's judgment seat. But the witnesses disagreed among themselves, and even this pretext of legality was abandoned and they descended unblushingly to mob lawlessness, drowning Pilate's demand for a specific indictment by shouting, "Crucify him, crucify him!"

He Answered Nothing.

In reply to Pilate's question, he admitted that he was the King of the Jews, but he would make no reply to the lying accusations which were brought against him by priests and scribes. How futile would it have been to enter into a discussion at that time and in that place! There are occasions for argument and there are occasions for silence. Before this tribunal and in the presence of this clamoring throng, no words could be so eloquent as the quiet eloquence of a dignified demeanor and a calm and confident bearing. Jesus was probably the least excited person in the company while his life was at stake. Those who follow him and do his work can afford to be calm, unafraid and undisturbed when the battles of the faith are being waged.

Barabbas and Jesus.

We must not think of Barabbas as a common thug or cut-throat. John, to be sure, says that Barabbas was a robber, but Mark and Luke speak of him as one who had incidentally committed murder while heading an insurrection, while Matthew calls him "a notable prisoner." Whatever murders and robberies he may have been guilty of, Barabbas doubtless represented the spirit of revolt against Rome. There was a strong under-current of patriotic feeling ready to take up the cause of any self-appointed leader who promised freedom from the Roman yoke. Many who followed Jesus, especially during the early part of his ministry, were moved by the hope that he might be the leader of a successful insurrection against the Romans. It required many assertions on his part to convince them that the kingdom of which he had spoken was not political.

Now there comes an occasion when choice must be made between Jesus who promised a spiritual kingdom, and Barabbas who represented the spirit of political revolt and the hope for temporal independence. When the "chief priests moved the people" to demand the release of Barabbas, it was an appeal to that narrow and short-sighted patriotism against which Jesus had so constantly contended.

The hypocrisy of the complaint of the Jews that Jesus was stirring up sedition against Rome, is shown by their request for the release of the man who was really doing that very thing.

The Practical and the Ideal.

The program of Barabbas had some elements of strength which that of Jesus had not. It was popular. The people could grasp it. It appealed to people's present hopes and desires. It was, in so far as any revolt against Rome could be, practical. Jesus proposed a plan which seemed weak in that it was too far from the comprehension of the people. It was too spiritual for the masses. It ignored the things which the common people thought important. Any politician could have told him that his movement would fail to command popular support. But who has the more followers to-day, Jesus or Barabbas? Whose movement has produced the greatest effect on the world? In truth, there is nothing so practical in the long run as an ideal.

Who Was on Trial?

It was not Jesus who was on trial before Pilate. Pilate was on trial before Jesus. The petty critic who passes judgment upon the masters, passes judgment on himself. The amateur who derides Shakespeare and says that Michelangelo could not carve nor Raphael paint, does not judge these artists but is condemned at their judgment bar. So was Pilate before Jesus, and so is everyone who passes judgment upon him. It is we who are on trial. The question is not whether Jesus will stand the test. He has already stood it. The question now is, for each of us, whether we will pass sentence of condemnation upon ourselves by declaring unworthy of our confidence and allegiance him whom the experience of the ages and the voice of God have declared supremely worthy.

HOW MY SILENCE WITNESSES AGAINST CHRIST.—Matt. 12:30; Luke 17:12-19.

For the Leader.

Witnessing for Christ is the privilege of every one of His followers. Duty is not the satisfying word to use in this connection. Of course, it is the duty of every servant to witness for Christ. But the most spiritual servant of the Master will be so glad to say a word for Him that the word duty fails to express all that his feelings contain. Witnesses in court who have to be forced by the law to testify in a friend's behalf are not commending to the world their friendship. We rejoice that we have the opportunity to bear witness for the Lord. But there is surely an impression out that testifying is for those who elect to do so. The many who never think of entering this work seem to justify this statement. How is it? May one testify, or not, as he may elect? I think not. If one who testifies upon constraint is not a good servant, it surely follows that one who does not testify at all is a poorer servant. We may go further than this and say that silence is not really a silence, but a sort of mute way of denying the Lord. Let us see how this is so.

For the Members.

1. Do we believe what the Lord says when He declares, "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad"? If we do, then indeed is silence testimony against Him. We are not going to be ready to admit this. It is not pleasant to contemplate. And it may be—is altogether probable—that we have no wilful desire to do His cause an injury when we remain silent when He is before the world for consideration, but the result of our silence is against the Master.

2. Silence in witnesses as used in the topic, is not always saying nothing. There are times in public capacities that we fail to lift up our voices for the Lord. Our moral cowardice even makes us go further and do things that are equivalent to a denial—as much so as if in so many words.

3. Have you ever heard one deny his discipleship in words like these: "I do not want to do that. Now, it is not because I am too religious, but I do not think that it is the thing"—or words to this effect. This is denying to the world that the little good in our lives is of Christ. It seems to be a sort of unwillingness to admit the facts. It is, probably, more often due to the fact that we are ashamed of our discipleship.

4. If we would stop long enough to think how the Master must be pained by our silence, we would see this matter in a different light. Jesus desires the world-wide acceptance of His gospel. He wants everyone to accept the invitation of mercy. One soul in His estimation is worth more than the whole world. Here are tens, fifties, hundreds listening. The time for testimony has come. My testimony might bring many to the light. But I am silent. My voice is not heard. "Has Jesus any followers here?" asks the unbelieving world. "Surely not," one says, "or they would be heard from." So the word goes out that no witness of the Lord and His work was there. Yet I was there, though I took no part. By my own course I have placed myself with those who do not believe. I am counted against Him. All this time my Lord has been looking upon me, and expecting that I would testify for Him. Can I bear to see Him face to face after this sort of denial?

Quiet Hour Thought.

Oh, Lord, help me that I may never deny thee either in silence or in open declaration.

CHRISTIAN COURTESY.

"Finally, be ye all like minded, compassionate, loving as brethren, tender hearted, humble minded" (1 Peter 3:8).

It is a fact overlooked by some that Christianity inculcates the social amenities and the humanities; that it proposes to make gentlemen and ladies of those who accept its teachings. It is pre-eminently a social religion and has to do very largely with our relations with our fellow men. The earliest disciples of Jesus were men without the training of the schools or the social advantages which are supposed to develop those courtesies which characterize cultivated people, but the religion of Jesus Christ seems to have supplied this lack and to have made them not only exemplars, but teachers of the very principles of Christian courtesy.

Peter as an Example. Consider what kind of a heart could have indicted the sentiments in the above text. Here was the sturdy, undaunted, rock-like disciple, whom his Master called rock, breathing sentiments which could only come from a heart that had felt the regenerative power of Christ. Think of a church, or a whole brotherhood, of whom it could be said that they are "all like minded, compassionate," or sympathetic, "loving as brethren, tender hearted, humble minded: not rendering evil for evil, or reviling for reviling; but contrariwise blessing." Every one of these descriptive words or phrases should be studied and emphasized as entering into a well developed Christian character.

Paul as an Example. The reader will recall the incident of the apostle Paul before the council (Acts 23:1-5), and before Felix (Acts 24:10), and before Agrippa (Acts 26:1-3). In all these instances there was provocation to be other than courteous, and yet Paul showed himself the accomplished gentleman as well as the fearless apostle. And how much this must have added to the force of his appeal for Christianity!

Exhortations to Courtesy. Read Romans 12:10: "In love of the brethren be tenderly affectioned one to another; in honor preferring one another." Also Romans 13:7: "Render to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due: custom to whom custom: fear to whom fear: honor to whom honor." Also Ephesians 4:32: "And be ye kind one to another, tender hearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you." These sentiments must be written upon the hearts of those who would be truly Christian and who would manifest Christian courtesy in all their relations with their fellow men.

The Value of Christian Courtesy. We are apt to underestimate the value of such injunctions as those quoted above, and the virtues they inculcate. We are prone to estimate as of more importance the doctrinal questions about which men argue and differ; but if conduct be so large a part of character, it would seem to be evident that these admonitions, having to do with life, are more vital than some other questions to which we attach greater importance.

Our Chief Example. In the grace of courtesy, as in all other graces, Jesus is our highest example. Being reviled, he reviled not again. He was gentle toward all men. He was respectful to the lowest, to the very outcasts of society. None were too poor, too obscure, too ignorant, or even too wicked to receive His kindly notice and sympathetic instruction. With the highest courage He combined the greatest gentleness and the tenderest sympathy.

Prayer. Oh, Lord, our divine Teacher, inspire us, we beseech Thee, with that love for humanity which made Thee an example to us in all that is unselfish, kind, compassionate and helpful. May the mind which was in Thee be also in us that we may be courteous and kind, tender hearted and forgiving.

neys, and had to urinate from four to seven times a night, often with smarting and burning. Brick dust would settle in the urine. I lost twenty pounds in two weeks, and thought I would soon die. I took the first dose of your Swamp-Root in the evening at bed time, and was very much surprised; I had to urinate but once that night, and the second night I did not get up until morning. I have used three bottles of Swamp-Root, and to-day am as well as ever.

I am a farmer, and am working every day, and weigh 190 pounds, the same that I weighed before I was taken sick.

Gratefully yours,
Sec. F. A. & I. U. 504. T. S. APKER,
April 9th, 1903. Marsh Hill, Pa.

There comes a time to both men and women when sickness and poor health bring anxiety and trouble hard to bear; disappointment seems to follow every effort of physicians in our behalf, and remedies we try have little or no effect. In many such cases serious mistakes are made in doctoring, and not knowing what the disease is or what makes us sick. Kind nature warns us by certain symptoms, which are unmistakable evidence of danger, such as too frequent desire to urinate, scanty supply, scalding irritation, pain or dull ache in the back—they tell us in silence that our kidneys need doctoring. If neglected now, the disease advances until the face looks pale or sallow, puffy or dark circles under the eyes, feet swell, and sometimes the heart acts badly.

There is comfort in knowing that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, fulfills every wish in quickly relieving such troubles. It corrects inability to hold urine and scalding pain in passing it, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to get up many times during the night to urinate. In taking this wonderful new discovery, Swamp-Root, you afford natural help to Nature, for Swamp-Root is the most perfect healer and gentle aid to the kidneys that has ever been discovered.

Swamp-Root a Blessing to Women.

My kidneys and bladder gave me great trouble for over two months and I suffered untold misery.

MRS. E. AUSTIN.

I became weak, emaciated and very much run down. I had great difficulty in retaining my urine, and was obliged to pass water very often night and day. After I had used a sample bottle of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, sent me on my request, I experienced relief and I immediately bought of my druggist two large bottles and continued taking it regularly. I am pleased to say that Swamp-Root cured me entirely. I can now stand on my feet all day without having any bad symptoms whatever. Swamp-Root has proved a blessing to me.

Gratefully yours,

—June 5—what? Children's day.

—The Ohio Christian missionary convention is in session this week at Cleveland, as is also the Illinois state convention at Cuba. We hope to give reports of both in our next issue.

—Remember the Missouri state convention, Carrollton, June 17-22. This is to be a meeting of our Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor, C. W. B. M. and missionary workers, all in one. It will convene on Friday and hold over Sunday, our ministers filling the pulpits, with a union communion service in the afternoon. It will be a great convention. Do not miss it.

—The World's Press Parliament began its sessions at Festival Hall in the fair grounds on Thursday evening of last week. Editors and representatives of the leading papers of the world are present. The address of Secretary Hay at the opening session was in fine literary style, and contained most excellent advice to the editorial fraternity. The president of the Parliament, Sir Hugh Gilzean-Reid, of London, has promised an interview with a representative of our editorial staff.

—T. B. Mayfield has resigned at Gallatin, Missouri.

—M. L. Pontius has been asked to remain a second year at Long Point, Ill.

—The Pacific Christian has removed to 63 Flood Building, San Francisco.

—The Christian church at South Bend, Ind., is taking steps to erect a new building.

—J. N. Streater, West Liberty, W. Va., is convalescent after an attack of pleurisy.

—J. S. Henderson, after a month's sickness, is now in the field again in North Carolina.

—C. G. Kindred, of Chicago, is to hold a short series of special meetings at Duluth, Minn.

—Brother Melton's people at Richmond, Va., are planning to build a new church house.

—George Darsie, with Pres. Burris A. Jenkins, has been having a fine meeting at Frankfort, Ky.

—Last week the Foreign society received another gift of $500 on the annuity plan from a friend in Iowa.

—H. C. Combs, field secretary of the Virginia C. M. S. reports the work progressing all along the line.

—J. K. Stephens has just closed two years' work at Corvallis, Mont., and accepted a call to White Hall, Mont.

—Mrs. A. P. Boyd, of Lagrange, Ind., has presented a beautiful pulpit Bible to the church at Osgood, Mo.

—J. C. Dickson, pastor of the Tyler, Texas, church for four years, will take up the work of evangelist in the Temple district, June 1.

—W. N. Arnold preached the baccalaureate of the high school, Elmore, O., at a union service held in the Methodist Episcopal church.

—The Texas state convention will be held at Greenville, June 6-9. The latch strings are held up and a great convention is anticipated.

—S. W. Nay has just closed a four years' pastorate at Leavenworth, Kan., to accept a call from the Central church in Kansas City, Kan.

—Wm. Woods College, Fulton, Mo., and the Christian college, Columbia, Mo., are holding their annual commencement exercises this week.

—Ira F. M. Butler, a well known Disciple of Christ, has just passed his 92nd milestone and still reads the papers and keeps up with the times.

—The reception tendered A. M. Growden and wife, and announced in our issue of May 12 as having occurred at Scranton, Pa., was really at Findlay, O.

—J. N. McConnell, evangelist, is one of the busiest men in the northwest. In 18 months he has had about 400 accessions, and has re-organized several churches.

—Mrs. Princess Long will have charge of the music at the state convention at Buffalo, N. Y., June 28-July 1. It promises to be the best convention held in that state.

—J. M. Bovee, after four months' patient waiting in the hospital, is again at home enjoying life and Christian fellowship, but he will not be able to preach for some time.

—Over 3,000 Sunday-schools are now actively at work like busy bees preparing for children's day, June 5. It is believed that more than 3,500 schools will observe children's day this year.

—Peter Ainslie's church in Baltimore hopes to hold a tent meeting this summer as near the new Christian temple site as possible. Already many are asking that the tent be twice as large as the one used last year.

—"Do any of you want the secret of success? Then get it in untiring personal work. I keep at it and urge my people to keep at it, and as a result we are having good meetings." So writes S. J. Vance, of California, Mo.

—The commencement exercises at Cotner university are dated June 2-8. N. S. Haynes is to preach the baccalaureate sermon on June 5, and S. D. Dutcher will give the commencement address on the following Wednesday.

—Harvey McCowan, of Snow Valley, Pa., is dead. Brother McCowan was one of the landmarks. At eighty-four years of age he was the last of a large family. He had been baptized in early manhood by Alexander Campbell.

—L. L. Carpenter preached the opening sermon in the new building at Walnut Corners, Vermillion Co., Ill. It is a very handsome building, and to the pastor, W. H. Kern, much credit is due. The church was founded 70 years ago.

—By special request of the students of the State university and others, J. W. Lowber recently delivered a lecture in Austin, Texas, on "The Revelations of the Microscope and the Future Life." This lecture was published in the Austin Statesman.

—We have received one dollar from Stacy Pettit, Fort Smith, Ark., to supply tracts for free distribution at our World's Fair building, in response to our call for such a fund. Does this express the amount of our faith in the benefit of tract distribution?

—We have received the program of the commencement exercises of Kentucky university, June 7-9. Dr. Chas. W. Dabney delivers the address to the graduating class. The baccalaureate sermon will be delivered Sunday, June 5, by A. B. Philpott.

—The Foreign society will hold a conference with some 14 of its missionaries in Cincinnati, June 1, 2. Six of the number are new missionaries who sail in September. The conference will close with a public reception to the missionaries at the Central church, June 2, at 8 P. M.

—Robert Perry Shepherd, Pomona, Cal., says: "Lest you forget. Pomona gave $75 in 1903, $160 in 1904. Children's day yet to come, and steps already taken to swing the necessary ballots into line this year for the first living link on the coast through our organized work."

—The new Christian Sunday-school in East Dallas, Texas, is hoping to raise one dollar per capita on children's day, the first Sunday in June. Their apportionment was $10, but their superintendent, James J. Collins, says the school was not pleased with the apportionment.

—Bro. J. W. Devore telegraphs us that the evangelistic work of Clarence Mitchell at Mannington, W. Va., will mean a permanent organization. There are now 100 members of the church, and they have just purchased a $3,700 lot, and completed plans for a handsome building.

—A. McLean preached for the Hiram church Sunday, May 15, and on the following Tuesday gave his lecture on "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher." We have a report that Brother McLean made it evident that he can preach and lecture just as effectively as he can make missionary addresses.

—Frank M. Wood, of Springfield, Mo., was ordained on May 15 to the ministry at Bethany church, six miles from that city. Brother Wood is an earnest, consecrated man, and promises to do good work.

—The largest attendance ever known in the Kirksville Sunday-school was Sunday before last, when 409 were registered. We doubt whether these figures have ever been exceeded in any Sunday-school in the state.

—The Chicago ministerial union is anxious to get hold of the names of all Disciples of Christ who have gone or are going to that great city. It is believed that there are a great many members of our churches living in the city who have not become identified with any of our scattered churches.

—The brethren at Hickory, Miss., have had the misfortune to lose their little church by fire. The organ, the books and everything were burned and there is no insurance. As there are but a few Disciples there, they will not be able to rebuild unless they can get help. Anyone desiring to contribute may communicate with J. R. Tidwell.

—Steps are being taken to erect a new church at Colgate, I. T., where E. R. Hawkins is the corresponding secretary and evangelist. The church was organized five months ago, and in the meeting now being held 15 have been added, which raises the present membership to 45.

—Henry C. Rogers, attorney at law at Aspen, Col., is teaching a class of 30 Sunday-school teachers of all denominations, including Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist pastors. He wants "to be able to give them the gospel undiluted." We are sure Brother Rogers will do this.

—H. T. Morrison, who has been spending some time visiting his sons, in Springfield, Ill., called at the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on his way to Oklahoma, where he will engage in pastoral or evangelistic work, as need may be. He reports the work as prospering in Springfield in both our churches.

—Harry G. Hill, general secretary of the education society, is going the rounds of the state conventions. He recently spoke at Lebanon, Ind., and is slated to address the annual conventions of South Dakota, Missouri, Iowa, southern Kentucky and New York. Receipts from education day offering exceeded $4,000, and are still coming in.

—John G. Slater, pastor of the Akron, Ohio, church of Christ, who was formerly affiliated with the Baptists, has one of the largest churches in our brotherhood. It supports three missionaries and conducts one of the most successful Sunday-schools in the state. Brother Slater has an adult Sunday-school class of 303 members, and in four years about 125 additions have come to the church from this class.

—We regret to announce that Bro. F. G. Tyrrell has been quite ill with a severe attack of the grip, and has been unable to occupy his pulpit at the Mt. Cabanne church for the past two Lord's days. He has been removed to a sanitarium in the city, and we learn is slowly improving, though it will probably be some time yet before he will be able to preach. His many friends will pray for his early recovery.

—"The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has done much for me in clearing away the cobwebs from my mind and giving me a larger and purer faith and broader view." This testimony, coming in this instance from one beyond the sea, and coming so often from others within our own country, is what makes an editor feel that it is worth while to put his life, his best thought, and his highest ideals into religious journalism.

—Prof. Snoddy of Hiram college writes: "C. C. Rowilson, pastor of the church at Kenton, O., recently delivered a course of lectures to the students and faculty of Hiram college. The subjects were as follows: 'Religion and Nature,' 'Religion and Humanity,' 'Religion and Christianity,' 'Religion and the Church,' and 'Religion and Immortality.' The lectures showed thorough mastery of the subjects and were greatly enjoyed by all."

—"The prime occasion of this letter is to thank you for your reply in your 'Easy Chair' to the letter received from a sister living in a city where she is denied the privilege of membership and fellowship in the Christian church. I am so pleased with your reply that I cannot refrain from telling you so.

Weatherford, Tex. "W. L. SWINNEY."

—The motive which prompts some of our scribes in going far from home in search of heretics, when their own state is literally swarming with the worst type of schismatics, is not easily understood. Why not "begin at Jerusalem," and flagellate all the false teachers and division-breeders in reach of their own diocese, before sighing for other worlds to conquer?

—The University of Missouri, Columbia, holds its sixty-second commencement May 28—June 1, 1904. Dr. E. Benjamin Andrews, chancellor of the University of Nebraska, will preach the baccalaureate sermon Sunday, May 29, and Dr. C. W. Dabney, University of Tennessee, delivers the university address on Monday evening, May 30. The class day exercises will be the forenoon of Monday, May 30.

—Lest we forget. Let it be remembered that no Sunday-school is too small or too weak to observe children's day. This is a certain way to gain strength. Last year 3,310 schools made offerings and averaged $15.59 each. The prospects are bright for an increase in the number of contributing schools as well as in the general average. It is confidently hoped that $60,000 will be raised by the Sunday-schools this year.

—A. L. Ward, now of Boston, writes: "We are hoping to do much work here in this very important center. The St. James street church is in good shape. No man could have done better work than did the former pastor, Brother Mohorter. He is very much loved by this people. Brother Calhoun, of Harvard, who goes into the faculty of the college of the Bible, has been supplying for this church. In every way he is well spoken of."

—The annual banquet of the ministers' alliance of Kansas City and vicinity will be held at the Hyde Park church, corner of Westport and Main streets, Kansas City, Mo., on Friday, June 3. R. H. Fife, secretary, writes: "We are endeavoring to make this the greatest gathering and the best banquet in the history of our alliance." The program, which is enclosed, indicates that the intellectual feast will be all that could be desired.

—The Church Leaflet of Lexington, Ky., published by I. J. Spencer, says: "H. D. Clark, minister of the Christian church in Mt. Sterling, Ky., is not only very popular with his own congregation, but is affectionately regarded by all the citizens of the community, who uniformly designate him as 'Brother Clark.'" That is right. A preacher should regard the whole town as his parish, and seek to be a blessing to the entire community.

—Apropos of the charge recently made by a Baptist writer in these columns that Mr. Campbell and others "split off from the Baptists," Bro. P. C. McFarlane, of Alameda, Cal., sends us the following quotation from Newman's Church History, in which that eminent Baptist historian says: "And controversy arose that led to the exclusion of the Campbells and their followers from the Baptist fellowship at this time." This certainly places the responsibility for the "split" on the Baptists of that time and section.

—L. E. Sellers, pastor of the Central Christian church, Terre Haute, Ind., has returned from his Palestine trip with Professor Willett. He was in his pulpit Sunday, May 15. A. L. Ward, who has been supplying for him in his absence, has accepted a call to the St. James street Christian church, Boston, Mass. Brother Ward commenced his work May 22. His stay with the Central church was very pleasant, and he reports that Brother Sellers is doing a fine work there. Mrs. Sellers, who was ill a part of the time while Brother Sellers was gone, is much better and has returned with him to Terre Haute. The Central church is planning to hold a series of meetings next fall after the national election.

—A short time since a newspaper man in this city whose name was Paul Moore committed suicide, and of course the associated press carried this news everywhere in a "bulletin" form without sufficiently describing the suicide, who was an elderly man. We have just learned that some of the readers of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, remote from St. Louis, have supposed that it was our assistant editor who committed the rash act! Not so, by any means. Our Paul Moore is young, full of hope, is succeeding in life, has hosts of friends and is far more likely to commit matrimony than suicide.

—Texas Christian university is nearing the end of the most successful year in the history of the institution. The total enrollment is 429. The university has made an average increase of 44 per cent per year for the last two years, and is sending out the largest graduating class that has ever gone forth from the institution. Prospects for the coming year are very bright. The great problem is to provide for the students that are coming. President Zollars will preach the baccalaureate next Lord's day, and Granville Jones will give the class address at commencement on the following Thursday.

—A central Kentucky Christian ministers' association was organized at the Versailles convention. Mark Collis was elected president, I. J. Spencer vice-president, W. H. Allen secretary and J. B. Hunley treasurer. The first regular meeting of the association will be held at Broadway Christian church on Monday, May 30. J. T. Sharrard will read a paper on "The Problem of the Country Church," and F. M. Tinder will present "The Present Status of Christian Endeavor in Kentucky." These addresses will be followed by a general discussion. The public is invited, and all preachers are earnestly requested to attend.

—The monthly sermons delivered by Bro. E. L. Powell, Louisville, Ky., at Macauley's theater, which have been stenographically reported and have received a wide circulation through the daily press of that city, though discontinued for the summer will be resumed in September. Our readers will be glad to learn that arrangements have been made with Brother Powell by which these sermons, when resumed, will appear regularly in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. We are sure that those who have read those which we have published in whole or in part, will look forward with interest for the appearance of these sermons during next autumn and winter.

—Dr. James M. Gray, of Boston, is about to begin his work at the Moody Bible institute of Chicago for the summer term. He will conduct consecutive courses from June to September in "Old Testament Prophets" (from Isaiah to Malachi), "New Testament Epistles" (from Romans to Jude), and "Facts for Use with Doubters." These will all be treated in a way intended to help pastors, Sunday-school teachers and others who can attend the institute for even a brief period in order to get a firmer grasp of the Bible. In addition, Dr. Gray will give a series of popular expositions of New Testament truth for helping young Christians in life, conduct and service. Full information can be secured by writing to 80 Institute place, Chicago.

—We rejoice with the brethren at New Philadelphia, O. Bro. C. B. Reynolds writes: "About the first of April a strenuous effort was made to pay the indebtedness of $2,612.50 of the church in thirty days. Never did a people more nobly and manfully rise to a situation than did these people. There were heroic sacrifices. It seemed like attempting the impossible. But the pledges were paid. Sunday, May 15, was jubilee service and mortgage burning day. The church was praised for being so heroic in their self-denial to bring about this beautiful building as a monument to the principles of the restoration movement. Letters of congratulation from former pastors were read, after which the mortgage was given to the flames, and as it fumed and smoldered, the congregation, standing, sang, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow.'"

Children's Day

FOR

HEATHEN MISSIONS

First Sunday in June, 1904.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society furnishes supplies, free of charge, to Sunday-schools observing the day for Heathen Missions. Order at once. State number in school.

Address F. M. RAINS, Cor. Sec., Cincinnati, O.

—The following message has just come from our esteemed brother, F. M. Green, of Kent, Ohio: "My beloved wife passed into the rest that remains to the people of God, this morning (May 19). She died on her 67th birthday. I crave the sympathy of my brethren in this great sorrow." When two have walked together in loving companionship so long as did Brother Green and his wife, it is indeed a bereavement that seems to take a large part of the light out of life when one of them is called away. We are sure the brotherhood will sympathize with Brother Green in his sore bereavement.

—B. S. Ferrall's church at Buffalo is getting interested in a new organ. At the last business meeting of the choir the matter was discussed, and so much enthusiasm was manifested that it was decided to start an organ fund at once. A novel plan was suggested by one of the members which seemed to be favorably regarded by others. The idea is to dispose of the organ pipes at $1 apiece—the largest pipe will be dedicated to the person selling the largest number of pipes. The person on the other end will have the honor of pumping the air into the bellows of the organ when used at the church for the first time. We pity the fellow who has to do the pumping.

—Bro. J. M. Philpott and his wife arrived in St. Louis on Friday evening of last week from San Diego, where they had been spending a few weeks. Brother Philpott occupied the pulpit of the Central Christian church on last Lord's day, both morning and evening, preaching to large audiences. In the evening the Mount Cabanne church met with the Central. It is not too much to say that people generally were delighted with the preaching of Brother Philpott. Our readers understand that Brother Philpott has been called by the Union avenue Christian church as a supply with a view of becoming its permanent pastor. On next Lord's day evening the two congregations meet together at Mt. Cabanne church.

—The Foreign Christian missionary society has inaugurated an annual conference with newly appointed missionaries and missionaries on furlough. This will be held on June 1, 2 in Wiley Hall, Cincinnati. Among the speeches on the program are: "The Missionary Calling," by C. L. Loos, "The Distinctive Aim of the Missionary," by F. M. Rains, "The Intellectual Life of the Missionary," by W. E. Garrison, "The Spiritual Life of the Missionary," by I. J. Spencer, and other topics bearing upon missionary work. Fourteen missionaries are to take the field, six of them being new to the work. Such a gathering as the one contemplated, where men of experience can exchange views, is likely to be productive of much good and great inspiration.

—One of the largest audiences ever assembled in Danville, Ill., was present at the dedication of the beautiful house of worship of the Third church of Christ on the corner of Walnut and English streets. Many people were present from adjoining cities and the majority of the members of the First church, with their pastor, attended. J. B. Gilliland, of Bloomington, preached the dedicatory sermon, his subject being, "What Christ is to Men." At this service $9,000 was raised. In the afternoon a union service in charge of J. H. Smart, of the First church, and J. M. Gaiser, of the First Cumberland Presbyterian church, was held. The doors of the church were thrown open for inspection, and the pastor, S. S. Jones, and others explained every point of interest. Brother Jones speaks in highest terms of Brother Gilliland's preaching and recommends him as especially fitted for such work. He adds: "Would there were more J. H. Gillilands!" In all over $10,500 were raised, more than enough to pay off the indebtedness. The lot and the church cost $16,000.

—The western Pennsylvania convention was a very large one, as we hear from all accounts. Bro. O. H. Phillips in writing of it says: "It sounded a very high note. The doubters have all fled and the workers believe the occupation of the field is within the grasp of the Christian church. Evangelists Bright and Joyce are to be kept right at work. Other evangelists are to be invited. The ministers are to be borrowed from old churches for at least one month each year, and the field is to be stormed in his name. Miss Vasicek begins her work among the Slavs. Mr. Keusseff is to join in the same work. This is our outlook to-day, and the promise is as bright as the stars." We are glad to see such faith and to know of the good work that is being done in this part of our country. There is much scope for winning great victories if we will faithfully do our duty.

—T. A. Abbott, secretary of state missions in Missouri, sends us a printed slip of statistics from which we clip the following figures and comment:

"GROWTH OF CHURCHES IN MISSOURI.

Year	Churches	Members
1830	20	500
1840	70	4,000
1850	235	15,000
1860	350	25,000
1870	400	30,000
1880	600	46,000
1884	720	56,000
1890	1,157	110,000
1895	1,410	136,000
1900	1,600	160,000
1901	1,625	167,000
1902	1,675	170,000
1903	1,700	175,000
1904	1,718	179,000

"This is most wonderful growth. No other state in the nation, no other like territory in the world, no other religious body on earth has ever had such development. The chief human factor in all this is certainly our splendid state missionary organization."

—Here is some more good news from Joplin: "I am happy to report to you that the entire heavy indebtedness of the First church here is pledged to be paid by the first of next January. The pledging was all done in two days, and the whole campaign planned and executed in six weeks with only two weeks' active preparation. Bro. W. E. Harlow was with us. He gave wise counsel and powerful exhortation. The new converts stood side by side with the older ones and gave like veterans. The city here seems as greatly mystified at the raising of this debt as they did at our meeting last fall. Unity, liberality and enthusiasm did it. We expect to have a joint jubilee with the south Joplin church during the Christmas holidays when we both expect to be free. Further details then. Is this the result of 'sensational evangelism' so much spoken of now?" W. F. TURNER.

We think not. There is a "sensation" produced by the earnest preaching of the gospel as the power of God, in the power of the spirit, of which we cannot have too much. Then there is a "sensation" produced sometimes by "claptrap" methods, as when a popular evangelist rode a donkey down the streets of the town, wearing red trousers—the evangelist, not the donkey—crying at the top of his voice, "Come to Jesus!" The sensation at Joplin was not of that type. It was gospel preaching preceded and followed by godly living and by painstaking Bible instruction and Christian training. Would we had more such "sensational evangelism!"

—"The preacher who takes the work at Eureka, Kan., and wipes out the church debt can do wonders." Such has come to be a proverb in reference to the difficulties under which this church has been laboring, but the long standing indebtedness has at last been wiped out and the mortgage burned. It was some six years ago that a beautiful and commodious church was erected at a cost of about $5,000, but after the dedication there remained a debt of $1,000 which has been on the building ever since. Two years ago, however, G. F. Bradford took up the work and, though with little experience, he has proved himself to be the man for the place. Finding many of the church members indifferent and discouraged he succeeded in infusing new life and spirituality into them. His salary has been twice increased and the indebtedness on the church wiped out. He has won the esteem of the entire city. Including evangelistic services in which he was assisted by R. A. Omer, the net gain to the membership has been 100.

World's Fair Pavilion Fund.

Since our acknowledgment of receipts for this fund last week, the following additional cash contributions have been received:

J. M. Pickens, for Vermont Ave. Chris- tian Endeavor, Washington, D. C.	$ 2 00
Holland Reavis, Beaumont, Texas.	10 00
C. W. Field, Welsh, La.	5 00
Mrs. Mattie Waller Rice, Edgerton, Mo.	1 00
C. W. B. M., Indianapolis, Ind.	300 00
W. A. C. Rowse, Kelso, Wash.	25 00
Mrs. R. Mason, St. Louis.	10 00
W. P. Clarkson, St. Louis	5 00
Z. Moore, Taylorville, Ill.	50
Mrs. A. S. Hedden, Taylorville, Ill.	1 00

This indicates a little waking up on the part of the brethren to the importance and needs of this enterprise, but there is still a deficit of several hundred dollars, the exact amount of which we hope to be able to report next week when all our bills are in. In addition to this, however, there is needed something for fitting up the building so as to make it a comfortable and respectable looking rendezvous for our members and their friends during the progress of the World's Fair.

DEDICATION.

On Saturday, June 4, at 3:30 p. m., the dedication of this pavilion will take place. A program of music and short speeches will be arranged for the occasion. Bro. Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Ind., president of the American Christian missionary society, will make the chief address. It is hoped that a sufficient amount of funds will have been contributed by that time to enable us to dedicate the building entirely free of debt. The members of the church in the city and brethren from outside the city are invited to attend these exercises.

J. H. GARRISON,
Chairman of committee.

Christian Orphans' Home, St. Louis, Mo.

Visiting brethren and sisters who stay over Lord's day will find a hearty welcome if they will call at the Christian Orphans' Home, 915 Aubert Ave., near the Suburban Ry. Chapel service, with interesting exercises, is held from 3 to 4 o'clock P. M. This service will be suspended during July and August; will be resumed first Lord's day in September. Come see and hear our children sing.

JOHN BURNS.

Ministerial Exchange.

Churches in need of a supply or assistant pastor during the next four months, address F. M. O'Neal, 842 W. Florida St., Springfield, Mo.

A young married minister, 26 years of age, with college education and experience both in pastoral and evangelistic work, desires to change location about June 1. Salary $1,000. Can give best of reference. Address L. Box 3, Pryor Creek, I. T.

J. Windbigler, pastor Christian church, Girard, Ill., can put any church desiring a pastor in correspondence with one who has been very successful in Illinois and Missouri, and can furnish the best of references.

E. L. Frazier, 2206 College Ave., Indianapolis, Ind., and H. A. Easton, 6430 Parnell Ave., have formed an alliance for evangelistic work, and are ready to make engagements for fall and winter, or later.

Wanted.—A first-class preacher for an important church. Address J. Elza Holley, Everest, Kan.

The New Bible College Building.

The Bible college of Missouri takes pleasure in presenting to the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST a picture of its new building, now in process of erection. In consideration of the gift of $15,000 by Bro. B. F. Lowry and his sister the building is to be a memorial in their honor, and is to be known as Lowry Hall. To those of us who are personally acquainted with Brother and Sister Lowry, and who know their humble ways and deep consecration, this building will be the more precious because of its association with their names and memory.

The building is to be of stone throughout. It is a handsome specimen of Tudor architecture and the masonry is to be in the style known as Russian. Such buildings are becoming popular in Columbia, the University of Missouri having recently erected three of them. The first floor, consisting of four large rooms and a number of others, will be devoted to our college work. The second and third floors will be used as dormitories and will accommodate from fifty to sixty students. The whole of the lower corridor is to be laid in tile and made fire-proof. All the floors are to be of hard maple, and the building will be complete and modern in every respect. The cost of it will be about $25,000, aside from furnishings. The plan looks ultimately to a handsome chapel as a part of the building, and the total cost will be perhaps above $30,000. Friends of the institution will be glad to know that we are in fine shape financially as regards this building. There will be no incumbrance on it except the six per cent annually to Brother and Sister Lowry. With $50,000 more in our endowment we can begin to do a strong work in this great educational center. The outlook for our work is wholly encouraging. A number of new students in preparation for the ministry contemplate being with us next semester, and increasing numbers of university students are looking forward to work. We continually praise the heavenly Father that he leads us with such a kindly hand.

W. J. LHAMON, deap.
Columbia, Mo., May 21.

News From Many Fields

Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia.

Your correspondent was with Bro. O. G. White at our 25th street mission in Baltimore from May 2-13. Two made the good confession during that time, and they, with one other, were baptized May 15. Also a young man from the Episcopal church came forward and will be baptized next Sunday night. He is a member of their male quartette.

On Monday, May 9, I met with the preacher's meeting at Washington. It seemed like going home, as I was formerly associated with them, while in Rockville, for nearly three years. Their association now includes Power of the mother church; Bagby, 9th St.; Taylor, H St.; Harris, Whitney ave.; Jones, 34th St.; Crierie, S. E. mission and assistant to Bagby; Whiston, Rockville; Motley, Cropley; Watson, Vienna, Va. The church at Vienna, about twelve miles from Washington City, expects to dedicate their house of worship on June 12. The congregation at Lansdowne, Md., near Baltimore, have out invitations for their dedication on the same date. Bro. J. B. De Hoff is minister there.

In Baltimore, B. A. Abbott is at the mother church, Peter Ainslie at Calhoun St., D. M. Wetzel, of Wisconsin, at Fulton ave., O. G. White at 25th St., and M. C. Hughes will take charge at Riverside Park, June 1. There is a nucleus for another mission in East Baltimore and Highlandtown, and it is hoped to make a beginning there this winter. I preached in Waynesboro, Pa., Sunday, May 15, in the forenoon and at Fairfield at night. The little congregation of twelve at the latter place will stake off the ground for a new house of worship to-day. Brethren in Pennsylvania who read this, send in help to Edward P. Brown, Fairfield, Pa. The Disciples of Christ have not a house of worship nor a church fully set in order in this part of Pennsylvania. I know of none nearer than Harrisburg, or Le Moyne, near the capital. J. A. HOPKINS.

Ohio Letter.

The Ohio Disciples are assembled at Cleveland this week in their state convention. Everything points to a large and enthusiastic gathering. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, as usual, will give a full report next week.

A. M. Growden got so homesick at Scranton, Pa., that he had to come home. He has become responsible for the pulpit of the church at Hamilton. We gladly welcome him home.

W. B. Slater has accepted a call from the thriving church at Lancaster. This is a very promising work and Brother Slater has an opportunity to show his metal.

S. C. Pierce is ministering in word and doctrine to the saints at Lynchburg. Brother Pierce is well fitted to meet the demands of that field, and we shall expect good reports.

F. C. McCormick has flown from Hillsboro to Milton, Ind. He did well at Hillsboro and is heartily commended to the Hoosiers.

Wayne street, Lima, has in hand the resignation of W. A. Brundige. He has been bishop in the field for five years. The work has prospered. Brother Brundige is not settled as to his future work just yet.

C. C. Rowilson, of Kenton, recently gave a series of lectures before the faculty and students of Hiram.

J. H. Goldner is welcomed back from his trip to Palestine by the Euclid avenue church of Cleveland, and also by his brethren of the city in general. He will address the preachers June 6 on the scenes of interest in the journey.

A. F. Stahl has located with the Third church in Akron. He is another wandering child returned home. We welcome him also and congratulate Akron.

Hiram will have a six weeks' summer school. Professors Snoddy, Paul and Wells will be the instructors. They will give courses in psychology, English, German and theology. These are three fine, up-to-date teachers, and if you are interested write Prof. Paul. C. A. FREER.

Collinwood, O.

Michigan Notes.

The annual convention of the Michigan churches of Christ will be held with the church at Adrian, June 6-9. We expect to make this the best convention in our history. The Michigan Christian missionary society has made a good record this year, and the reports will be an inspiration. A splendid program is provided, and a large attendance of Michigan Disciples is the one thing needed to make this convention a success. J. H. O. Smith, of Valparaiso, Ind., Edgar D. Jones, of Cleveland, Ohio, A. McLean and B. L. Smith, of Cincinnati, Miss Mary Lyons, of Ohio, Miss Mattie Burgess, of Indianapolis, Mrs. Arthur Helmer, of Philadelphia, Pa., Miss Magdalene Stucky, of Morehead, Ky., and C. C. Smith, of Cincinnati, are the names of those outside of the state who are to take part on the program. A large number of Michigan preachers will add to the feast.

W. H. Kindred is assisting H. H. Halley in a meeting at Kalamazoo with 15 additions at last report and good prospects for many more.

F. S. Taylor has accepted a call to Hartford and is already on the ground.

Another congregation from the "New Lights," with their pastor and church property, has recently joined the ranks of the restoration movement in Allegan Co.

A. S. Martin, of Grand Rapids, has been supplying at Cascade for a few weeks. G. T. Camp, of Wayland, will preach at Cascade, May 22.

We have spent three Lord's days in this place. The work starts out very encouragingly. There have been five added to the church the last two weeks, three by letter and two reclaimed. The outlook seems favorable for a good work.

The church at Trowbridge is prospering under the ministry of W. H. Betts. They are growing in numbers and in spiritual power.

Paw Paw, Mich.

Illinois Notes.

In Mackinaw is to be found one of the old churches. Here Alexander Campbell preached, and I believe solicited help for Bethany college. This is the home of the Puterbaughs, pioneers in the county and in Christianity. "Uncle Sol" is old and feeble, one of the last of the older families of the church. The Lord blessed him with considerable means, and he has been a valuable patron and helper in Eureka college. Such names will live long after their bodies perish.

The church numbers about 300, and there were 226 in Sunday-school the day I was with them. The Christian Endeavor society is alive and active. There is some talk of the erection of a new house of worship which would add much to the pleasure and comfort of the congregation, besides making better facilities for good work. Bro. H. H. Peters, a student in Eureka college, is their minister, visiting them every week. The church is prospering under his vigorous and wise efforts.

The Havana church was organized five years ago, has a membership of 150, a Sunday-school enrollment of 150, and a comfortable house of worship paid for. J. A. Serena gave the little church a good start, while as student in college he visited them regularly. At present L. O. Lehman, who graduated in Eureka College in 1901, is leading the church to higher and larger usefulness. He has the city districted with workers in each part to look after the various interests of the church. The church now has two of its young people in Eureka college, and it responded most liberally in support financially of Eureka college.

The Mason City church was organized 20 years ago by G. M. Goode. It has had a varied career, poverty, removals and deaths have impeded its progress. It has now a membership of about 150, a Sunday-school of 75, and a good Christian Endeavor society. H. A. Orchard has been ministering to the congregation with increasing strength and usefulness for nearly four years. He is highly esteemed and appreciated as an excellent minister.

At Petersburg we found W. M. Groves busy looking after the sick, both in the church and out of it, and building up the cause generally. The church was organized by D. R. Lucas, and for many years ministered to by M. M. Goode. In some respects this is a very strong church. Many influential people are in it, a large proportion of whom have been unusually blest with this world's goods. The Lord has graciously trusted them with great power in his kingdom. There probably never was a time when money meant more for good, if properly used, than to-day; nor a time when the temptation was stronger to use the Lord's money for our own pleasures, instead of in his service. Blessed is he who is rich in good works, ready to distribute, abounding in sacrifices for the church of God. This is true riches, "the Lord loves the cheerful giver." J. G. WAGGONER.

TWO OLD REMEDIES.

Two of the oldest and best remedies sold are Allcock's Porous Plasters and Brandreth's Pills. They are celebrated household necessities. For sprains, rheumatism, pains in the side, back or chest, or any suffering that is accessible from the exterior, Allcock's Porous Plasters are perfection, while for regulating the whole system, invigorating the liver, and cleansing and purifying the blood, Brandreth's Pills are unequaled.

News From England.

Perhaps a brief report of the work in this district may be of some interest. While the churches of Christ cannot give such glowing reports as many in the states, still we are making healthy growth in most quarters. The half-yearly conference of eight northern churches of Christ was held last week at Chorley. The church at Chorley is the youngest in the association, and only recently erected a building. But they are thoroughly in earnest and had a good report, fourteen additions in the last few months. Southport reported eleven added since last report, and good outlook. Birkenhead, although at present without a pastor, reported interest holding good. Liverpool is at present our most flourishing work in England, twenty-seven added recently; present membership 394, 110 in the missionary society, 230 in the Sunday-school. Chester was able to report all departments doing good work and eleven baptisms. Saltney reported eight.

The principal subjects considered in the conference were, "The Church's Attitude Toward the Liquor Traffic," and "The Work of the Sunday-school." W. E. Rambo, on his way home from Damoh, India, was present and gave an inspiring talk upon the work in India. The Disciples are looking forward to our annual conference, to be held at Chester Sept. 19-21. ### Virginia.

On Sunday night we closed a two weeks' meeting in the city of Blackstone. We preached in the opera house and our audiences were large. This is a Methodist stronghold. One of their institutions of learning is located here. The Presbyterians also have a school in this city. A church was organized with 30 members. They are earnest and enthusiastic. Nearly enough money was secured to pay for a lot. They hope to build a house soon. Brother Morten, of Crewe, and George E. Owen and Jones gave assistance. If you want to see good people, fine people, some of the best of earth, then go to "old Virginia." They know how to treat a fellow. Sometimes they almost embarrass you with kindness. Brother Jones will preach for them.

En route home I spent the night in Roanoke and lectured for Bro. W. G. Johnston's people. An excellent audience was present and money was given toward repairing the church house. Brother Johnston is a busy man. He preaches, attends debates, lectures, visits, evangelizes and reads and keeps up with the times. The church is growing.

We lose Brother Owen from the state. He goes to Illinois. The people where he labored say: "He did the best work that has been done in this field in many years." Brother Helsebeck, now of Christian college, Virginia, will take charge of this work. He is a good man.

The church at New Castle now has a preacher in the person of Brother Scott. He recently took unto himself a wife.

Charley E. Elmore, assisted by R. E. Elmore, recently conducted a meeting at Graham which resulted in adding 47 to the church. He is now helping Brother Morten at Crewe.—State Evangelist H. C. Combs is hustling things. He goes after the money and gets it, too.

Bro. R. V. Omer is in a meeting at Salem.—Evangelist D. H. Coffey recently held meetings at Museville and Staffordville with a large number of additions to the church.

We now occupy the auditorium of our house of worship.—Our Sunday-school is on a boom. A man, formerly a Baptist, decided recently to be a Christian only. On Wednesday a Presbyterian was baptized. Our good brother H. C. Lester offers to give us a valuable lot, near the church, fronting two streets, 125x300 feet, for a parsonage if we will build a good house on it.

The work at Danville, under Bro. J. A. Spenser's wise direction, is prospering. He preaches at Stoneville once per month.

"It is doubtful if the majority of persons in Missouri know that there is in this state a publishing plant capable of turning out so thoroughly excellent a piece of work as this new volume. In this respect it is equal to the volumes from the most skilled of the Eastern houses. In so far as the contents of the volumes are concerned, the strongest praise would not be inapplicable. It is a scholarly and serious work, dealing with religious problems of wide interest and combining dignity with the right kind of liberality."

This is the published opinion of the great St. Louis daily, the most authoritative of Western literary newspapers, in a review of

This district is badly in need of work and we trust the state board will put some live men into the field at an early date.

Bro. W. G. Johnston is in a meeting at Blacksburg.

It makes me sick to see some of our religious papers advertising all kinds of wild cat schemes and in that way causing some of our preachers, who are anxious to get rich, to fall into the whirlpool of speculation. Shame be upon such papers and preachers. They are hardly in a condition to be translated! It is as necessary to look after the life as it is the doctrine. Practice beats teaching.

South Dakota Letter.

Six were baptized and took membership with the church as a result of the union revival services, closing April 24. Rev. J. A. Mahood, of Sioux City, did the preaching and the writer conducted the song services. Meetings were held in the Christian church building except Lord's day, April 22, when we went to the opera house. We have secured a loan from the church extension board to pay the balance due on our church building. Reorganized the Christian Endeavor society at the midweek prayer-meeting last Thursday night. We are opening up two school house missions, one, Midland Center, where we organized a Sunday-school, May 8, numbering 40; the other Golden Shield, where we preached a few times last summer. Highmore is building a new church building. Bro. L. W. Thompson is the pastor. Messington has a new pastor. A brother of Bro. M. B. Ainsworth, of Aberdeen, has taken the work there. The state convention convenes at Aberdeen June 15-19. Hence the cry of the churches is, "On to Aberdeen." We are laying plans for a great campaign of work for the Master this year.

BETTER THAN SPANKING.

Spanking does not cure children of urine difficulties. If it did there would be few children that would do it. There is a constitutional cause for this. Mrs. M. Summers, Box 183, Notre Dame, Ind., will send her home treatment to any mother. She asks no money. Write her to-day if your children trouble you in this way. Don't blame the child. The chances are it can't help it.

Kentucky Missions.

During April the student volunteers were 26 days in the field, preached 31 sermons, added eight, visited eight places, organized one Sunday-school, held one officers' meeting, made 41 visits, collected for self $17.45 and raised for local work $51.49. Walter Carter, John Lord, Chas. James, Gilbert W. Campbell, J. Stuart Mills, E. S. Lewis, C. M. Summers and A. F. Hensley were the men who did the work.

D. G. Combs was at work all the month, but not very long at any one point. He did good work in Bath, Johnson and Pike counties. He finds the Big Sandy valley almost entirely without workers to preach the gospel. We need two good men who can work for four or five hundred dollars a year in that field. That will amount to as much as six or seven hundred dollars a year in many other sections.

H. J. Derthick was at work all the month at Berea and in Jackson county; 12 sermons, four added, one officers' meeting. Ernest W. Elliott will spend a few days with him in May. He wants ten of the students' band for the summer.

H. W. Elliott was at work all the month. Spent more than two weeks at Ludlow in a meeting. There were five additions and pledges amounting to more than $3,000 raised to pay a debt of eight years' standing. Walter C. Gibbs is doing a fine work there. Other additions just after close of meeting. The collections for work by H. W. E. were $380.07. He preached 22 sermons, attended two conventions, besides the work at Ludlow.

We again plead with our friends to rally to our help in support of state missions. We have now passed the two great offerings of the year and he will push the claims of our state work with the utmost vigor until the September convention.

Some individual gifts were received during April. We pray that many other brethren and sisters may send an offering of like character. Send all offerings to,

Our Western Letter.

It was my privilege, recently, to spend a month in Texas, at Dallas, with the Central Christian church, the beloved M. M. Davis pastor. Those days were full of sweetness. I can never forget them. If the preaching and teaching did the people anything like as much good as the conduct of the people did the preacher and his wife, the meetings were a great success. I felt every day that it was a privilege and an honor to stand in the place so long and so successfully occupied by M. M. Davis.

A dozen years ago the condition of the Central Christian church in Dallas was, from my point of view, dark in the extreme. The congregation had commenced to build, and was apparently not able to finish. The church was deeply in debt. Its assets were not sufficient to satisfy the legal claims of its creditors. This was the condition, without exaggeration, a dozen years ago.

There is now a modern house of worship paid for. The property is worth, easily, $65,000. Much more than this was the cost to the congregation. At one time the church paid $11 a day interest on its debt! Pluckier people I have not known. The pastor stood at his post without a tremor or word of complaint during those days of trial. He had invitations to go here, there, yonder. He could have had an easy place. He preferred the hard. It seemed to be the place of duty. Verily I say unto you, he has now his reward in the confidence and affection of his people.

During this time the Ross avenue church, the Dawson avenue church, and the East Dallas church have been organized. The strength of these congregations went from the Central church. Graham McMurray preaches for the Ross avenue congregation. He is a fine young man, and is doing a good work. He is earnest, diligent, studious. W. A. Fite preaches for the East Dallas church. This congregation was organized less than six months ago. Brother Fite has been with the church less than three months. A tabernacle has been erected that will accommodate 500 people. This has been paid for. A good piece of ground has been paid for, with the exception of about $200. The tabernacle stands on a portion of this plot. There is an abundance of room for a commodious house. This will, in the course of time, be erected. The church has an ambition to become a "living link church" this year—the first year of its existence. There are frequent additions to the membership of the church. Every member of the official board, with one possible exception, is a member of "the tenth legion," i. e., pays one-tenth of his income to the Lord to aid in extending the borders of the kingdom of righteousness. The young church is full of enthusiasm, and seems to be entering on a career of great usefulness. The Ross avenue church has a very good house of worship. The Dawson avenue church is comfortably housed also. All of these steps have been taken—the completion of the magnificent Central church building, and payment for the same, and the organization of the three congregations named, and all that they have gained—during the last dozen years.

The Central church has yet a membership of about 800, and its members contributed last year to the cause of missions, at home and abroad, through the regular missionary organizations, and otherwise, about $2,000.

My visit to the Central church was intended as a prelude to a great meeting to be held by W. E. Harlow. This congregation is trying an "experiment." All the leading evangelists among the Disciples have, during the last fourteen years, visited and labored in the Central Christian church in Dallas. Not less than 2,500 persons have come into the fellowship of the church during this period. It was thought by those in authority that a series of didactic discourses, before the beginning of an evangelistic campaign, might be an improvement. It remains to be seen whether the new method of proceeding is better than the old. Possibly it would be better to have the teaching after the matriculation. The Central church, in any event, is bringing us under obligation by its suggestion of a possibly better way. I have no doubt that under the appeals of W. E. Harlow, the membership of the church will be largely increased.

I, too, tried an "experiment" in Dallas. I knew that I was called as a teacher. The expectation was entertained, I know, that my sermons would be didactic. My first discourse, therefore, was on the Christian religion: 1. Our Sources of Information; 2. The Founder of the Christian Religion; 3. The Faith of the Christian Religion; 4. The Ordinances of the Christian Religion; 5. The Life of the Christian Religion: (a) Godward; (b) manward; (c) selfward. At the conclusion of this simple, condensed statement, I said: "All that I will say during my sojourn with you, will come under one or the other of these divisions. I will speak to you either about our sources of information concerning the Christian religion, namely the Holy Scriptures; or the founder of the Christian religion, namely Jesus of Nazareth; or the faith of the Christian religion, namely belief in this Jesus as the Son of God and the Saviour of men; or the ordinances of the Christian religion, that is, baptism and the supper of the Lord; or the life of the Christian religion, that is to say, the daily life enjoined by the founder of the Christian religion on all who accept him and his religion."

The effort was to get away from parties, sects, denominations, schools of thought of the present day, and receive instruction from the Master and those whom he sent out to represent him, as teachers and preachers among men.

This was an "experiment." I am not altogether satisfied. I believe, however, that my face is turned in the right direction. What do you think?

While I was in Dallas, T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, Mo., was in McKinney, forty miles distant. T. P. Haley is a great teacher. He had large audiences. My audiences were small. This is a habit of mine. I saw a note in print about Brother Haley's work in McKinney to the effect that it was more like a school than a "revival." Far be it from me to speak against "revivals"; but ought not the churches to have meetings frequently of the character of T. P. Haley's work in McKinney?

Dallas is the home of the Christian Courier, edited by G. A. Faris, one of our best papers. The influence of the Courier must be wholesome. It was a pleasure to meet Brother Faris again and again, to hear his voice in prayer, and a fine address. The address was delivered at a missionary rally held in the Central church. Archibald McLean and G. L. Wharton spent a day with us. It was a season of refreshing. If possible have a missionary rally in your congregation with McLean and Wharton as chief speakers. They will lift up, expand, instruct, and enthrall the people. We must have a meeting of this character in Denver:

David Walk lives in Dallas. He is a member of the Central church. Brother Walk is in good health. His spirit is buoyant. He preaches every Lord's day. Almost forty years have passed since I first met Brother Walk. He is a little beyond seventy years of age, but has more vigor, intellectual and physical, than some men who are only thirty or forty years old. It was a great pleasure to meet and greet Brother and Sister Walk.

The residence of Dr. R. W. Allen is an ideal home for a preacher and his wife. If a cup of cold water given to a disciple in the name of the Master shall not fail of reward, what will not the household of Dr. Allen receive for all their kindnesses to Mrs. B. B. Tyler and her husband!

B. B. TYLER.

Indiana State Missionary Convention.

The Indiana state missionary convention was held May 17-19 with the church at Lebanon, Ind. This is an old historic congregation, having been organized in 1832. They have a splendid house of worship and a large working church. The pastor and congregation did everything in their power to make the delegates feel at home and enjoy the work of the convention. The addresses made by the various representatives on the program were practical and strong, and indicated that Indiana at the present time has a strong, vigorous ministry. In fact the writer never attended an Indiana convention that impressed him more with the strength of its ministry than the one just held at Lebanon.

T. J. Legg, state secretary and evangelist of the Indiana mission work, presented a most excellent report. Among other things the report showed that they had held about thirty state and district missionary conventions during the year, and while there was only about $3,000 raised for state missions, there were over 1,000 conversions to the churches reported. Resolutions were passed to enlarge the work during the coming year and the indications were that Brother Legg was to give his entire time to the evangelistic field, for which he is so well qualified, and the work of secretary was to be done by some other person. A. B. Philpott, of Indianapolis, made a dignified and courteous chairman, and all other officers of the convention seemed to discharge their duties with promptness and accuracy. Among the active members of the convention who formerly labored in the west, we noticed T. W. Grafton, C. H. Trout, W. W. Sniff and Robt. Sellers. Among the strong addresses delivered which the writer heard were those of Prof. Jabez Hall, Prof. C. B. Coleman, E. B. Scofield, P. J. Rice and W. W. Sniff. President W. E. Garrison, of Butler college, delivered the closing address, but the writer was denied the privilege of hearing him.

The Disciples of Christ have 125,000 members and nearly 1,000 churches in the state of Indiana. The great problem that the state mission board has to contend with at the present time is the fact that we have a scattered membership in almost every town and community over the whole state, many of which are without state organizations. One hundred congregations could be organized within one year if the forces were sufficient to visit these communities without churches. Pater familias L. L. Carpenter, E. B. Scofield and T. J. Legg seemed to understand the situation thoroughly, and if Brother Legg has sufficient force to organize and Brother Scofield to develop, Brother Carpenter would certainly dedicate the churches as fast as they could build them if he had to dedicate one every day in the week. Taking it all in all, the work in Indiana seems both hopeful and full of promise.

Nebraska Secretary's Letter.

The three weeks of the Austin-McVey meeting at Geneva show 44 additions. Many of them are baptisms. The interest continues unabated and the meeting will probably not close until about May 26. In the face of the fact that this church has been inactive for several years, this showing is very gratifying.

F. S. White reports two by statement at Dorchester. He will move his family from Arapahoe the first of June.—The church at Verdon has called Bro. A. P. Aten, of Roseville, Ill., and he will begin work there May 29.—S. D. Dutcher will begin his work at Omaha First church May 29. Brother Dutcher has consented to preach at the state convention on Lord's day, Aug. 7.—E. B. Widger, of York, visited a few days at Falls City this week. He is called to deliver several extra addresses at different places. He will preach the convention sermon at the state convention on Tuesday evening, Aug. 2.

Edgar Price, of Beatrice, has been preaching at Wymore on Lord's day afternoons recently.—W. Walter Mower is supplying at Ansley for a month with a view to locating.

The church at Kingston, known as Liberty Christian church, was dedicated on May 15 free of debt by this secretary. More people gathered than could get into the house, and three services were held. A basket dinner added materially to the enjoyment of the occasion. There is a nice intelligent class of people in this valley, and if the present outlook for crops holds out, they will probably add new seats. They have formerly been meeting in a sod house.

The convention of No. 3 at Valparaiso was very poorly attended in point of numbers. The quality was unquestionable, but the quantity was lacking. The district owed it to Valparaiso to do better by them. F. E. Janes was made president, and H. J. Kirchstein corresponding secretary for the coming year.

No. 6 will convene at David City, June 13-15, and No. 5 at Chester, June 15-17, and No. 4 at Wakefield, June 17-18; No. 8 at North Platte, June 21-23. Let the members of these districts take note of these dates and prepare to attend.

Eddyville church was to be dedicated at Eddyville May 15, but no report has come in of the services. Brethren Divine, Hester, Darnier and Rader were to be present. We wait for full report.

The executive committee of the state board will meet at the office of the secretary May 24. The matter of a pavilion for our camp grounds and other improvements will be among the matters under consideration.

East side church at Lincoln is now actively at work building a new parsonage. A fine lot just south of the church was secured and they are erecting a comfortable house. This is a very proper move. Brother Boyd, the preacher in charge, is very glad of this, as he is just now living upstairs.

The cards for the annual statistics of churches and Bible-schools and Christian Endeavor societies will be mailed very soon. The things asked for are not numerous, and a very little prompt attention will answer them. It would seem to be quite easily possible to have reports from every congregation in the state. The blank is easily understood, the postage is prepaid thereon, and no church clerk or preacher, who desires to have a proper record made of the congregation that has called him to service, can afford to let the call go unheeded. Let us have complete returns this year immediately after June 1.

It is important to remember that our state missionary financial year closes June 30. It is equally important that remittances to our work should be made before that date. The treasury is now behind with the workers, and some of them are needing the money due them very badly. The apportionments are not burdensome. They can be easily met if a little concerted action is had of all concerned. Everywhere there is a growing sense of the vital necessity of keeping up our state work. The calls for our help do not abate, but rather increase. Some churches are spending thousands where we spend hundreds in state missions.

W. A. BALDWIN.

The Scoville Meeting.

I began a meeting at Beaumont, Texas, April 10, and closed May 10, with two hundred and seventy-one additions to the church. Brother De Loss Smith led the music and did the best solo work I have ever had in a gospel meeting.

Bro. B. J. Waugh went to Beaumont about January 1 and began a campaign by holding a meeting in the south end in a small tent, and then in the north end, with Brother and Sister Saxon as singers. While the rainy season greatly crippled their efforts, they reached fifty people for the church and did much to advertise the meeting in the tabernacle, which was held right in the business part of the town.

Inasmuch as many churches will be interested in knowing how the meeting was financed, I will say that we had but eighty-five members there to begin with. The ladies' aid society raised the necessary $375 for the tabernacle, and the collections the first week in our meeting were $106; the second Sunday they were $84, and averaged a great deal over $100 each week. I gave two stereopticon lectures—one to a $174.80 house, and the last, "A Night in Egypt," to a $225 house—lacking but 20 cents of $400 in the two lectures. Thus our expenses, salary, cost of tabernacle and advertising were all easily raised.

We have many noble people in the church there, and large numbers (a majority) of those reached were from other churches. The last five I baptized were, three Episcopalians, one Methodist, and one Catholic. There were five Catholics who came into the church during the meeting. One night there were ten husbands and wives, all of them from other churches, except one man, and no two of them belonged to the same church. Thus it was Christian union indeed to see husband come from one church and wife from another, stepping out upon the Bible to wear the name of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Brother Waugh can be engaged for meetings this spring. His address is Longview, Texas. I have had one thousand additions in meetings, and am at Moberly, Mo., now, and then back to Chicago. Bro. Chas. A. Young has supplied our pulpit during my absence, and I have also gone home on several different Sundays between meetings.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

You have seen the program of the Bible-school convention, and you will do well to post up on those good points and come prepared to help make the sessions interesting, for by hearty co-operation in the conferences is our help and inspiration, no matter what part of the work may be on at any time. The time of the conventions is June 17-22, and you ought to take part in all the sessions of all the conventions, not any special one.

New schools for the eleven months of our year number 30, with a membership of 1,527. Out of these ought to grow several congregations. There were over 800 additions by our forces during the year, and five new congregations, so that we are going to Carrollton with a "record breaker" in the matter of works and results, and now can we not rightfully ask our ministers and Bible-school superintendents to see that the schools and congregations break the records in giving? Will those schools that have co-operated with us in the past please join us again this year, and if possible by May 31, and will not the many that have not helped us in the past get the habit right now? Here is a sample of how this work is done: In 1884 the few brethren living in Laddonia were induced to organize a Bible-school, though too weak to support a congregation. This was done and shortly afterwards a meeting was held and force enough gathered in to have preaching one-fourth time. By faithful and persistent work a house was built, and later on a minister for half time was called, and now C. A. Lowe is their minister and doing good work. Among others, the school was fortunate in having J. C. De Laporte as superintendent for nineteen years, and he is one of the men who always keep abreast of the times in their work, so that the school to-day has all the latest things that can be used with good effect. The second great help has been one teacher, a fine one too, for eighteen years, R. W. Pearson, who never allows anything, if possible to avoid it, to interfere with his Bible-school work. Another great help has been their secretary for eighteen years, A. L. Bruton, methodical and systematic in all his labors. Others have come and gone, but these have gone on in their devotion to Christ, the children and the gospel, and the results have told for good. They now have a roll of honor, based on presence, offering and memory verses, and of the three classes on the roll for the last quarter, a class of boys of twelve or more years, taught by Miss Zoda Welch, stands first, graded 94. Only one year did the school give less than $10, and this year that was made up, so the books show in all these years, with all their struggles, no failure to help this holy cause; this is due largely to the three men of God mentioned.

T. J. Head has just closed that good meeting at Sullivan, where some Christian women have so long wanted a house of God. Put out of one house, sent to another, he went on and the people followed, and now there is a good congregation, with 32 additions, lot purchased and money raised toward a new house, and our evangelist promises a tent meeting this summer. Thank God for this victory of his Son. Brethren, won't you help such men? Will you not do so before May 31? Will you not bring it before your schools and see that at least the apportionment is sent in? We appeal to all friends, help.

Concerning the Missouri Endeavor Reports.

Our state meeting, held this year at Carrollton, is not far off. The Endeavor convention will occupy Saturday night and Monday morning. And we will have charge of the Endeavor prayer-meeting on Sunday evening. Remember, the state meeting date is June 17-22. The railroad fare will be one and one-third fare for the round trip, and the Carrollton church will furnish lodging and breakfast free. F. M. Tinder, for many years president of the Kentucky Endeavor union, will deliver the address Saturday night. Do not fail to get there in time for that.

I know the preachers are always ready to help in the Endeavor work, and I am now asking a small favor of each one who reads these lines: I have mailed my annual letter, a report blank, and a copy of our program to every society on my list. Four hundred and forty-eight letters have gone out within the last few days. Will you inquire if your Endeavor has received this letter? If not, there is a mistake. See that the name of your corresponding secretary, the number of members, active and associate, and the gain during the past year are sent to me at once. If your society has gotten the letter, see that the response is sent in in a few days. This is very important. Just a minute of time and just a word on Sunday will confer a great favor upon your superintendent, and enable him to have a good report at Carrollton. See that your society sends on the dollar for statistic and convention expenses. It is a small matter, but it is being sadly neglected.

And now a word to everybody: Talk up the convention. Get up a delegation from your place. If there is a society anywhere in the state that has been organized this year—since last June—send me the name of the corresponding secretary at once. In short, if there is anything that I ought to know before my report is made up, send it in, send it in, send it in!

Get the work in good shape to leave, leave the worry at home, get on a year-to-year—or an ear-to-ear—smile, and come up with a little old-time Endeavor enthusiasm in your bones. Bring your white handkerchiefs along and practice the Chautauqua salute.

Denominations .....	88
Total .....	930

M. L. BUCKLEY.

Harrison, O., May 18.

CALIFORNIA.

Saratoga, May 16.—Just closed a remarkably successful three weeks' meeting held by Evangelists Hazelrigg and Read; profound interest, good audiences, great spiritual results; thirty-three accessions—nineteen by confession and baptism, fourteen by statement. This is the fourth meeting held on the coast this year by Sister Hazelrigg, and all have been equally successful.—JOHN P. ASHLEY, minister.

Ukiah, May 16.—One added by letter here yesterday. Wife and I assisted Bro. J. E. Hood at Hopland a few days midweek, singing and preaching. Six were baptized on May 13 and others were interested. Brother Hood is a splendid personal worker and is greatly beloved by his people both in and out of the church. It was a pleasure to work with him.—OTHA WILKISON.

ILLINOIS.

Dorchester, May 16.—Had one confession and baptism from M. E. church at Marine yesterday. Sunday evening I preached the memorial sermon.—J. E. MASTERS.

Tuscola, May 16.—The work here prospers. We have inspiring audiences. I will preach the baccalaureate sermon for the high school, May 22, at the Presbyterian church. All the leading churches will unite for the service. We had three additions by letter last Lord's day.—J. T. DAVIS.

Windsor, May 17.—There were two baptized at regular appointment at Oakland, May 15, and two confessions at Humbolt May 1. Church at Humbolt took collection for benevolence. They have newly papered and carpeted the church. The work is harmonious and prosperous. We conducted our ninth protracted meeting at Windsor in March. There were 35 additions in two weeks. Brother Baker is now our pastor at Windsor.—A. H. HARRELL.

Eureka, May 18.—I preached at Fairbury last Lord's day; two additions. I am now living at Humbolt. Would like work in reach of this place so I can attend school here. I have had six years' experience in the ministry.—LEW D. HILL, Box 318, Eureka, Ill.

Lanark, May 16.—Two additions here from the Baptists at prayer-meeting recently; 15 baptisms since last report; 34 persons added to the church since Bro. B. L. Wray began his work here July 1, 1903. All departments of the church now organized and strengthened and working as never before. Brother Wray will preach the baccalaureate sermon here for the high school, May 29. The church board voted to loan him for a short meeting with some weak church during July or August.—C. BEN DORS, church clerk.

INDIANA.

New Albany, May 16.—Eleven accessions not reported—three yesterday morning. This makes 28 at regular services since Easter—all by baptism but three. Wonderful interest here, and this is a delightful and hard working people.—B. F. CATO, minister Central church.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Chickasha, May 12.—The interest in the Lord's work here remains fine; eight accessions last Lord's day; three confessions. Baptismal service almost every Sunday; 143 additions since last August.—J. SPRINGER.

Pryor Creek, May 16.—Just closed a short meeting with home forces. Eight by baptism, three by letter and one from the Baptists. Large audiences every night, and we feel that much good has been done. Howard S. Saxton, who led the music, did splendid work.—F. HOOKER GREEN.

IOWA.

Atlantic, May 16.—Two additions here yesterday.—W. B. CREWDSON.

Cedar Rapids, May 16.—We received five more persons into the fellowship of the Second church here yesterday.—J. E. DINGER, pastor.

Coggon, May 21.—Four added here recently not heretofore reported in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. We are planning for an aggressive campaign here this fall. I have been selected to deliver the annual memorial sermon May 29; also the address to the class of '04 at the commencement, June 10.—BERT W. SALMON.

KANSAS.

Olathe, May 17.—Bro. J. Ira Jones closed a successful meeting May 15 at Baxter Springs with 42 accessions. A Christian Endeavor society was organized with 32 members and the Sunday-school increased almost a half. This will close our labors together as state evangelists. I should like to engage for meetings any time after May 29, as my time is not employed after that date.—BERT I. BENTLEY, singing evangelist, 1430 N. Jackson St., Topeka, Kan.

Topeka, May 19.—I gave a series of lectures on "Great Problems of Life and Religion" at Edwardsville, extending an invitation at the close of each lecture, which resulted in 16 additions, 13 confessions and three by statement. I have also baptized eight at other points since last report.—CLERIN ZUMWALT.

KENTUCKY.

Bowling Green, May 17.—We began a meeting on May 10. R. H. Crossfield, of Owensboro, is doing the preaching with great power and effect. Splendid audiences and deep interest. Thirty-one added to date.—W. T. WELLS, minister.

Fullerton, May 16.—This is my second visit to this busy, growing suburb of the city of Portsmouth. There is a grand opening here for the cause of Christ as we plead it. Yesterday morning a Roman Catholic boy made the good confession and I baptized him and a young lady in the Ohio river at 3 P. M. Last night two ladies made the good confession and four stalwart men "came to themselves" and, prodigal like, came back asking forgiveness both of God and men. I stay to-night; other pressing duties call me away to-morrow. I pray for the time that my "hands may be untied" so that I can take hold of the work at mission points like this and press it on to grand success.—R. B. NEAL.

MICHIGAN.

Saginaw, May 16.—Great day for home missions yesterday; offering $40. Two added by baptism.—J. S. RAUM.

MISSOURI.

Clarksville.—Seven additions since last report, four by letter, three by baptism.—J. D. POWELL.

Kirkville, May 18.—Two confessions and two by letter since last report.—G. W. THOMPSON.

California, May 19.—Two confessions at our prayer-meeting last night, girls 13 and 16 years old. We are having splendid meetings with growing interest and audience.—S. J. VANCE, pastor.

Shelbina.—At recent appointments at Shamrock, two additions by letter, one by baptism. At Ashley I gave my lectures on "Jamaica" and "The South," and took up offerings for foreign and state missions.—CLARIS YBUELL.

St. Joseph, May 17.—Two added by letter at Raytown the first Sunday in May. Mission collections: Foreign, $6; benevolent, $10; home, $10 and state $3.36. Children's day collection first Sunday in June. The church is doing well. I began with them in February for one-half time.—N. ROLLO DAVIS.

Rolla, May 17.—Our meeting at Sullivan closed last Wednesday night with 32 additions to the church, a new congregation organized, a church site bought, and over $300 pledged for the new church building. I am in a meeting here. Began yesterday with two additions at the first service.—T. J. HEAD, Bible-school evangelist.

Monroe City, May 15.—The Monroe City church held its annual missionary rally May 2-8. The pastor was assisted by W. Henry Jones, W. N. Briney, W. G. Swiber, Walter M. Jordan and Claris Yeuell during the week. The offering was taken May 8 at the morning service, and amounted to more than $400, by far the best effort of the church. All apportionments were more than met. Four baptisms lately at regular services.—J. C. TODD.

Bowling Green, May 20.—There were two added to the church here the first Lord's day in May and two added at Troy the third Lord's day in this month. Both of these churches made offerings for American missions.—E. J. LAMPTON.

NEBRASKA.

Geneva, May 16.—Seven confessions to-night. Packed house, people standing. This makes 44 added to date and more than doubles the membership of the church. Third week just closed. Will probably run over Sunday.—DE FOREST AUSTIN and FRANK McVEY, evangelists.

Pawnee City, May 16.—There were two confessions here at our regular service yesterday, May 15.—T. A. LINDENMEYER.

NEW YORK.

Niagara Falls.—Four baptized Sunday night, May 15.—J. A. WHARTON.

Brooklyn, May 20.—The Second church of Christ is enjoying a series of gospel meetings with State Evangelist Stephen J. Corey in the lead. Eight added by confession and baptism. The meeting will continue several weeks. Large audiences, excellent interest.—JOS. KEEVIL.

OHIO.

Bellaire, May 16.—Three baptized and one added by letter yesterday. About 30 added, 17 by baptism, in last two months at regular services.—SUMNER T. MARTIN.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Stroud, May 10.—We closed our meeting here last night with 46 additions—30 by confession and baptism, ten by statement, four from the denominations and two restored. F. G. Roberts is the pastor, to the satisfaction of all, and is doing a fine work. We returned two days to Ripley and baptized two more, making 32 there. Our next meeting is at Mena, Ark., to begin May 20. Permanent address, Comanche, Texas.—ARTHUR W. JONES and E. M. DOUTHIT.

Stroud, May 19.—Arthur W. Jones and Prof. E. M. Douthit, both of Texas, have just closed a meeting for this church with 44 additions: 34 by baptism, the others by relation. This church has been strengthened and this town stirred. These are capable men and should be kept busy. There have been about 80 additions to this church since I came here in August last.—F. G. ROBERTS, pastor.

PENNSYLVANIA.

South Sharon, May 19.—Have been here three weeks. Preached each evening. Meeting held in a store room, though the regular meeting place of the church is the Odd Fellows' hall. Seven added; five by baptism.—F. A. BRIGHT, evangelist.

SOUTH CAROLNA.

Charleston, May 16.—Two baptisms here yesterday and two good audiences.—CHAS. E. SMITH.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

Adelaide, April 21.—I preached my last sermon at Grote street April 17, with one baptism. On April 14 an American song and dialect entertainment netted $35 for the Mc Garvey chair. B. W. Huntsman, now in Michigan, has been called to succeed me. M. W.

Green takes up the work next Sunday for the interim. I will lecture two weeks with the Melbourne college of the Bible and three weeks with churches in and about Sydney, and will hold a meeting with the Petersham church, N. S. W., before sailing for America.—WREN J. GRINSTEAD.

TEXAS.

Cleburne, May 16.—One confession and baptism yesterday and one added by statement. Our offering for home missions will be about $17 or $18. Will begin a meeting July 10 with home forces.—J. G. CREASON.

Whitesboro, May 16.—Last night we closed a short meeting with the church in this town. There were 22 additions to the church. Brother Holmes, the young pastor, and his wife are doing a splendid work here. I expect to begin a meeting in Muskogee, I. T., to-night.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Dallas, May 16.—We began here yesterday with the beloved pastor, M. M. Davis. Bro. W. E. Harlow is the evangelist and I have charge of the music.—V. E. RIDENOUR, singer.

Garland, May 16.—Our collection for home missions was postponed for two weeks on account of other matters, but we collected $21 yesterday for that fund.—CHAS. CHASTERS.

Seymour, May 17.—Upon receiving an urgent call from the Seymour district, and approved by the missionary board of northwest Texas, wife and myself left our good work in Oklahoma territory and commenced on special work in this district, comprising some 13 counties of which we have sole charge. We have been holding meetings at Seymour, Level View, Round Timber, and now go to Spring Creek, Throckmorton, Archer City, etc., then back to the missionary convention at Seymour, June 17-19. We have had grand meetings and the best of order. Mrs. Van Deusen is a licensed missionary evangelist and is a splendid personal worker. We are open for engagements and will be glad to hear from all churches needing our services in missionary and special meetings.—WM. H. VAN DEUSEN and LAURA B. VAN DEUSEN.

Whitesboro, May 16.—On last evening we closed our meeting of about three weeks' duration, with Bro. H. A. Northcutt as evangelist and Bro. Jas. M. Faulkner as singer. It is pronounced one of the best meetings ever held by the Christian church in Whitesboro. The accessions were as follows: by confession, 11; from the Methodists, two; from the Baptists, one; by statement and letter, six; reclaimed, three. The church is greatly strengthened and encouraged.—E. H. HOLMES, minister.

WASHINGTON.

Waitsburg, May 18.—Two additions since last report, one by letter and one confession. Audiences are keeping up well. Preached the baccalaureate sermon for the high school graduates last Sunday evening to a full house.—W. T. ADAMS.

The Ministerial Situation.

I have watched with interest what has been said recently through our papers in reference to "ministerial supply," preachers going into avocations or leaving the work altogether, the dearth of preachers and the varied explanations which have been set forth for the existing conditions. To my mind none of the explanations "hit the nail on the head." That there is an ever increasing number of preachers going into other callings there is no question; that it is becoming more difficult to induce young men to enter the ministry I believe to be true, also. May not the following facts have to do with this matter?

1. It requires more money and time to make a preacher than it does a lawyer or a doctor;
2. When once equipped he can, at most, hope to be constantly employed not more than thirty years of his life;
3. During these thirty years his income is not large enough to enable him to lay by for the inevitable "rainy day";
4. He must be a married man. Children come into his home; he loves his wife and children as dearly as any man. His position demands that they go well dressed; at least as well as the church people. This his salary does not allow;
5. The church and the community demand that his sermons be "up-to-date," which means the latest and best books, papers, periodicals, etc.;
6. At the age of fifty he must take a pastorate at less salary than heretofore, and by degrees go down and finally out with no income at all at last, if he lives to an old age. Young men, I believe, are not less religious, but they are more thoughtful. Middle-aged preachers are not growing faithless, but they see the inevitable and are trying to save their loved ones from being thrown out into an uncharitable world.

So far as my knowledge extends, and I have made quite extensive inquiry, the ministerial salary has not increased during the last decade, but rather decreased, which makes his salary at least ten per cent less than ten years ago. Preachers are human, their families are human and their physical needs are in common with the world, and to cry, "Faithless; another preacher has given way to the world spirit," is, it seems to me, to beg the whole question. The higher, nobler, wiser, more really Christian thing to do is this. Let all concerned look the situation squarely in the face and provide the remedy which is: 1. An educational fund to assist worthy young men in preparing for the ministry. 2. The assurance of work, constant employment during one's active ministerial life at a living salary; 3. A pension following this period, on down to death, large enough to keep "the wolf from the door." Until something of this nature is done we cannot expect much change along this line. From personal correspondence with a large number of our best preachers it is surprising how many are financially ill at ease.

"My Kind of Federation."

Much has been said and written of late on the subject of church federation. And as we understand it at present, we mean by federation, co-operation with all Christian people in so far as conscience and opportunity will admit; uniting efforts, in civic work, thanksgiving services, observing the week of prayer and in evangelistic effort so far as we can conscientiously do so. No one to break down or leap over the bar of conscience in so doing. I have recently belonged to a ministerial association composed of Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians and Christians which met regularly semi-monthly on Monday mornings; reported work of the previous Sunday and had a subject before the association for discussion, each member participating.

We frequently exchanged pulpits, and enjoyed frequent union meetings, and in times of evangelistic services held by the various churches, the ministers attended and gave encouragement in song and prayer. We were never losers in so doing. I did not feel hampered in their pulpits. Not what you say, but how you say it, may win good people to you or drive them from you. Splendid fellowship and hours of pleasant association were the results of these meetings. First the spirit of union, then union. Take the citadel of the soul and you have the soul. We positively have nothing to lose in this kind of federation, but all to gain. There is no need to sacrifice a single principle, nor even advise a few scattered Disciples to enter other folds, neither need we ask permission when to hold evangelistic services or organize a church of Christ.

Our methods of operation need not materially be changed. The spirit of union must strongly predominate in those who advocate its principles and thereby be able to lead others into larger and better light. If I misunderstand the subject, the editor will please point out the errors.

The Chain Letter System.

DEAR EVANGELIST:—I think something should be done to stop this "chain letter method" of raising money. This week my wife and I have received two letters asking for 15 cents and also requesting us to write six letters to our friends. Now, the two letters and the six letters, stamped, would take 16 cents, besides time, paper and envelopes. The expense, or rather waste, is too much for the income. I cannot approve of the method. We have our church extension fund to help needy and worthy churches. Brother Muckley and his helpers know, or can know, the needy and worthy places, but I cannot know whether the appeals through the chain letter system are worthy or not. I cannot use the Lord's money in such haphazard way. Churches of Christ should be ashamed to resort to such "catch trap" methods.

May Blossoms.

By Grace Boteler Sanders.

"To-morrow is Decoration day," sighed Tilly Darrows, as she patted her little sister's hand.

"I wish we could go to the celebration and—wear white dresses and—carry bouquets like the other girls. Miss Elinor said we could go in the wagon with her, but we haven't anything to wear, and if we had there isn't a flower to be found on the place." And Tilly looked scornfully around her at the little brown house, with its bare yard in which not even a blade of grass dared to show itself. A bantam rooster was busily scratching in a round flower bed which, as yet, showed no signs of blossoms.

"Poor papa won't have any flowers—not even a speech over his grave. Oh, dear! Why can't we be like other folks?"

Mrs. Darrows, who sat at the open window sewing, had heard every word of the dismal dialogue, but she only paused long enough to wipe away some telltale tears, then took up her work again, pretending not to hear.

"Poor dears; it can't be helped. Tilly," she called, "it's time to go after the milk," hoping to make them forget, for the moment at least, their trouble. "Take the bucket to Mrs. Abram's and tell her to give you a quart. We'll have some nice bread and milk for our dinner. Won't that be fine?"

At the very thought of the unexpected treat both doleful faces brightened, and the little sisters soon trotted happily away, still plotting for to-morrow. They paused at the creek, standing with bare feet in the shallow water, and watched the frightened little fish as they scurried into the shadows. On a big rock in the middle of the stream the children sat down to rest.

"When papa was home we had such good times," said Tilly, thoughtfully. "Poor mamma works so hard, and with all her planning can scarcely keep a roof over our heads, she says. She sews and cries, and when anyone mentions Decoration day she turns white as paper."

"Why does she?" queried Milly.

"I'll tell you, dear," said Tilly, softly. "That place in the cemetery ain't where papa is buried at all. We used to live a long way from here in the loveliest place. One day a big ship was blown up—papa got so excited when he heard it. The men were drilling all over town. When they went to war papa left us at grandpa's and rode away. After while news came that he was killed in the Philippines. Grandpa died and then mamma sold everything; she thought she'd come here to live with Uncle Bob. And Milly," lowering her voice, "when we got here Uncle Bob was dead, too. Mamma's money was all gone, so she had to stay, and folks were kind, gave her plain sewing, 'cause 'twas all she could do."

"They never heard another word about papa, so she had the mound made in the cemetery. The minister made a speech; talked so solemn about the sea givin' up its dead—that's when you were just a baby, Milly—so that's how it all happened, and that grave is just 'In his memory' the monument says."

"What did papa look like, Tilly?"

"Oh, he was tall and straight and handsome. His hair was black and curly and his eyes—oh, they just shone! Mamma says she can't bear to even see the parade for it makes her think of how papa used to look when he rode at the head of the procession."

The voices ceased for a moment. "Tilly, let's ask God to help us," begged the little sister. So down on their knees the little sisters knelt. Above the soft ripple of the water, those childish voices rose.

"Dear Jesus," they said, "bring papa home again, and give us this day our daily bread."

"He'll do it, I know," lisped Milly, "seems as if I'm comforted a'ready."

"Just listen, sister. There's the twelve o'clock whistle. Mamma will think we are lost. Come on."

Picking up the bucket from the flat stone on which they had been sitting the little girls raced away, apparently forgetting their troubles in a game of tag.

Decoration day dawned beautifully clear. The children whispered to each other as they washed the dishes, but Hannah Darrows sat by the window stonily indifferent.

The children washed their faces, brushed the curly locks quickly, then stole away to a place where the parade in all its glory could be seen. The horses, the music, the flowers were so entrancing that these children forgot their faded dresses and bare feet; forgot all else but the fact that 'twas decoration day and that their papa was a soldier, too.

Down the graveled drives they followed the soldiers again and again. In an unfrequented part of the cemetery the company were met by two breathless little girls.

"A flower for papa, please!" they cried. "Our papa went to war and mamma cries and cries. Put a flower and flag for him. Then fire the soldiers' salute."

"Who was your papa, little one?" the leader gently asked. "Where is his grave?"

They lead him just a step out of the path. Wonderingly he reads the inscription:

"In memory of George Darrows,
He died for his country."

Every flower in his basket is heaped upon the little mound. The bugle sounds. After the firing of the salute he speaks again:

"I do honor to-day, men, to one of the bravest soldiers who ever wore the blue. He was my trusted friend, and when he was carried away by the enemy he was called by all a hero. He—"

"Papa, papa!" shrieked Tilly, suddenly. All eyes turned in that direction. A deep voice answered: "My own little girl!" And there stood George Darrows himself! Tall, but no longer handsome, limping, haggard—but returned to receive the praise and love of all.

Already, in 1904, we have demands for more than $50,000 increase over the appropriations of last year.

"I'll tell you how it happened," said Tilly to her sister next day.

"The savages—I call 'em—took papa miles away. They beat him, starved him and then they made him work in the mines for days and days. But, what do you think he found, Milly? Gold enough to make us rich forever! He sewed it up in his clothes and after while he was exchanged with some more prisoners and sent back to America. When he went to grandpa's everyone was gone and he has been hunting us for six months."

"Will we be rich always? Can we have white dresses and—"

"Yes, yes!" cried Tilly, hugging her little sister rapturously. "And papa says he'll never go away again."

"Do you know how it happened?"

"Oh, yes," murmured Milly, and the little sisters whispered softly together.

"Thanks, dear Lord, for answering our prayer."

The Green Witch.

CHAPTER XII.

His book slipped to the floor, but he did not heed it. How pathetic seemed her life! Now that he had entered the tent and viewed her surroundings, he better understood the meaning of her words, and her desire to escape the humiliation of her daily existence. But he remembered Spot's part in the romance. Did they not meet twice a week in the wood, five miles from home; did not the girl feel love for the youth whom blood and wealth and education had forever removed from her sphere? Was she not seeking through Spot to draw herself out of a life of poverty and squalor? George's heart grew hard against her as he thought how she must have taken advantage of the weakness and quick impulsiveness of the heedless son of his employer. And all the time her face and form haunted him, while the autumn leaves circled about her head and rustled at her feet.

Then there came a quick fear. If her father sent her from home, and if her relatives refused her shelter, she would come to Spot and demand the five hundred dollars he owed her! Her necessity would force her to apply to Mr. Stoner, and there was a reckless, defiant element in her nature which told George she would not hesitate when driven by necessity upon the world. If her father turned against her, surely she would turn against the world. Then Mr. Stoner would learn the truth, and disgrace would fall upon the house. What was the truth? George dared not imagine; but he had Spot's word that disgrace would ensue upon its revelation. He must see Marget and endeavor to persuade her to spare her lover. He felt that he had some influence over her, and, against his inclination, he must make use of it at the first opportunity.

The next day he perplexed himself with plans for seeing Marget. He would not go the tent, where they could not be alone, and a meeting upon the streets was not to be considered. He had no wish to be seen in her company. He decided to trust to a chance meeting at the waterfall when he went, next week, to enter Spot Stoner's name in the book at the cattle-shed. The week came to an end, and he wondered if she had been driven from home. A chance meeting with Bill Klupertack, late Saturday afternoon, reassured him on that point. Tuck had told her that she must leave or go to work, but he had given her a few days to make her decision.

That evening on returning home from the store, he went to his room as usual, changed from his work clothes, and seated himself for a long effort to reanimate the dead language. He was encouraged to find Caesar growing so easy that he often read a dozen lines, without a serious pause. To-night, however, he had scarcely brought the forces of "our men" into battle line, when there was a knock upon the door. George opened it and faced Mrs. Stoner. His first thought was that Marget had been there with her revelation, and he turned pale. When there is a guilty secret in the breast the hand of each incident of daily life seems to point toward it as toward its hour of striking. The guilt was not George's; he had paled for Spot's sake.

"George," said the lady, to whom long watching and anxiety had given the expression of a mother, "do you play on the piano?"

"By ear," said George.

"You play hymns? old fashioned hymns?"

"Some."

"Spot has been begging to hear some old hymns played, but he is asleep now. Go to the parlor, and when he wakes, I'll send word. He can hear very well from his room. Don't play too loud."

"I am glad to do this for him," said George, who in his great relief could have caught her hand and kissed it.

"I am grateful to you, George," said Mrs. Stoner, laying her hand upon his shoulder. "You are a good boy. I am afraid you have been pretty lonely here." She hurried back to the sick-room.

As usual the parlor was brilliantly lighted by electricity—its windows looked toward the main street. George paused involuntarily at the door. He had not been in the parlor since the night he was introduced to the mistress of the house. His long intimacy with his bare, meanly-furnished bedroom gave the scene of luxury a strangeness which, a few months before, he would not have felt. On a sofa opposite the piano sat Flora Stoner, with a heap of photographs in her lap. She looked up at George with the old sunny smile which had not been given him for many a day.

"Come in, George," she said kindly—just as if it were but yesterday that they had enjoyed their long, confidential talk—just as if she had not avoided him for weeks; "don't you like to look at pictures? Come and see what I have found."

She made a place for him by her side, and as he crossed the rich carpet he was struck more deeply than ever before by her beauty and refinement. He wondered if she had ever felt as a real child; certainly there looked from her sparkling blue eyes, and lurked about the little mouth, something akin to maturity—a gentleness allied to reserve, and a composure, a serenity—in a word, the face of the girl was that of a woman. The taste with which she was dressed, which made excuse for a dress too rich for one of her years, the dainty form, reminding him of a rare flower—all appealed to his love of culture and accomplishment. As he took his place beside the little maiden, her eyes looked questioningly into his. He did not understand, but he smiled.

"Linnie Greer told me you can play," said Flora, drooping her head over the photographs, but once in a while giving him a sidelong glance. "She says you can play anything by ear. Spot's asleep now, but when he wakes, you'll play some old hymns for him, won't you?"

"Of course I will," he answered heartily.

"Poor old Spotsy!" said Flora with a sigh. "Don't you think it's pretty serious—his wanting to hear hymns? I don't know a single one; all I can play are two-steps and waltzes, and I just couldn't find a hymnbook on the place. We must have left all of ours when we moved. I know we left a lot of old stuff. Linnie Greer is in a dangerous condition; but I suppose you know all about her?"

"No," said George; "but I'm sorry to hear it."

Flora gave him a quick look and said, "You are so different, George!" He did not understand, but he waited in silence, knowing she would go on. "You used to be cold and stiff when I was friendly with you, and I had to warm you up every time, before you would be sociable. I wonder if you know what I mean? Now, it has been weeks since you and I talked together, but you are just as nice as you can be!"

"So are you," said George, smiling.

"But why don't you have to be warmed up?" she asked, examining him with attention.

"I don't let myself get cold any more," said George, somewhat amused.

"But I have kept away from you all this time. And when we met, I'd just go on with a little bow, like this"—Flora jumped up and walked past the sofa, bestowing upon George a faint, nondescript obeisance. "And sometimes when others were with me," she continued, resuming her seat, "I have even looked another way!"

"You can't expect me to be surprised at all this," said George, "for it isn't exactly news, you know."

"Was it that talk with grandpa that did it?"

"Yes, that was the beginning. Well, Flora, I'll tell you; I made up my mind that my happiness should be built up by my own efforts, and rest upon my own little successes and accomplishments. I have determined that the pleasure I get out of life shall not depend upon other people. If my joy depends on friends and acquaintances, it'll be as uncertain as they are—people are about as uncertain as the weather, I find! Ever since I reached this conclusion it has been pretty clear sailing. Now that you are good to me I enjoy your friendliness. But to-morrow when you pass with a nod like this"—he arose and gave her a copy of her formal bow—"I'll just fall back on myself and say, 'Hello, George, old fellow! you're still here, at any rate!'"

Flora did not smile. "That sounds selfish, I think," she said. "I would like for your happiness to depend a little on me! I don't think you can care much for my friendliness if you can say, 'Hello, George,' when I have taken it away."

George laughed softly. "I do believe, Flora, you want me to be unhappy, after all your preaching about contentment."

"George," said Flora, earnestly, "please don't laugh. How can you? You know why I treat you as I do. I must act as the set acts, and mamma doesn't like for me to be friends with you because—you know why! But all the time, I like you more than ever. And, yes, I do want you to be a little unhappy on my account, because when I treat you that way I am unhappy for your sake."

She lifted her face and he was astonished to discover tears in her eyes. "Oh, Flora!" he exclaimed, in distress, not knowing what to say, or how to explain her mood, "why, of course I will be just as—as unhappy as you want me to be. Don't feel so bad about it."

He was struck by the ring of his own words; they sounded so ridiculous! Flora also detected the unconscious humor, and smiled. She turned away her face and rubbed a dainty lace handkerchief over her eyes. "I want you to look at this picture," she said, holding up a large photograph, which had been painted in natural tints, "and I don't want to talk about—that other." It was the picture of a little girl.

"Oh!" exclaimed George, holding it toward the light. "What a beautiful face! I wonder if she really looked like this?"

"Yes, just like that; I know her."

"How old is she—about three?"

"It was taken on her third birthday."

George looked long at the photograph. "I wish it belonged to me," he sighed. "It would do me good to take it out and look at it sometimes, when I am pegging away at my books and all of a sudden the room seems to stop its affairs to look at me—did you ever have that sort of lonesome feeling?"

"No, but I think I understand. You would really like to have the picture?"

"I never saw anything like it," he declared, gazing upon it longingly. "The face is so innocent and—oh, I don't know the words for it. What perfectly golden hair! It's like silk heads with the light running along, as if alive. The eyes are blue like yours—I mean the color is similar; yet they are so different!"

"Do you think them so very different?"

"Oh, yes!" cried George, decidedly. "Look how open and appealing they are! They cling to you; they want to talk—what about, I wonder? Heaven, I think."

"And my eyes?" asked Flora.

"Oh, your eyes talk, too," said George, "though sometimes they don't tell half, and often they are silent and refuse to speak a word."

"Perhaps when I was a child my eyes told all my thoughts, too," she suggested.

"I don't know," he answered, doubtfully.

"Do you like to make up little stories about photographs of strange people?" she said. "Let's make up a story of this baby. We'll say it is twelve years from now. By that time you ought to be started in life, oughtn't you? You have graduated, and are a physician. Now this baby is fifteen years old. She is very much interested in you, isn't she?"

"Of course she is," said George, "she has been my friend since I met her twelve years ago. We used to go walking and driving together, and we have such sweet, long talks! She knows everything about me, and I know everything about her, everything. In one way she has almost taken my mother's place with me."

"Did she know you when you went in blue overalls and drove a delivery-wagon?"

"Of course; she was my friend through everything."

"Then she didn't belong to the best set."

"She did; she was their leader."

"And yet was your friend before them?"

"It made no difference to her about my clothes," declared George. "Look at that face. Do you think that little mouth could ever grow proud and reserved? She stood by me through all my troubles; she helped me in my fight for success, because just knowing I could take all my disappointments to her made them light and only to be borne for a short time."

"Did nobody ever mistreat her because she took your part?"

"Well, if they did, we think more of each other on that account."

"How much do you think of her?" asked Flora, bending over the picture.

"So much that if I succeed as a physician—as I feel I shall—all that I make and all that I become will be hers."

"Then what will you have, George?"

George blushed and laughed. "How foolish we are! After all, she is only three years old."

"But what would you have?" she persisted.

"Why, I should have her. What more could I want?"

Flora did not reply. Mrs. Biniter appeared at the door and said, "Spot is awake and wants old hymns. Mrs. Stoner said to tell you, George, that he wants old hymns. Flora, if I were you I'd go to my room now."

"Can't you be Mrs. Biniter, and go?" asked Flora, irritably. George, wondering at her impolite manner, went to the piano and began to play. He had never heard Flora use that tone of voice before, and it jarred upon him. Mrs. Biniter sniffed and stalked away. The youth played "I Need Thee Every Hour." Unlike most of his age and sex he did not accompany the air with a heavy, mechanical succession of chords; nor did he render it as written in the hymnbook; but, having a sensitive ear for musical effects, he was enabled to fill in with little graces of runs and modulations which atoned, in some degree, for the absence of voices. He wondered as he played if the air awakened in Spot any remorse for his past conduct, and if it aroused in him a resolution to lead a different life. And he wondered why Flora was so silent, and what she was doing behind him. At last he heard her softly approach the stool, and though he could not see her, he felt her near presence. When he reached the end of the chorus he paused, considering what to play next.

"I like that very much," said Flora. "When you play hymns it doesn't sound as if they were cut out of paste-board."

George made no answer. His fingers wandered silently over the keys.

"What is the matter?" asked Flora, suddenly, laying her hand upon his arm.

"Flora," said George, "I am not the one to give you advice or to find fault with you; but the way you spoke to Mrs. Biniter—I didn't think you would. It seemed so unlike a—what I thought you—"

"She is so hateful," said Flora.

"But that has nothing to do with your behavior."

"Doesn't it excuse me a little?"

George made no answer. He began to play "Blest Be the Tie That Binds."

"Then I'll give you a reason," said Flora, gently. "I was about to cry, and that's what made me."

"About to cry?" repeated George, with a thrill. It seemed to him that Flora had narrowly escaped a real misfortune. For her to cry would be very pathetic—she who was naturally so bright and free from serious thought.

The sympathy in his voice touched her. "It was all about the picture and what you said," she continued, speaking softly as he played the hymn. "About my eyes, you know. And how sure you were that you would care so much for her when she is grown, but that I wasn't anything like her. And you didn't believe I had ever been the least bit like her. And her golden hair was like light running over silk, but nobody you know has her innocent face. And yet that picture is me! It was taken when I was three years old."

"It was your picture?" cried George, his hands halting in the midst of the melody.

"My very own baby picture," Flora declared, laughing a little. George turned and faced her. "I wish I had known it," he said, his face very red. "It wasn't fair for you not tell me. You didn't do right, Flora. For I wouldn't have said—those things."

"Oh," said Flora, "after all there are some of those things that I don't mind your saying. I don't care very much. I expect you had better go on playing, and not look at me so cross, if you please."

"Anyway," said George, turning from her, "what I said was just in the story we were making up."

"Yes," said Flora, walking away; "that when you are famous you will have me, and 'what more could you want,' you said."

"It wasn't you," George retorted, "it was the person we were making up from the picture."

"Yes," said Flora, "but I am the person from the picture—you know now—if you didn't know it then!"

George was inclined to be a little irritable over the turn affairs had taken, and he looked at Flora as she stood with her back to him, trying to think of something to say that would disturb her serenity. In that moment the light vanished from the room.

"Oh," said Flora, looking up at the bulb in which the wire still glowed faintly, "the fuse has burnt out."

At the first instant the room seemed to them very dark. But the arc light from the street corner made itself manifest at the parlor window at once, and George started up with a low cry. At the windowpane was a woman's face—or else the moving shadows from the trees formed themselves into a human likeness. The face was like his mother's. It watched him—nay, it vanished—the shadows from the naked branches crossed themselves upon the pane, where the street light showed unsteadily. His mother had been watching him from the yard. No, he had seen but the moving of the tree-tips.

"Flora!" he cried wildly. "Run to the window—look out—who is in the yard?" He fell back upon the stool, and as his hands caught blindly at the piano to prevent his fall, they struck

A Guarantee of Health.

Perfect digestion guarantees perfect health. Growing boys are vigorous because their food is perfectly digested, the food nutriment properly assimilated and the blood is pure and healthy. As a result you do not hear of them being affected with headache, backache, kidney trouble, liver trouble, constipation or any other of the common ills that always afflict those with bad stomachs.

the keys and produced a violent discord.

"Oh, George!" exclaimed Flora, running to him and grasping his arm, "What was it? I am afraid."

"Did you see her?" he asked, rapidly.

"See whom? What is the matter?" Flora was frightened, "How you tremble!" she exclaimed. "You are just like you were that night in the summer house."

"Then it was the perfume mother used," murmured George; "to-night it was her face!"

"But it is nothing but the shadows of the trees thrown by the arc light," said Flora, suddenly releasing his arm. "It was just the fuse burning out that scared you. See, now, the shadows do look queer; how they mix up! There is the outline of a dog."

"Yes, but the face is not there," shuddered the other. "Mother's face! I was not thinking of her, as you know. We were talking about the picture."

"Why didn't you run out into the yard and look?" she demanded.

"I couldn't move, or reason. It was terrible. I felt as if I were dying. Of course, now I know it must have been just the shadows—or if a woman was there, it couldn't—Flora, I used to think I had a little courage. I have never been afraid of the dark. What is the matter with me?"

She laid one hand upon his shoulder. "George," she said, with the tenderness of a sister, "you are studying too hard every night. You must give it up, for a while, at least. You wouldn't have these fearful thoughts of a spirit visiting you if your mind was not too much—I don't know how to tell it; but you mustn't study so hard!"

"It's not that," said George, rousing himself, "it is brooding over something else all the time. That's the trouble, I do believe."

"What are you brooding over?" demanded Flora. "You said you were not going to let other people give you trouble."

"This is somebody else's trouble," said George.

"Is it Spot's?" she asked, suddenly. "I know there has been something on poor Spotsy's mind a long time. But listen! Mamma is coming with a lamp."

"Don't tell about the face," said George, earnestly, as he rose to go to meet Mrs. Stoner. "I am ashamed of myself. And I am ashamed and grieved that thoughts of my dear mother can ever come to me in this way, bringing something like terror."

At the door he met Mrs. Stoner and took the lamp. "Spot enjoyed the music," said the lady, "and asks for more. Why, Flora! Are you in here?"

"Yes'm," said Flora.

"You will disturb George," said her mother, with an air of conviction. "Come upstairs, my child."

Business Notes.

For recitations of all kinds, in children's day exercises, there is nothing better than the Choral Festival, and we will send you one for 50 cents.

"Walks and Words" of Jesus, a simple story of the life of Christ in the exact wording of the gospel is very interesting, and in cloth, 50 cents.

We have some very pretty wall mottoes, which would be just the thing for decorating the church on children's day, selling at 25 cents each, 8 by 10.

"The Young People's Prayer-Meeting," by Cal Ogburn, is for a similar purpose among the young people who want to do, but do not know how. Good cloth, 75 cents.

The surprise is complete as our friends read over the present list of "Bargain" Books, for these are not "copyright expired," but books of which we have too many, hence the offer.

The calls are coming for the American Standard Bible, 45 cents and testament, 20 cents, prepaid, but we have more of the English American Revised at 7 cents, limp, 15 cents, cloth, and 35 cents, large primer, prepaid.

"Ways of Working," a clear, precise presentation of how some C. E. and other church workers can honor their Master. You will be pleased with it and we are going to help the cause by putting them out at ten cents each.

"Pedobaptism, is it from Heaven or of Men?" by J. M. Frost, Jr., is in good demand in many quarters, and as such, is worth first price, but you may have what few are left at 50 cents each; only, do not forget, first come, first served, as we have not more than twelve.

Let us have a clear understanding, as some of our friends did not on the last list; this offer is just for 30 days or until stock is exhausted. Unless the books are found in other lists that follow, the "bargain" price is off and the regular price restored. "Understand?" On with the sale!

Many are ordering the Half-Hour Studies at the Cross, 75 cents, and making just the use of it at the communion service that Brother Garrison desired. One in ordering says, "Wish I had had the assistance of this good book long ago." Every chapter meets just that want for those who "wait on the table."

But for C. E. wall mottoes, in the girls' rooms at home, and the boys' rooms, too, we can furnish an exceptionally pretty line; green, blue, pink and lilac, with various scripture quotations on the finest silk, banner and tassel form. These goods cannot be adequately described, but are very reasonable at 35 cents.

F. M. McHale, Herington, Kas., who seems to have a cinch on that character of business in his district, writes us that the Wedding Tokens and Wedding Blossoms are much nicer for "marriage certificates" than the old style. We keep all kinds, as the slower folks have not yet caught on to the booklet certificate idea, but they will. Booklets, 35 and 50 cents.

"Wisdom is justified of her children," and the wise ones coming to the World's Fair, and more so those who are likely to remain at home, who wish to be thoroughly in touch with the Fair, location of buildings, points and places of interest in the city, etc., are getting a new subscriber for the Young Folks at 75 cents and receiving a copy of that handsome souvenir, without which you are in much confusion, but it's your fault if you are.

So many are using the "Life of Raccoon John Smith," in mission work among their friends that we have decided to continue the sale of this $2.00 book at 50 cents for another 30 days. One brother ordered an even dozen to be so used, while another was so pleased with the good work of one that he ordered another for the same good purpose, and a third said, send one in a hurry, for I hope to do good with it this week during our meeting. Good!

"The future, after all, will not usher in so great a change as some imagine. This mortal must put on immortality, but we will hold to the types of character which we have formed here. It may be that we take up our future life very much at the place where we lay down the present." Dr. W. T. Moore's very suggestive treatment of this subject in "Man Preparing for Other Worlds" (500 pages, crown, 8vo, $2), is but a part of an exhaustive analysis of the spiritual man's career. It is the most original book written on this subject.

Current Events

It would be interesting to know how large a part the great newspapers of Journalism and War. the world play in bringing about the wars which they so eagerly chronicle. In a recent speech, Melville E. Stone, general manager of the Associated Press, lays upon the London newspapers the blame for precipitating the present war between Russia and Japan. They had for a long time pursued the policy of magnifying the issues between the two governments and inciting them to hostility. Then, when the crucial hour had been reached and a feather's weight might have turned the scale for or against war, a dispatch was published in which it was asserted—falsely, as it afterward appeared—that the Czar had put into the hands of Viceroy Alexieff the power to begin hostilities at his discretion, without further orders from St. Petersburg. As it was already known that the Viceroy's voice was for war, this meant that all hope of peace had been abandoned. It was simply a question of which should strike first, and the Japanese struck.

Mr. Stone believes that war might have been avoided if this false report had not been published on the authority of a reputable newspaper. Perhaps one in his position naturally attaches more importance to the utterances of the press than another would, but it is true, in many cases, that the "fourth estate," the press, has more to do with declaring war than king, nobles or commoners. And this comes about even more through seeking out and publishing, in a sensational way, facts which might better have remained unknown, than by giving publicity to erroneous reports. The same principle holds good when a war is in progress. The news service frequently adds to the difficulties, and it is the vigilance and effectiveness of the press that makes the trouble. The best strategy is often nullified by premature publicity. The Japanese are having extraordinary success in preventing those embarrassments which come from too much publication of the plans of campaign. The newspaper correspondents in Tokio are in despair; but after all, difficult as it may be for them to realize the fact, wars are not fought solely to make news for the papers.

Statistics have been lately issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor accounting for the course of whole-sale prices between 1890 and 1903, and comparing the prices of 1903 with those of the thirteen preceding years. The average relative prices of all commodities in 1903 were higher than at any time since and including 1890. Farming products were lowest in 1896 and highest in 1902. Cloth and clothing were lowest in 1897 and highest in 1890. Fuel and lighting were lowest in 1894 and highest in 1903. Lumber and building materials lowest in 1897 and highest in 1903. Metals and implements lowest in 1898 and highest in 1900. In January and February of 1903 the price of raw products, all farm products included, was 33 per cent above the average for the preceding ten years, while the average price for the year was 22.7 per cent above that of the same period. Manufacturing products in 1903 were about one per cent higher than in 1892, 21.5 per cent higher than in 1897 and 11 per cent higher than in 1899. After 1902 beef prices fell off, but the relative prices compared to the period since 1890 show an increase in cattle of 4.7 per cent. Wheat increased 5.1 per cent. In 35 of 53 articles of food there has been an increase ranging from five per cent on bread to 72 per cent on Singapore pepper. The prices fell of coffee, sugar, soda crackers, flour, vinegar and evaporated fruits. Sugar, trust made, was eight to ten per cent lower in 1903 than during the preceding thirteen years and coffee was 57.4 per cent cheaper. Anthracite coal was 26.2 and anthracite egg 34.3 per cent higher. Matches fell off 14.4 per cent. Kerosene, trust made, was, in March, 1893, 7.8 cents a gallon. Having risen in November and December of 1903 to 15 cents, the cost of oil illumination increased in ten years 100 per cent. Between October, 1892, and December, 1903, crude petroleum, the mother oil of kerosene, increased from 51 3-8 cents to $1.88 3-8 a barrel. The increase in prices of fifty-six of seventy articles of clothing ranged from three per cent for gingham to 20.8 per cent for sheetings.

The National Municipal League was recently in session in Chicago. The value of such a meeting is very great, especially when its proceedings are extensively reported. The secretary of the League, Clinton Roger Woodruff, accounted for the prominent acts of municipal progress during the past year. Those who have read Mr. Steffens's contributions to the enlightenment of public opinion on the subject of municipal righteousness will be interested in the following remarks of Mr. Woodruff dealing with the process of municipal purification: "Investigations, indictments, trials and convictions for municipal shortcomings and dishonesty have been the order of the day throughout the whole country during the last year to an unprecedented, and, from one point of view, an appalling extent. It is doubtful whether there has been a time in the history of the country when the people were so aggressive and determined to introduce strict business methods into public service. It is better to unearth scandals and punish these than to allow them to pursue their work unmolested in the dark, while the people hug the delusion that they have honest public servants." The question of a pure municipality now largely rests with the people themselves. Men have had their minds directed to the ease with which corruption can fasten upon city officials, and if they are neglectful to see that the best men are appointed to represent them, and not merely men who are playing the game to aggrandize themselves, citizens may blame themselves if things are not as they ought to be. The situation can be controlled by the citizens. The question is: Will the almighty dollar still have greater influence over the individual than the municipal welfare of himself, his children and his neighbors?

Senator Matthew S. Quay, of Pennsylvania, died on May 28, at Beaver, Pa., at the age of seventy years. Probably there has never been a man in American politics who possessed more natural and acquired skill in political maneuvering, or more signal ability in the construction and use of a machine. He entered politics early and stayed in until the end. About twenty years ago his power reached its zenith. During the decade from 1885 to 1895 he was Czar of Pennsylvania and suzerain of a still larger territory. After that his supremacy was disputed, charges of official misconduct, of bribery, conspiracy and embezzlement multiplied upon him. In every investigation or trial, however, he was vindicated. The man developed a perfect genius for hair-breadth vindication. In 1899, after serving for twelve years in the senate, he was defeated for re-election and a deadlock in the legislature ensued. When the legislature adjourned, the governor had the effrontery to appoint him to fill the place to which the legislature had refused to elect him, but the senate refused to recognize the election and Mr. Quay was left on the door-step for two years, when the new legislature sent him back to the senate. To a preternatural skill in handling men, and an organizing power which would have won eminent recognition in any great enterprise, he added a thorough acceptance of the theory that politics is a game in which the winner is entitled to the stakes, that public office is a private snap, that all office-holders in the state should owe their first allegiance to the machine which gave them their appointment, and that the author, owner, manager and chief beneficiary of the machine should be M. S. Quay. His fighting qualities were superb. He was the gladiator in politics, fighting with magnificent courage, with surpassing adroitness, on the wrong side of nearly every moral issue which confronted him.

We talk much about political machines, but what is a political machine?

What is a Machine? Senator Quay's death recalls the somewhat famous catalogue which Mr. Wanamaker gave in 1898 of the twenty elements of the Quay machine. The list shows the possibilities of machine politics in any state of considerable size. It is as follows:

Part A—A Republican state committee which in every part is subjugated to serve the personal interests of Senator Quay first and the party next, without respect to the will of the people.

Part B—Great prestige and patronage, controlled by Quay as a United States senator, with two votes, his own and the other.

Part C—Thirty congressmen, with their secretaries, sixty persons, whose salaries aggregate $180,000 annually, and who are responsible to the machine for their respective districts.

Part D—The 419 officers and employees of the state government, who receive in salaries $1,034,500 annually, and who are selected only because they are supposed to be able to deliver the votes of their districts to anyone the Quay machine dictates. These men are all assessed by the bosses, and some of the documents in our possession will be curious reading some time.

Part E—The state senate, with every officer, from president pro tem. down to page boys, selected to do the machine's bidding. The expenses of the senate last year were $169,604.

Part F—The state house of representatives, with members, officers and employees, 257 in number, who drew $463,302 last year. All committees are selected by the machine, and are chaired by men who know no will but that of Senator Quay. Thus his machine absolutely controls all revenues and tax legislation.

Part G—8,122 post offices, with salaries amounting to $3,705,446. Most postmasters are made the personal agents of the machine in their respective towns.

Part H—4,149 officers, a majority of whom are controlled by Senator Quay's machine, whose salaries amount to $5,000,000.

Part I—The Philadelphia mint, with 438 employees, who receive in yearly salary, $326,565.

Part J—The offices of collector of port, with 400 employees, who receive in salaries $545,000.

Part K—The internal revenue officers, with 281 employees, who receive in salaries $355,400.

Part L—The United States circuit and district courts, with 41 employees, who receive in salaries $95,000.

Part M—League Island navy yard and state arsenals, with 585 employees, who receive in salaries $725,000, making a total of 14,705 officers and employees who receive from the state and national governments $7,608,911 annually.

Part N—The thousands of trustees, other officials and employees of hospitals, state and private; state prisons, reformatories, state asylums, charitable homes, state colleges, normal schools, soldiers' orphan schools, scientific institutes and museums, who are expected to support the machine or the appropriations of their institutions will be endangered.

Part O—The combined capital of the brewers of the state, their thousands of employees and dependent patrons whom they control.

Part P—The appropriation committees, who are of Quay's personal selection, disburse $10,000,000 annually to schools, hospitals, penal institutions, etc. The bold manipulation of these funds for the benefit of the machine has educated people to regard moneys received for these purposes as personal contributions from Senator Quay, in return for which they must render help to his machine.

Part Q—The state liquor league, whose members are in every city, town, hamlet and crossroads throughout the state, is always for Quay's machine.

Part R—A large number of the common pleas judges throughout the state, who use their license-granting power for the benefit of the machine, by rewarding those faithful to the cause of Quay and punishing those opposed to the machine.

Part S—The millions of withheld school and personal tax moneys that are used to further the interests of the machine. At 3 per cent interest the machine has taken $2,500,000 of your money since Senator Quay began his reign.

Part T—The hundreds of subservient newspapers who are recipients of machine favors, with their army of newsgatherers and correspondents, who are forced to chloroform public sentiment and hide the iniquities of the machine.

The principal allies and partners of the machine are the corporations. The 15,000 national and state office holders and the thousands of other officials connected with state institutions form a small part of the whole number of obedient machine men who are constantly at the command of Senator Quay, the admitted boss of the machine.

Whether or not corporations in general are soulless, may be a debatable question, but one of them at least has experienced a sudden conversion. A few weeks ago the fact came to light that the Western Union Telegraph Company was furnishing private wires and operators to pool-rooms, which were operating secretly and illegally. The president of the company at first tried to defend its course by saying that it was bound to carry any decent message given to it for transmission. This, however, was far from convincing. The highly respectable and eminent gentlemen who are prominent in the management of the company found themselves the center of a storm of adverse public sentiment. That any set of honorable men, acting in a corporate capacity, should be making large profits ($45 a day for a private wire in a pool-room) by secretly selling to law-breaking gamblers the information by which they were enabled to carry on their illicit and nefarious operations, was a condition wholly repugnant to the moral sense of a community even moderately sensitive to the decencies of life. The sophistry was too transparent to deceive anyone. Moved by the exhortation of a practically unanimous public sentiment, the company has decided to discontinue the race-track department of its work, which consisted in collecting the news of the races and selling it to the pool-rooms. This will not put an end to gambling on horse races, but it will seriously cripple those most despicable and demoralizing institutions, the pool-rooms, and it furnishes a cheering illustration of the power of public opinion to produce immediate results in the realm of public morals.

"The tidal wave of impurity sweeping over our fair land is to make St.

Vice and St. Louis.

Louis a whirlpool of death." This is the beginning of an article clipped from some paper which a friend sends to us. We had already issued warnings that people may not expect to find in the World's Fair city a heavenly city. Like all large cities St. Louis has its evil side, but we doubt whether it is as bad as many of these. But friends must not suppose that no effort is being made to cope with the evil. The pastors and social workers of the city are awake and everything possible will be done to keep rottenness and corruption down.

Reasons for a Great Convention in St. Louis.

We do not know that it is desirable, and certainly it is not practicable, to have every year a great mass convention of the brotherhood numbering many thousands. It is often advisable to hold our conventions in cities more remote from the center, where this would not be practicable. And, ordinarily, it is not necessary for the transaction of the business of the convention. But there are cogent reasons why our convention, next October, in the city of St. Louis, should be a great convention in numbers and in every other respect. We mention a few of these reasons:

1. We are meeting this year at the World's Fair city, and in connection with the greatest Universal Exposition in the history of the world. Everything is on a large scale. It will take a convention of large dimensions to make an impression upon the public at such a time and under such circumstances. A convention of twenty-five thousand people would attract the attention of the whole country, and, to the extent that all nations are represented here, it would challenge the attention of the whole world. Great aggregations of people pursuing with enthusiasm a great purpose, always and everywhere excites attention, interest and inquiry. Thousands of people will receive their first impression of our religious movement from the character of the convention to be held in St. Louis in the autumn. The brethren throughout the country, therefore, should come to the convention in large numbers for the influence it will have upon the outside world.

2. But who can estimate the value to the Disciples themselves from sharing in the fellowship, enthusiasm and instruction of such a convention? It will be the opportunity of a lifetime to witness the scenes that will occur in such a convention, to listen to the great addresses which will be made, and to be lifted to the sublime heights of Christian enthusiasm by the thousand-voiced chorus choir, which will sing to us the inspiring songs of redeeming love. To witness the great, impressive communion service in the Coliseum where no less than ten thousand hearts beating in unison will join in remembering our Lord's death, will be a memory and an inspiration of one's whole future life. It will constitute a picture that will reproduce itself on memory's walls in future years, to stimulate us in moments of discouragement and to create within our hearts a hunger for that larger fellowship which shall be ours in the life beyond. It will be something that parents will tell to their children—the scenes, the experiences, the high enthusiasms of that great convocation.

3. The attractions and educational opportunities offered by the World's Fair are such as should not be neglected by those who are able to avail themselves of its advantages. The practicability of uniting the convention and the World's Fair as two masterful motives for visiting St. Louis is a most cogent reason why this coming international convention should be the largest by far in our history. No one has overstated or can easily overstate the wonders of that marvelous exhibition of the world's achievements in every department of human effort. To walk amid those ivory palaces, to pass through and examine their treasures of art, science, invention and manufacture, in the thousand departments of human handicraft, is to enlarge one's conceptions of the world, to kindle the imagination, to enrich the understanding, and to give one a higher value of man who is the producer, under God, of all that is here exhibited, and therefore, of the value of his redemption. Nowhere does one feel more impressed with the dignity of man and of his lordship over the earth, than when standing amid these wonderful achievements which his hand and brain have wrought.

4. The very fact that these two motives exist, and that together they have secured the lowest rates of travel, opens up the possibility for the largest convention in our history. And when possibility and desirability unite in any great enterprise, they constitute a duty. We believe there is an unparalleled opportunity for service to the cause we love by bringing together here in St. Louis next October such a convention as will make a lasting impression for good upon ourselves and others, and it would be unfaithfulness on our part, therefore, not to avail ourselves of such an opportunity. It is an occasion where duty and inclination should walk hand in hand, for surely one can but anticipate the attractions offered by the World's Fair and by our national convention with the keenest joy and eagerness. The point is, that since it would be easier the present year than it probably ever will be again, for a generation at least, to hold a convention of international and world-wide representation, which will mark an epoch in our history, it is our duty to seize the opportunity, both for our own sake and for the sake of the cause we cherish as sacred.

These reasons we trust will be sufficient in themselves to interest the brotherhood at large and to cause them thus early to plan their visit to St. Louis so as to take in our great convention and the World's Fair during the same visit. We are glad to say that word comes to us from many sections of the country that our members are planning to make their pilgrimage to St. Louis and to the World's Fair at the time of our convention that they may also enjoy its benefits and blessings. The statements elsewhere from secretaries and others will show something of the outlines of the coming convention, and that of the chairman of our local committee will indicate what is being done in St. Louis to provide for it.

The Irrepressible Conflict.

The picture on our first page this week, entitled "Sioux Chief Defying the Advance of Civilization," is that of a striking piece of sculpture out at the World's Fair. The grim warrior seems to be conscious of the approach of a force that is antagonistic to the state of savagery and barbarism which he represents, and has put himself in an attitude of defiance towards its further advance. Let the figure stand as the symbol for all the forces that hinder the advance of Christian civilization, and every muscle and feature becomes expressive of the attitude of those evil influences which hinder the progress of mankind.

Let us, then, analyze this symbolic figure and see what it stands for. Included within this list of evil forces we must reckon the liquor-traffic with its attendant train of evils; the social evil, whose ways lead down to sheol; the spirit of gambling; avarice and greed, whether individual or national; materialism, which sees only the earthly and the tangible; the lust for power; public and private corruption; lawlessness; war, or the disposition that leads to war; and that practical atheism which ignores God in all the affairs of life. These are some of the powerful antagonists, symbolized by the savage, which are defying the advance of Christian civilization.

Arrayed against these and led on by the unseen, but ever-present Leader, the Captain of our salvation, are the hosts of righteousness, with all the factors and agencies He can command, working together for the world's redemption. Chief among these organized agencies for overcoming the evil forces above mentioned is the Church of the living God, and along with it the home and civil government in so far as they are under the influence of Christ's spirit and teaching. There are innumerable agencies working directly and indirectly either to prevent or ameliorate the awful consequences of these gigantic enemies of our civilization.

This is the irrepressible conflict. It was inaugurated with the introduction of sin into the world, and will continue until evil is utterly overthrown, and the good shall prevail throughout the universe of God. The church, as the leader in this spiritual conflict, should unite its scattered forces, put away its own sins and follies, and utilize the manifold agencies that are at work in the world for the promotion of the kingdom of God on earth.

That stalwart Sioux chief defying the advance of civilization reminds us of the threat and boast of an infidel said to have been made in a saloon in the straggling village of St. Louis in its early history, that "Jesus Christ should never cross the Mississippi river." But alas, how impotent is the arm of man to stay the progress of Christ and Christianity! This great empire west of the Mississippi, according to this reveling atheist, was to be given up to the saloon, the brothel and the gambling hell, and to all manner of bestial indulgencies, undisturbed by the church and the followers of the Nazarene. But God willed and planned otherwise, and nowhere is the Prophet of Galilee gaining greater conquests than in the vast domain stretching from the Mississippi to the shores of the Pacific.

This great universal exposition now in progress in St. Louis—shall it be utilized to overthrow the barbarism and savagery that yet lingers in our modern civilization, or will we permit it to be dominated by the spirit of materialism that will rob it of all power to promote the higher life of mankind? This is a question which the thoughtful man can but ask himself as he looks over this vast and marvelous exhibit of human achievements. These things are not evil in themselves, but may be mighty agencies for good if they are dominated and controlled by Christian motives and for Christian ends. As Christianity has made possible all these achievements, so it should lay them all under contribution for the overthrow of evil and for the advancement on earth of the kingdom of heaven.

It is from this point of view that it seems altogether wise and proper that we should assemble here this autumn one of the greatest religious conventions in history, beside this wonderful exhibit of the world's material progress—"lest we forget." If God be taken out of these splendid palaces and their treasured contents, they are as valueless and ephemeral as the staff of which these imposing structures are built. Let the church, by its great conventions here gathered, by its earnest proclamation of the gospel, by its increased spiritual activities, say to the world that the kingdom of God and its righteousness are the chief concerns of men, and that all these other things are valuable only as they serve these higher purposes.

The conflict may be long and arduous, but the end is not uncertain. It can have but one issue, and that is the triumph of God and good over the devil and evil. Let us see to it that we are not idle lookers-on in the conflict which involves the destiny of the race. Let us take our places under the banner of the cross and quit ourselves like men.

President E. Y. Mullins in an address at Nashville pointed out three fields in which a preacher must make definite and certain conquests. First of all he must conquer himself, then conquer thought and finally conquer his environment. Everyone will agree that the President has adopted the right order. When a man can conquer himself he will not have so much difficulty in conquering either his surroundings or the great field where the intellect reigns. The preacher who does not discipline himself will not have an easy time to get others to walk in the path they ought to go.

Children's Day.

In many a country to-day where Christ is not regnant, boyhood functions serviceably only in its ability to shout, "Good donkey, good Melican donkey, bakhsheesh, bakhsheesh," while in nearly every heathen country girls are not counted other than beasts of burden or ministering slaves to men's passions. The lot of the child without Christ has been for the most part a very sad one. And while woman's debt to Christ has been much discussed in church conventions and women's federation meetings, not so much has been heard of childhood's debt to the Galilean. He who bade us become as little children if we would enter the kingdom of heaven has by his gospel given a new idea, that there is no fear upon the bare mountain or in the ghostly glen to the pure in heart, for they shall see God and are to be happy.

Christianity has introduced the song into the child heart. Dr. Wm. C. Prime, some fifty years ago, after a trip around the world, made the remark that he had never heard the voice of a child in song outside of a Christian land. He had heard mothers croon over their children, but never heard a child in a non-Christian land sing as if in enjoyment or in praise. Rarely did he find children giving signs of enjoyment. But later in life Dr. Prime again visited these countries and found a delightful change. Christian missionaries had been at work and the singing of Sunday-school hymns had made glad the hearts of the children.

Christianity having put a new song into the heart of the young it has recently directed youth to another wholesome channel as an outlet for its superabundant vitality. A Chicago and a Denver judge have lately testified that nine-tenths of the boy criminals of the country are American, not foreign-born, as many suppose. And for the most part these young criminals are such because they have not been trained in useful channels. At last society and the church are discovering this fact and utilizing the activities of children. While Children's Day is not the direct outcome of a social movement for the benefit of children, it will have a strong reflex action for good upon the children themselves. For it stands for consecration and service of a noble kind. In their efforts to raise money for missions our children are sowing for themselves as well as for the heathen. And we choose the harvest when we choose the seed.

Editor's Easy Chair.

And now here are these rare days of June of which the poets sing. And it does seem that if ever heaven kisses the earth it is in this month of blossom and bloom and beauty. At no other period of the year does the sky seem bluer, the grass and the leaves look greener, nor roses bloom in greater profusion and fragrance than in the month of June. It is a month, too, that quickens the memory and brings back again the scenes and events of the long ago. It recalls many a stroll through the woodlands in search of the fresh, ripe strawberries. We live over again our college days, and especially do we associate June with commencement occasions. Can we ever forget that particular commencement in which we received our parchment? Does not there come before us a vision of bouquets of roses, tied with pink ribbons, of pretty girls in white dresses, of dainty essays and vociferous speeches, of crowds of people, of youthful excitement and—of profuse perspiration? Such was the old-time commencement. Said a veteran preacher, a few days ago, as he looked upon a circle of beautiful girls just graduating from one of our schools, "How inexhaustible are the resources of nature, for the girls who are graduating to-day are just as beautiful as those were who graduated here fifty years ago!" And no doubt if we could analyze their emotions, hopes and aspirations, we would find that they are much the same as those experienced by the girls of a half century ago. And so the stream of human life flows unceasingly on, renewing itself continually from the fountain of all life.

Speaking of June and college commencements, we are accustomed, each year, to send our congratulations and best wishes to the young men and women who, having equipped themselves for their life-work in their college courses, are passing from college halls and teachers out upon the broader stage of human life. They cannot know now how deeply we feel interested in their future. Will they be true to the lessons they have learned? Will they use wisely the opportunities that are before them? Will they continue their studious habits, and keep their minds open for all truth, and seek to transmute knowledge into life and character? Will they reflect honor on their alma maters by standing for the highest ideals in church and state, in the home and in society, wherever they may be? Will they be enslaved by the world, or, putting it beneath their feet, use it only to serve higher and worthier ends? How much of the future of our country and of the world is bound up with these questions? If our educated young men and women are not to lead the world onward to a purer and better civilization, no one else is likely to do it. Heaven bless our college graduates who are now entering upon their real life-work! May they see visions, yea heavenly visions, and may they have the courage to be obedient to them, at whatever price it may cost! So shall our colleges and other institutions of learning vindicate their value to the world, and civilization will go forward to future millenniums of righteousness and peace.

✠

Coming events, it is said, cast their shadows before. The greater the event the greater the shadow it is likely to cast. For several years the World's Fair of St. Louis has been casting its shadow across the world, and now we are face to face with the stupendous reality. It is too great for its real significance and true greatness to be appreciated as yet. It will take a generation to measure its magnitude and far-reaching results. There are those who speak of it as a manifestation of our "materialism," but nothing so impresses us, as we walk amid its architectural triumphs, and look upon the grace and beauty everywhere displayed, as its splendid idealism. What controlling spirit gathered here from all the world the masterpieces of painting and sculpture? Not materialism, but the love of art and the desire of artists to give the world the benefit of their best work. Why that wonderful display to be witnessed in the educational building, of all the latest and most approved methods and means of training the young? Is anybody to make money out of that? It seems to us the controlling motive behind it is that the world may be helped onward to better educational methods and facilities. No doubt the spirit of materialism plays its part in this, as in all great enterprises, but the whole conception of this stupendous enterprise and its execution are due to something higher and worthier. As money-making institutions, world's fairs are failures. As both marking and helping to make new epochs of progress, they have demonstrated their usefulness.

And now there arises on the horizon the shadow of another coming event. By its form, its dimensions, and general characteristics, we know it to be a great religious convention that is foreshadowed—a convention taking on the proportions and features of a world-wide assembly. The shadow of that coming event projects itself across the pages of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in this issue. Shadows are not unwelcome in summer weather. What you see and read in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, this week, are but the premonitory symptoms of what is to be. They are prophetic notes whose prophecy is to be fulfilled before the autumn elections. They deserve the careful consideration of our readers on that account. They challenge attention, too, on the ground that they foretell and are seeking to prepare the people for, an event that has for its sole purpose the extension of the reign of Christ over the earth. Whatever enterprise or movement has this sublime purpose for its animating motive deserves the favor and support of all good people everywhere. This great international convention of the greatest Christian union movement in history, to be held in connection with the greatest exposition of all time, is a thing to be anticipated with joy, to be participated in with profit when it comes, and to be lived over again in memory long after it has transpired. May all our readers be permitted to see, hear and enjoy it!

Notes and Comments.

The Northern Presbyterians have voted for union with the Cumberlands, and the Cumberlands have voted for union with the Northern Presbyterians. The Protestant Methodists and United Brethren have voted for union with the Congregationalists, and the Congregationalists endorse the basis of union with the Protestant Methodists, and United Brethren. Who will say that Christian union is not in the air? Let no one undervalue these union movements because they do not fully reach the New Testament ideal. One step at a time is all that any of us can take.

✠

Isn't it about time that some of the divisions in the great family of immersionists were getting together? We do not remember how many branches there are of the Baptist family, but there are several, to say nothing of the Disciples, who, if they do carry a sword in one hand, always have an olive branch in the other. One thing we are sure of—leading Baptists and leading Disciples of Christ are much closer to each other than they are to their own lagging brethren who multiply causes of division by magnifying little differences about opinions and methods into tests of fellowship. The time has arrived when the centripetal force of love for a common Master should overcome the centrifugal force of opinionism.

The success of the union of the Presbyterian church (northern), the Cumberland Presbyterian church, and others, seems to indicate that there will soon be a strong move to unite the twelve different Presbyterian bodies in this country. These bodies now have a membership of 1,661,000. The members of the three Reformed churches, the Reformed church of America, Reformed church of the United States and the Christian Reformed church, are sometimes associated with these Presbyterian churches. While these latter churches are of Dutch origin, their teaching differs but little from the Presbyterian churches. They have a membership now of 390,000. Adding these to the former, there are 2,051,000 members in fifteen different religious bodies who hold to practically the same doctrines. If these are not prepared to accept the simple and yet sublime creed of the word of God and thus become one body in Christ, they might unite and become one denomination.

✠

The reports of the Methodist Episcopal conference just closed at Los Angeles, indicate that there are now 2,832,278 members in this religious body in the United States. In 1890 its membership was 2,240,354, and in 1900 it had reached 2,729,776. This shows an average gain per annum from 1890 to 1900 of a little over two per cent, but less than one per cent gain per annum since 1900. The gain registered for the last four years is only 102,502, while the gain for the previous ten years is 489,422. In other words the larger body now is gaining only 25,625 per annum, while the smaller body for the decade closing with 1900, gained 48,942. Two per cent is equal to the gain in population, while the denomination's one per cent gain is only one-half as rapid. The statistician, Dr. H. K. Carroll, attributes this decrease in growth to a lack of conversions. This is undoubtedly true, as the Methodist Episcopal church does not seem to be manifesting its former vigor in this direction.

✠

There is a new Bible league. We are always just a little bit suspicious of new leagues and organizations, and want to know what is their purpose and what are their plans. Its recent convention in New York, according to the organ of this new society, was held for the purpose of impressing upon Christian people "a clear idea of the present situation as involving a question of Bible or no Bible." This does not impress us as a very good reason for the existence of the new Bible league. Such talk is alarmist in the extreme. We recall that a league of this kind was established in England some years ago by a few self-appointed defenders of the faith, men who were for the most part entirely ignorant of the views they were combating. The period of criticism through which the Bible has been going is almost ended, and the new league has come into existence at a rather late date. We really do not see any need for it, and we are the more suspicious when we find it starting up a publishing house and a literary propaganda. There have been many cries of heresy in the past few years that seemed to have for their basis little more than the pushing of certain "anti-heresy" publications. There is just now some recurrence in England and Germany of a tendency to doubt the possibility of miracles, but this tendency is affecting the evangelical churches of America in a very slight degree. After all it is nothing more serious than the Christians of the time of Hume and John Stuart Mill had to meet and overcome.

As Seen from the Dome

By F. D. Power

Ascension Day, May 12, was observed in the P. E. diocese of Washington as "Cathedral Day," and the new Jordan Font of the National Cathedral was dedicated. The cathedral is to be an educational and religious plant of great interest and importance to our brethren of the Episcopal Church. It has already beautiful grounds, a large school for young women, notable memorials, and now has its Jordan Font and Baptistry. The Jordan Font was given mainly through the offerings of children whom the bishop has confirmed during his ministry. It is a fine work of art, chaste in design and religious in symbol, costing $20,000, and becomes a significant addition to the collection which is accumulating in the Cathedral Close. The font is of white Carrara marble, octagon in shape, fifteen feet in diameter, and reached by three stone steps. Inside are other steps, leading down to the waters, so that immersion may be administered. There is a central figure, life size, of the risen Christ as he is giving the great missionary command. The right arm is raised in blessing, the left holds a little child. In his side and hands appear the wounds received on the cross. The figure stands on a rock, out of which the baptismal waters flow. The mosaic of stones lining the interior is made of stones from the Jordan river, the gift of an eastern sheik. On the external panels of the font in sculpture are the principal events in our Lord's life. Grouped about the octagon are figures of apostles and Joseph of Arimathea. The font is enclosed in a temporary baptistry or building until the Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul shall be erected.

Fonts large enough to permit of immersion are exceedingly rare in the history of Christian art, and this is unique in this respect, for immersion is little practiced in the Anglican church. It is, perhaps, the only baptistry in an Episcopal church in America. Hundreds of our most fashionable people assembled to witness its dedication, and Arthur B. Smith, a young man seventeen years of age, was immersed, the first person, doubtless, to be immersed in an Episcopal church in the United States. Surely this must prove an object lesson that will not be forgotten, and "Jordan font" stands at the nation's capital to bear its testimony not only to the great Episcopal cathedral, but to all who in time to come shall be led to visit their great cathedral. To the man on the Dome it has a far reaching significance. It brings once more before us in its very title—"Jordan Font"—the eiston Jordanan and polla hudata which of necessity are suggested and recalls the administration of God's holy ordinance in the times of John the Immerser of Jesus, and of Paul.

This is simply the revival of a very ancient custom. In early times the font was placed in the baptistry, a structure often entirely separate from the body of the church, as in the celebrated baptistry in Florence. In these the well or tank for the water was usually reached by descending steps. The baptistries were round, square, octagonal or crosslike in form and richly ornamented with scripture and other decorations, bas-relief, columns and arches. Down to the time of the reformation fonts were made large enough to admit of the total immersion of the child, and we know this was the practice of the church of England, which was one of the last of the pedobaptist churches to admit sprinkling, as England was one of the last countries to accept it. Dr. Schaff tells us: "King Edward VI and Queen Elizabeth were immersed. The first prayer book of Edward VI, 1549, directs the priest to dip the child in water thrice. In the second prayer book, 1552, the priest is simply directed to dip the child discreetly or warily, and permission is given for the first time in Great Britain to substitute pouring, if the godfathers and godmothers certify that the child is weak."

Here at the capital we have a step higher in the line of succession to the apostles. Provision is made for adult immersion, and the rite is actually performed in the case of an adult. This is in entire harmony with the teaching of Episcopal scholars. Dean Stanley declares: "For the first thirteen centuries the almost universal practice of baptism was that of which we read in the New Testament, and which is the very meaning of the word baptizo, that those who were baptized were plunged, submerged, immersed into the water. Immersion had no doubt the sanction of the apostles and their Master, of the venerable churches of the early ages and sacred courts of the east. Baptism by sprinkling was rejected by the whole ancient church as no baptism at all. The change from immersion to sprinkling has set aside a larger part of apostolic language as regards baptism, and has altered the very meaning of the word." Dr. Wall, Dr. Geikie, Dean Alford, Edersheim bear similar testimony. And not only so, but many eminent men among them would restore the primitive immersion.

Bishop Smith, of Kentucky, defended the practice. "Immersion," he said, "was not only universal six or eight hundred years ago, but it was primitive and apostolic, no case of baptism standing upon record by any other mode for the first three hundred years, except the few cases of those baptized clinically, lying in bed. If any one practice of the early church is clearly established it is immersion." Bishop Smith accordingly immersed his own child and advised the sending of some Episcopalians to Greece that they might obtain immersion from those who had practiced it in regular succession from the apostles, and on their return restore the practice quietly throughout his communion.

This eminent Episcopalian is but one of many in that religious body who believe in the restoration of the primitive practice in the administration of this ordinance of the gospel. Bishop A. Cleveland Coxe, of New York, was my personal friend. He stood by me when, in the Hartford meeting of the American congress of churches, I emphasized the one baptism as an integral part of the basis of union. The Rev. Dr. Peck assailed my position vigorously and under the rules I could not reply. Bishop Coxe came to the rescue, rebuked the brother for glorying in his denomination, announced himself as one of those "called Christians first at Antioch," and so took up the cudgels for me that the assembly of six or eight hundred ministers cheered him to the echo and a Congregational preacher turned to me and said, "That is your vindication!"

Bishop Coxe later writes of baptism: "The word means dip. I think the sacred writers used the word in the primary sense, but also for other washings which were not dippings. In the church of England dipping is even now the primary rule. But it is not the ordinary custom. It survived far down into Queen Elizabeth's time. It never has been obsolete. I, myself, have baptized by dipping both adults and babes. I ought to add that in France the custom of dipping became obsolete long before it was disused in England. But for this bad example my own opinion is that dipping would still prevail among Anglicans. I wish that all Christians would restore the primitive practice." The national cathedral in its Jordan Font gives a wholesome sign of a true apostolic succession.

Children's Day.

Daisies and clover
And lilies all over,
Child-hearts and bird-notes in perfect attune;
Fern-fronds a-blowing,
And sweet faces glowing
What means it, children, this bright day in June?
"Our day," they chorus;
"God gave it for us,
This sunshiny day in the June of the year!"
Oh, little child-singers,
Oh, sweet message-bringers,
May we creep in, too, as the Christ draweth near?

A Torpedo for Destructionists

A "great little book" just published in London has made a very deep impression on my mind. It is entitled "Monument Facts and Higher Critical Fancies." This new work, consisting of only 127 pages, is issued from the press of the Religious Tract Society. It is written by that celebrated professor of Assyriology in the university of Oxford, Dr. A. H. Sayce, who, though himself a distinguished member of the critical school of biblical students, is the terror of the destructionist higher critics. As Dr. Sayce cannot be disparaged as an old-fashioned conservative in theology, or a "narrow obscurantist," for he is quite sufficiently advanced to alarm in some degree those who cling to the ruts and grooves of literalist orthodoxy, he is exactly the kind of authority who may claim attention all round.

The Greatest Bible Antiquarian Alive.

The very first words in the preface of this work are indicative of Sayce's position. He says as a start-off: "Recent archeological discoveries bearing on the age and authenticity of the Old Testament scriptures have been so numerous and so unexpected that a brief comparison of them with the results of the so-called 'higher criticism' is desirable, especially in view of the controversies which Professor Friedrich Delitzsch's 'Babel und Bibel' has excited in Germany. It will be seen that they are not favorable to the 'critical position.'" At the close of the preface, the author curtly says of those who have arrogated the title of "critics" to themselves: "It is needless to add that I, for one, do not admit their right to do so."

I am struck by these words in his first chapter, which deals with "historical evidence." Here he remarks: "Literary evidence may be explained away or misinterpreted, inscriptions may be broken and imperfect, but the evidence of potsherds and forms of art is evidence which, once acquired, is acquired forever, and constitutes a solid foundation to build upon. In other words, the more archeological and the less philological our evidence is, the greater will be its claim to scientific authority."

Dustheaps Better Than Dictionaries.

That last passage I earnestly commend to any of my brethren in the colleges and the churches who have been inclined to put their trust in the dicta of the philologists, however learned. Such great writers in their own department as Driver, Hupfeldt, Robertson Smith, Cheyne, Wellhausen, and Maenen are all philologists, and to them as such we may pay the utmost respect if they confine themselves to the evidence of language without transgressing on the domain of archeology, of which they know nothing except at second hand. These men have been very busy in the process of taking the Bible away from us; but one genuine "double first-class" man, like Sayce, who is both linguist in ancient Orientalist dialects, and actual explorer in the dust-heaps of antiquity, is helping us to recover the treasure that was snatched away so ruthlessly. I delight to sit at the feet of those Oxford champions of verbal criticism, Professors Driver and Cheyne, when they are simply expounding the scope and meaning of textual literature. But when they ramble off into some imaginary excursus on supposed myths and fables, and dismiss Abraham and Joseph, Moses and Daniel, the Judges and Joshua, all as the companions in fiction of Sinbad the sailor and the people of the Arabian Nights' entertainments, I turn sorrowfully away and leave them to their diversions, in order that I may hear what Flinders Petrie and Sayce, fresh from excavating in the east the memorial vaults of ages ago, can testify. It is singular indeed that at Oxford, within the precincts of the same university, Driver and Cheyne on the one hand, and Sayce on the other, should be at work in opposing directions. The two former are evermore pulling down the edifice which Sayce is reconstructing.

The Authority of Archeology.

Says Dr. Sayce: "It is archeology and not philology that has to do with history. The study of language and the study of the past history of mankind belong to different departments of thought. We cannot extract history out of grammars and dictionaries, and the attempt to do so has always ended in failure. In the early days of the science of language comparative philologists fancied that they could construct the primitive history of a hypothetical 'Aryan family' upon the fossilized relics of Indo European speech, but the idyllic picture which they painted of the 'undivided' Aryan community, has long since been shattered by anthropology."

Dr. Sayce complains that it is too often assumed that every Assyriologist or Egyptologist is equally a judge of historical questions. But there are students of Egyptian and Assyrian who have devoted themselves only to the philological side of their subject; and where archeology is involved, the opinion of such students is consequently just as valueless as that of any other philologist in other fields of research. It is for philology to decide upon the meaning of a passage in an ancient inscription; the historical bearing and date of the passage must be determined by archeology.

That Composite Bogey.

Here is a passage in the same chapter well worth thinking over: "In dealing with the history of the past, we are confronted with two utterly opposed methods, one objective, the other subjective, one resting on a basis of verifiable facts, the other on the unsupported and unsupportable assumptions of the modern scholar. The one is the method of archeology, the other of the so-called 'higher criticism.' Between the two the scientifically trained mind can have no hesitation in choosing." Then the great Oxford professor goes on with his argument in overwhelming style. He puts to a crucial test the whole "critical" school. There are cases in which recent archeological discovery has enabled us to put the pretensions to the proof. The most important of these is the account of the deluge in Genesis. Here, if anywhere, we should be justified in inferring the existence of a composite narrative, in which at least two stories of the flood have been mixed or combined together. But it so happens that a Babylonian story of the flood, which goes back in its present form to the age of Abraham, has been preserved in the Chaldean epic of Gilgames. When we compare this story with the account in Genesis, we find it agrees not only with the so-called Elohistic version, but with the so-called Yahvistic version as well. It thus presupposes an account of the deluge in which the "Elohistic" and "Yahvistic" elements were already combined together. And since it was written some centuries before the birth of Moses, there are only two ways of accounting for the fact, if the narrative in Genesis is really a composite one. Either the Babylonian poet had before him the present text of Genesis, or else the "Elohist" and "Yahvist" must have copied the Babylonian story on the mutual understanding that the one should insert what the other omitted. There is no alternative of a third kind.

Burst Bubbles.

"It follows from all this," goes on the professor, "that the 'critical' method is scientifically unsound, and its results accordingly will not stand the application of a scientific test. It is quite as much an artificial creation as was the Ptolemaic system of the universe, and like the latter, requires for its support an ever-increasing number of fresh hypotheses and complicated qualifications." But I have not space here to bring out some of the extraordinary facts which Dr. Sayce piles up with overwhelming effect. I purpose, after this introduction, to give in my next article a summary of these. If I can induce young students amongst my brothers and sisters to attend to them, I feel that they will be helped for life. Dr. Sayce is the supreme authority on what I conceive to be the most important question of the day.

The Coming of Christian Union

By N. J. Aylsworth

Many influences during the last half-century have wrought in favor of Christian union. The powerful attack during the last generation of some able scientists on the foundations of Christianity, and even on the fundamental principles of religion itself, turning the attention and solicitude of Christian peoples away from their differences to the great truths which they hold in common; the increased clarity of the moral sense, relegating to their true place many of the doctrinal speculations that have separated Christians, and exalting those truths having a vital relation to the religious life; the world-wide growth of fraternity, due largely to the annihilation of space by steam and electricity; the latest advance of civilization in the upbuilding of vast business and labor combinations, and their struggles on the way to beneficent adjustment, with the ever present object lesson of the vast power of combination for good or evil; the missionary spirit, which has drawn the heart of the church away from its contentions to its Master's work of converting the world, with the embarrassments experienced in missionary work from the divisions of churches; the pressing questions of our civic life, which can be solved only on Christian principles, and call for the united effort of all good people—these and other influences have called mightily to Christians to unite. Nor is there reason to doubt that our own plea, now nearly a century old, had its influence in stimulating and guiding union sentiment. What have these powerful influences done? First, what have they not done?

Our fathers dreamed that in the near future other religious bodies would disband and come over to us or, at least, that so many of their adherents would flock to our fold as to deplete their numbers and leave them neglectable quantities. Many an audience thrilled under this glowing picture. But this has not come to pass. Were these heroic men, then, altogether wrong? Not so. They read the mighty truth aright, but they misread human nature. Spiritual forces, like all others, follow the line of least resistance. It is amazing that people with scarcely a shadow of difference between them still stand apart. To disband or to be absorbed is not an easy thing to do. That step may wait long after others are taken. It is hard to die, even to die into glory. But what has happened?

Religious contention has almost entirely ceased, and the spirit of brotherhood is far on its way. Co-operation in many forms of Christian work has come about. The Evangelical Alliance, Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., union Sunday-school lessons, Christian Endeavor, etc., have accomplished great results, not only in the line of Christian work, but indirectly in welding together in the strong heat of a common sympathy those who have struggled and wept and rejoiced together. Work together in a noble cause is the royal way to love making and to perfect understanding.

This, then, has been the way of the coming of Christian union. How fearful our mistake had we antagonized these steps!

But this great movement was not to stop here. It is struggling to take another step. Federation is born of the same spirit and is looking to the same end as the other steps taken. It is going one step farther in the same direction—the doing of the Master's work piteously calling to be done, and left undone because of divided counsels. That it will enable the followers of Christ to do more for the salvation of men, can hardly be questioned.

But are there not insuperable obstacles to our taking this step? Would not joining in such a measure compromise our plea? By dividing territory with the evangelical peoples about us would we not recognize and sanction denominationalism? I think we may say emphatically, No. You see a little child fall into a river and that its playmate in trying to rescue it has fallen in, too. You rush to the rescue, and meet another man at the bank. He says, "The children are so far apart. Suppose you take this one and I that." "All right," you say, and in you plunge, and soon both children are saved. Have you recognized that man as a Christian by dividing this work with him, which neither of you could have done alone? Have you even recognized him as a moral man? Certainly not. Had you known him to have deserved hanging long ago for murder, it would not have changed your course. You knew that he was a good swimmer and wanted to save that child, and your arrangement with him recognized that and nothing else. The evangelical bodies about us can, under God, save souls, and are striving to do so, and when we divide territory with them to do what we cannot do alone, we recognize just that and nothing else. And we have recognized that very thing for nearly a century. If this work does not save souls their members are not Christians, and if they are not Christians our plea for Christian union is gone, for there are no Christians to be united. To refuse to admit the only thing that federation recognizes, that these people save souls, is to abandon our plea after a century's advocacy. But does not federation imply a recognition of the Christian character of these peoples? This is involved in the fact that their work is such as to save souls, for their membership is the fruit of that work. That they save men covers the whole ground. It is an all sufficient reason for such a division of work as will save the most possible, and such division of work carries no further implications. It must not be forgotten that we can do but a small part of this work ourselves, and that the question is not whether those whom we cannot reach shall be counted by those who are simply Christians or by those wearing denominational names, but whether they shall be saved by denominational churches or not saved at all. Shall it be the Methodist or Presbyterian church, or that other church, the saloon? Shall our young men be

MAC'S LUCK.

The Young Woman Reporter's Story.

The following food tale written by a clever young newspaper woman is a true story that came under her personal observation.

"I have been with the——(a paper in a Calif. town) for nine years and Mac has been with us all that time and I do not know how much longer. Mac's full name is MacClellan. Before the linotypes came in he was a good printer, and was one of the first to learn the machine, and is now, at about the age of 42, one of our very fastest operators.

"Last winter and the winter before Mac, probably from constant night work and improper food, got badly run down, could not eat much, what little he did eat did not do him much good and he always complained he could not keep warm.

"I missed him for awhile until yesterday I overtook him on the street going toward the office, and hardly knew the man; had it not been for the familiar walk I should surely have passed without recognizing him. He was stout, his face was round and ruddy and his eyes bright as I had never seen them before.

"I said, 'Mac, I hardly knew you, what on earth have you been doing to get so fat?' He replied, 'Grape-Nuts, nothing else. I started in on Grape-Nuts food three months ago when I weighed 126 and was feeling miserable, but now I weigh 160 and feel better than I ever felt in my life. I quit my old diet and went on Grape-Nuts and that's the whole story.' Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Exercise is necessary but there's no nourishment in it and proper food alone can supply that. Grape-Nuts for 10 days is a pleasant trial and proves big things.

There's a reason.

First Impressions of Saint Louis*

By J. M. Philputt

I thank you for this cordial welcome. I have been informed that all the addresses to-night are to be extemporaneous. I feel about extemporaneous addresses very much as Daniel Webster felt. He said that he found that his extemporaneous addresses went off better if they were first written down and committed to memory. However, we are all in the same boat, so you will know what to expect.

I need hardly tell you that St. Louis has been, for the most part, an agreeable surprise, for we had heard terrible things about it. Some people said it was the hottest place this side of Tophet; others said it was the dirtiest place on the continent except Pittsburgh; we were told that there was no climate in the world so despicable as that of St. Louis; so we were prepared when we got off the train to be met by a thunder storm or be swept off our feet by an equatorial simoon. I do not know what it was. Perhaps it was the genial face of Bro. Garrison that transformed all these things. We arrived here on a beautiful evening, and the next day was as delightful as any of California, and the four days that we have spent here have been, I think, four of the most perfect summer days that I have ever seen. I was born in the south, you know, and I am not afraid of hot weather. On the Lord's day, we found a most attentive and responsive people to listen to the Word of God. In the comfort and quiet of Brother Garrison's hospitable home, it is no wonder we felt almost like Enoch, as though we had been translated, and were not in the flesh. But we had an experience yesterday morning that convinced us that we were still in the flesh. We went out to find a boarding house. We wanted a very modest one, befitting our calling and pocketbook. One lady showed us a hall bedroom, with a three-quarter folding bed, one gas jet, and no transom over the door. She said the price of this had been reduced to $60 per month, without board. We offered to buy the house. We thought that would be a cheaper way to get at it; but otherwise we have met with the most cordial welcome and have found plenty of room. A very different experience, however, from what I had once in London. I was over with a little American party, and we went out to find rooms near the British museum. Everything was full, and everywhere we were turned away. Finally I said to one of the butlers, "Where did all these people come from; is Barnum in town?" and he answered, "It is these blasted Americans. They come over here in shiploads; they are everywhere and have taken everything." Our impressions of St. Louis have, as I say, been for the most part pleasant. We find here a great city. It has the atmosphere of a great city. St. Louis is now the fourth, I believe, of the great cities of the country, being exceeded by only New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. The census of 1900 gave you 600,000. I am told that you now have about three-quarters of a million. That is a great number. A gentleman took me down town on Saturday and showed me around. He had a pride that my impressions of the business part of the city should be favorable, and he took me into the banks and great trust companies, and when he finally turned me loose he said, "I want to tell you about St. Louis. We are rather slow to take a man up, but when we do take him up we never let go."

I am most impressed with St. Louis as a great place for work among the Disciples of Christ. Already we are strong in the city and in the state. There are 3,800 Disciples now in the city, I believe, and 170,000 in the state. One of the first things that Mrs. Philputt said to-night, when we first saw this company of Disciples, was, "How good it is to get among our people again, where we don't have to apologize for our faith or explain what we believe, and where we do not always have to be on the defensive." We have been where our people were little known. Down at Coronado Beach one evening after supper the people in the boarding house wanted to know who we were and what was my business, and when it transpired that I was a Christian minister, they did not know what that meant. Finally one bright faced girl said, "I know what your people are. You believe in living as the ancient Christians lived."

I told her we believed in living as some of the ancient Christians lived, but in that day, as in this, there were some who did not reach the ideal standard. It is a good thing to know that all over this country our people are coming to be recognized as an important factor in the religious life and activity of the land. I had a queer experience when I went to Union Seminary in New York in 1885. I had to go before the faculty and state my position, and I said, "I am a member of the Christian church." Dr. Hitchcock said, "Yes; we are all members of the Christian church; but what branch?" Then I said, "Disciples of Christ," but this was no better. The Disciples of Christ were not so well known in that part of the country then as now. Finally the president said: "Can't you tell us what you believe? State some of the tenets of your faith; perhaps we can get hold of it in that way." So I proceeded to enlighten these solons on the principles of the "faith once for all delivered to the saints." Finally a light broke over the face of Dr. Hastings, as he said: "I know what you are. You are a Campbellite-Baptist," and I said, "I guess I am," so I went into the books as a "Campbellite-Baptist." But it is not so to-day over the country. Most of the thinking people whom you see, when you speak of a Disciple of Christ, know what you mean.

Thirty-eight hundred Disciples in St. Louis! That is a good, round sum; but I think you will admit that there is room for great expansion in this city, which I think is destined to be the metropolis of the land, for it is centrally located, and with a ship canal connecting the Mississippi and the great lakes St. Louis will become a seaport, and ships from across the Atlantic will come up and land at your wharves. Here, in the very center of our nation, it seems to me there should be an onward movement among the Disciples as nowhere else in the land. I am glad our people are waking up.

BOTH JAWS SHOT AWAY.

Still a Successful Business Man.

A man who had both jaws shot away had trouble eating ordinary food but found a food-drink that supplies the nutriment needed. He says:

"I have been an invalid since the siege of Vicksburg, in 1866, when I was wounded by a minie ball passing through my head and causing the entire loss of my jaws. I was a drummer boy and at the time was leading a skirmish line, carrying a gun. Since that time I have been awarded the medal of honor from the Congress of the United States for gallantry on the field.

"The consequences of my wound were dyspepsia in its most aggravated form and I finally proved ordinary coffee was very hard on my stomach so I tried Postum and got better. Then I tried common coffee again and got worse. I did this several times and finally, as Postum helped me every time, I continued to use it, and how often I think that if the Government had issued Postum to us in the Army how much better it would have been for the soldier boys than coffee.

"Coffee constipates me and Postum does not; coffee makes me spit up my food, Postum does not; coffee keeps me awake nights, Postum does not. There is no doubt coffee is too much of a stimulant for most people and is the cause of nearly all the constipation.

"This is my experience and you are at liberty to use my name." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

*A speech delivered at the banquet of the Christian Churches of St. Louis, May 24.

A Great Fair and a Great Convention

Faith fears no famine. The greatest exhibition the world has ever dreamed of is a fact. A greater convention of Christian people than the world has ever known will be a fact in October. Yesterday was the teacher of to-day, Chicago outstripped the Philadelphia centennial, and the Cincinnati missionary convention greatly surpassed the first one held by the societies. So is the Louisiana Purchase exhibition far superior to anything that had preceded it, and so will the St. Louis convention be the greatest religious assembly ever held. The question of faith really, is hardly an issue; there are too many certainties for doubts to have a place.

The "greatest show" will itself bring thousands of people—of Christian people—to St. Louis. Many of these can select their own time, and the most delightful time of the year in St. Louis is October—the Indian summer—the convention time. Thousands of our people—a million of them—have never attended a convention. Now they have the chance of a lifetime to "kill two birds with one stone," to see the greatest exposition and attend the greatest convention for one railway fare. We know that much will depend upon the attractiveness of the program arranged by the societies' committees. This is not a time for experiment in bringing forward a lot of unknown men. We want speakers of national reputation, who will give us of their very best. There will be a danger lest the attractions at the Fair may prove more powerful than the attractions at the convention hall. Those who have the selection of the speakers and topics have a weighty responsibility upon them. They have to provide the very best program ever offered. But we feel sure they will consider this matter very seriously, and will present our best speakers and our most representative men on this occasion. Other churches are sending their most brilliant men to St. Louis, and we shall have much to compete with in getting the public eye and ear.

A writer in the Review of Reviews gives a clear suggestion as to the nature of the exposition and its cost.

"This wonderful exhibition at St. Louis, of what the world is and does in the beginning of the twentieth century was planned, at first, as a much more modest thing," he says. "It arose through a suggestion made to the people of St. Louis in 1898 by the Missouri historical society for some fitting celebration of the centennial of the sale, on April 30, 1803, by Napoleon Bonaparte to Thomas Jefferson of the country west of the Mississippi river, the land known in history as the Louisiana Purchase, and now divided into fourteen states and territories—Arkansas, Colorado, Wyoming, South Dakota and North Dakota, Iowa, Indian Territory, Minnesota, Kansas, Louisiana, Nebraska, Montana, Missouri and Oklahoma.

"The idea took deep root; the business men's league, with its far-reaching commercial influence, assumed responsibility for the movement; the enthusiasm of the states and territories in the Purchase was aroused; national encouragement was got. It was decided that the Purchase should be commemorated by a world's fair. The people of St. Louis gave $5,000,000 in personal subscriptions; the city voted a gift of $5,000,000 more and half of the beautiful Forest Park as a site; Congress gave outright $5,000,000, and lent to the fair $4,600,000 more. All of this $19,600,000 has been spent in making the grounds, building the exhibit palaces, inducing the co-operation of foreign governments and our own states, and in advertising the fair.

"The United States has, moreover, spent $1,650,000 on its own exhibit, and the Philippine Islands exhibit represents $1,000,000. Fifty-one states and territories will be represented by comprehensive exhibits, and forty-three of them will have buildings on the grounds. The appropriations and subscriptions of these states to the purposes of the fair, varying from Missouri's $1,000,000 to Maine's $40,000, amounts to $7,142,000. Missouri spends $1,000,000.

"Most of the foreign governments have large talk of the accomplished expositionist, the 'clou' is the new thing—the wonder that runs from mouth to mouth.

"What is the 'clou' to the St. Louis exposition. At Chicago it was the Ferris wheel, at Paris the Eiffel tower. Elsewhere before and since, the 'clou' had not been born. It is a product of our sensational century. So vast and overpowering is the universal exposition of 1904 that its promoters have lost its 'clou.' They are waiting for the never-erring 'crowds' to discover it. One prophet has had a vision of the 'clou,' and this is what he beholds:

"Life began in a garden under the open skies. There man took his earliest studies and his simple pleasures first-hand from nature. Back to these first principles the greatest exposition has gone for its enduring wonder. All unawares, its promoters have been building a roofless drama of the human race, outspreading six hundred acres of hill-side, forest, lake and valley, alive with eight thousand peoples of all races, five thousand animals of almost every species, and the trees and plants of the four vegetable zones.

"This is the 'clou' of the latest exposition, the prophet says. St. Louis has set the new fashion. Expositions of the future must be of the open air. Splendid architecture has played its part in housing the marvelous and the strange among the handicrafts of man. Now we have returned to man himself, and the brute subject and his kingdom. The St. Louis spectacle will not be disappointing in the quality of its architecture. The Cascade Garden sounds a more homeric note than the memorable Court of Honor at Chicago; it far overshadows the Trocadero. Heroic sculpture tells its harmonious story of the great event which the exposition commemorates, yet these are not the features which will command the tribute of the world.

"It is on the fringe of this master epic of civilization that the visitors will hang with surprise. They will enter the mimic cities of the elder hemisphere, the villages of primitive peoples, go into the forests which cloak secrets old as the ages. On the western verge of the great show, one mile of aboriginal settlements tell more of the world than the palaces filled with mechanized ingenuity and masses of power, developing the speed of an enlightened century."

The Christian church—the Disciples of Christ—is the only religious organization that has planned to "do big things" at St. Louis. It is the only religious body that has erected a building of its own—a very serviceable building and a magnificent advertisement of the great heart of the church's plea. Our churches have the greatest opportunity ever presented to them of unitedly making a wonderful impression upon the whole world. F. N. Calvin, as chairman of the publicity committee, and Paul Moore, as press correspondent, are planning to circulate far and wide the news of the convention, and they bespeak hearty co-operation. St. Louis can accommodate the crowd that is coming. But there will be many people of the foolish kind who will come with much baggage, and having made no arrangements, they will go at once to some of the hotels of which they have and valuable exhibits, and all the great ones, except Russia, have buildings, the appropriations of the foreign participants having been a few thousand more than $7,000,000. Germany and France have spent more money than any of the other governments,—something more than $1,000,000 each. England, China and Japan have spent half a million dollars each, and Mexico nearly as much. The show places on the Pike are as extravagant, apparently, in their cost as in their architecture; some of them, particularly the 'Tyrolean Alps' and 'Creation,' have cost three-quarters of a million dollars each, which is also the cost of building 'Jerusalem.' Without counting the six or seven million dollars which these concessionaires have spent to construct and equip their places, the cities, states, and foreign governments are paying for their participation in this fair about thirty-five million dollars, more than twice the fifteen million dollars which Jefferson paid for the whole Louisiana territory. The computation, of course, does not consider the great cost that will fall upon private exhibitors. It is estimated that the insurance on exhibits is more than one hundred million dollars."

It is peculiarly an exhibition of interest to everyone who has ever had a thought about missionary work. In the most limited space it affords the greatest opportunity ever presented at one time for the study of the human race. As a writer has put it:

"Wise men are looking for the 'clou' to the mighty spectacle at St. Louis. In the shop-

The Convention by the Chairman of the Local Committee.

St. Louis will open its doors to the brotherhood of the world October 13-20 next. On that occasion the greatest missionary and educational convention in the history of the Christian church will be held. With all due regard to the workers who have had charge of the great conventions in the past, and with profound respect for the success of their efforts, we are still constrained to believe that St. Louis will eclipse them all.

In the first place, this is the year of the greatest Fair in the history of the world. Opportunities for securing reduced railroad rates have never been equalled, and this itself ought to bring the largest delegation of Christian workers in the history of the world; but we are not to depend upon the World's Fair and reduced railroad rates alone for the success of this convention, but rather on a great program, the activities of a splendid working committee who will have charge of the local arrangements, and the splendid facilities which we have for handling a great convention.

We have twelve churches, with nearly 4,000 members working in perfect harmony, located in every section of this great central city of the west; a convention hall unequalled for location, convenience and equipment, with three great assembly rooms under one roof, having a seating capacity in the three halls of 19,000 people, with the facilities for conducting three great conventions at the same time without any interference one with the other. There are numerous committee rooms, check rooms, immense corridors for the display of literature, and headquarters for colleges, state delegations, etc. With all these facilities, and with a post office, kindergarten, day nursery, hospital and rest room right at hand, we are confident that the local committee will be better able to handle the convention than any committee of the past.

We are planning for at least 25,000 delegates, and some of our friends insist that we will undoubtedly have 50,000 present at the convention.

The program so far outlined covers every department of Christian effort, and is sure to interest, in some of its features, all who come.

The chairmen of the various local committees, with their addresses, are given below:

LOCAL COMMITTEE.

W. H. McClain, general chairman, 1623 Washington Ave.

F. E. Udell, vice-chairman, Provident Chemical Works.

G. E. Ireland, secretary, 6438 Colorado Ave.

W. Palmer Clarkson, treasurer, Pioneer Coöperage Co.

J. H. Allen, advisory, Allen-West Co.

J. H. Garrison, advisory, 1522 Locust St.

CHAIRMEN OF SUB-COMMITTEES.

International Representation.—F. G. Tyrrell, 5020 Morgan St.

Publicity.—F. N. Calvin, 2800 St. Vincent Ave.

Pulpit Supply.—John L. Brandt, 3040 Locust St.

Religious Exhibit.—Oreon E. Scott, 817 Chestnut St.

Finance.—W. Palmer Clarkson, 2212 DeKalb St.

Reception.—George L. Snively, 903 Aubert Ave.

Registration and Badges.—W. D. Cree, 1522 Locust St.

Entertainment.—G. A. Hoffmann, 1522 Locust St.

Music.—W. Daviess Pittman, Mississippi Valley Trust Co.

Christian Endeavor and Sunday-School.—H. H. Hodgdon, 215 N. Broadway.

Printing.—Sydney H. Thomson, Provident Chemical Works.

Ushers.—E. T. McFarland, 1422 Penrose St.

Transportation.—J. A. Gardner, 512 St. Charles St.

Halls.—F. E. Udell, Provident Chemical Works.

Correspondence is invited, and all communications addressed to either the general chairman, or the chairman of any committee, care of committee headquarters, 1522 Locust street, St. Louis, Mo., will receive prompt attention.

On behalf of the members of the Christian church and the local committee, a general and cordial invitation is extended to our brotherhood everywhere to be with us Oct. 13-20.

With prayers for God's blessing upon our efforts and all our people, I am,

Faternally yours,

W. H. McCLAIN, Gen. Chairman.

National Convention Entertainment.

It should not be forgotten that St. Louis is to entertain 200 conventions during the World's Fair. This is an average of nearly seven conventions per week. The convention of the Christian church will possibly be one of the largest if not the largest during the year. It is expected that between 25,000 and 50,000 delegates will attend this great gathering. It would be no easy task to take care of so large a delegation without a World's Fair in our city, but when you add a World's Fair and a half dozen other conventions during the same week you see our difficulty. A committee of 50 has been organized to do everything in their power to take care of this vast gathering at this time when our city will be crowded to its utmost capacity. It is the wish of this committee that you send the names of your delegation at an early date, and state the kind of entertainment you wish. Are you willing to stop at a private home, or do you wish a hotel? And how much can you pay for your entertainment? Prices will range from fifty cents per person up as far as you wish to go. Kindly write to G. A. Hoffmann, chairman Convention Headquarters, 1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

Roll of Honor.

The following is the roll of honor of churches and individuals who are going to support their "own home missionary" through the American Christian Missionary Society.

The May offering has added several to this list, and we have no doubt many other churches that have not reported their offering will raise the $300 necessary to have their "own home missionary." It is a great inspiration to a church, as they select the field in consultation with the home board, and the missionary is kept in correspondence with the supporting church constantly, showing the church the work that is being done on the field. It seems to tie the church and the missionary closer together.

We earnestly and heartily recommend this plan to our churches.

Central church, Cincinnati, Ohio, A. M. Harvot, pastor, is trying for three home missionaries: Danville, Ky., H. G. Garrison, pastor; Winchester, Ky., Cecil J. Armstrong, pastor; Warren, Ohio, J. E. Lynn, pastor; Columbus, Ind., Tabernacle church, H. H. Harmon, pastor; Indianapolis, Ind., Central church, A. B. Philputt, pastor; Valparaiso, Ind., J. H. O. Smith, pastor; Frankfort, Ky., Geo. Darsie, pastor; Louisville, Ky., First church, E. L. Powell, pastor; Akron, Ohio, First church, J. G. Slayter, pastor; Bellaire, Ohio, Sumner T. Martin, pastor; Cleveland, Ohio, Euclid avenue church, J. H. Goldner, pastor; Cleveland, Ohio, Franklin Circle, Edgar D. Jones, pastor; Ionia, Mich., W. H. Taylor, pastor; St. Louis, Mo., Central church; Angola, Ind., Vernon Stauffer, pastor; Mayfield, Ky., R. L. Clark, pastor; Connellsville, Pa., C. M. Watson, pastor; Uniontown, Pa., Central church, Herbert Yeuell, pastor; Washington, Pa., E. A. Cole, pastor; Bluefield, W. Va., D. R. Moss, pastor; Cincinnati, Ohio, Mrs. S. M. Cooper; Oklahoma City, Okla., J. M. Monroe; El Reno, Okla., Canadian Milling Co.; Salina, Kan., Howard C. Rash; Guthrie, Okla., the Guthrie Milling Co. (milling company one half and Guthrie church one-half); special missionary of the Sunday-schools through the Young Disciple, F. W. Freeman; Englewood, Chicago, Ill., C. G. Kindred, pastor; Cedar Rapids, Iowa, F. J. Stinson, pastor; Onawa, Iowa, Le Grand Pace, pastor; Augusta, Ga., Howard Cree, Citronelle, Ala., work; East Dallas, Texas, W. A. Fite, Jno. A. Stevens, evangelist; Richmond, Ky., Hugh McLellan, pastor; Lexington, Ky. (Central), I. J. Spencer, pastor; Lexington, Ky. (Broadway), Mark Collis, pastor; Paris, Ky., Carey E. Morgan, pastor; Independence, Mo., L. J. Marshall; Buffalo, N. Y. (Richmond avenue), R. H. Miller, pastor; Mt. Cabanne church, St. Louis, Mo., F. G. Tyrrell, pastor; Jackson boulevard, Chicago, Ill., Lloyd Darsie, pastor; First church, Kansas City, Mo., W. F. Richardson, pastor.

The following churches will have their special missionary for the better part of the year: Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, Ohio, P. Y. Pendleton, pastor; Richmond avenue, Buffalo, N. Y., R. H. Miller, pastor; Third church, Indianapolis, Ind., C. B. Newman, pastor.

American Home Missionary Society Report.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST takes pleasure in presenting to its readers reports of work being done by the American Christian Missionary Society.

It is now eight months since our tent meeting began. Since Aug. 16 there have been 48 additions to our membership. Of this number some have fallen away, some have moved, and some have either grown indifferent or are hindered by adverse circumstances from attending our services, but far the greater number, by actual count 35, are seen weekly at our service, are assuming their responsibilities as units in the local congregation, and are being builded up in the knowledge of the word.

The past six months have been years of activity in all lines. Our Sunday-school has had the largest regular attendance, our teachers have been more prompt and faithful, and the work has been better in every way.

Our ladies' aid society has wrought earnestly and faithfully and in a most Christian spirit. Since the meeting it has raised $408.50. The ladies interested in the quarter league fund have pushed their various enterprises successfully, and about $100 has come from that source, with more in sight.

Attendance at church service, including prayer-meeting, has been steadily larger than at any time during the present pastorate.

Alameda, Cal. P. C. MACFARLANE.

During April, Bro. Frank E. Jones, of Fremont, Neb., assisted us in a meeting, and we feel, aside from the number added, the church is greatly blessed by this work among us.

Twenty workers of the congregation made a canvass of the city, entering 1,600 homes and places of business. As a result, we are better known and more favorably than ever before. We have had just 100 additions since I began here 18 months ago.

Boise, Idaho. A. K. WRIGHT.

We have begun the alterations on the church house, and our membership is, of course, submeans to help them get a preacher for all time, at once. Methodists and Baptists have two and three prosperous churches each. They got on the ground early. Business men of the city are in sympathy with our work.

During April the reports show ten added by baptism and four by letter.

Jackson, Miss. W. W. PHARES.

The past month has been full of encouragement for this work. In it we have had our largest attendance at Sunday-school, 200; also largest average attendance for four Sundays. Attendance at Sunday-school as follows: 172, 179, 200, 179. We have about 80 in our Junior Christian Endeavor, 37 girls and 29 boys were in attendance last Sunday. The evening

THE BUILDING OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH ON THE WORLD'S FAIR GROUNDS.

To be dedicated on Saturday, June 4.

The lettering on the building is as follows: Over the door: "Christian Church." "Disciples of Christ." Left Panel: "The Disciples were called Christians first in Antioch." Acts 11:26, Right Panel: "That they may all be one, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." Jesus.

scribing to this fund, the figures of which cannot well be given until a later date.

The branch Sunday-school and service held at the car shed offices is prospering. The new members gained in that work are aiding in the general work. The strain on finances to meet the extra expenses on the building makes it harder than ever to raise the salary, but we expect to rally up the arrears, somehow, later on. Foreign, home, state, city, C. W. B. M., Benevolent association, and other missions are all remembered by us, as best we can, as their days come around.

St. Louis, Mo. G. E. IRELAND.

Hattiesburg is a new town of 8,000, near coast. In heart of greatest long leaf pine belt in the world. Growing fast. Four systems of railways. Our state board has never entered it before.

We have in our new church some of the very best people of the city—bankers, professional men, business and laboring men. The end is not yet. Oh, if we only had the church attendance was about the same: 210 for both services.

full, making 332 since the beginning of this work, 16 years ago.

There is $414,000 in the fund June 1. A. R. Teachout, of Cleveland, O., handed me a check for $1,000 at the state convention as a direct gift to this fund, lifting the fund to $414,000.

Over $370,000 has been paid back in loans and interest since the beginning of this work in 1888. The board has handled, therefore, the $414,000 plus the $370,000, making $784,000 in all during the last fifteen and one-half years, and has lost on bad loans only $470. This $470 will be more than made up in excess of interest above expenses. This remarkable record speaks well for the honor and promptness of our mission churches borrowing this money, when it is noted that 792 loans have been made in 43 states and territories, the Dominion of Canada and Hawaii. What bank-convention to be held in St. Louis next October.

W. Daviess Pittman presided and explained the purpose of the gathering, and W. H. McClain, chairman of the local committee of the convention, briefly outlined the work to be done, and appealed for hearty co-operation. He said that 1,200 people would be wanted on the different committees, and that they must be workers, not shirkers. In another column will be found some of Brother McClain's views.

In response to a suggestion of Mrs. H. M. Meier that some women ought to be on the committees, it was explained that in many instances these committees had not yet been formed, and that plenty of work would be allotted to and expected of the ladies.

Bro. J. M. Philpott gave us his first impressions of the World's Fair city, as reported at length on another page, and he, as well as his wife by her delightful singing, charmed all present.

Church Extension at the National Convention.

The board of church extension is doing everything it can to contribute to the success of the national convention in October in two ways: 1. In the making of a great report. 2. In the selection of a man to make a great speech.

The church extension society is yet a youth, comparatively speaking. It will be 16 years old in October. We should, by all means, have the greatest report in our history. The secretary and the board have made a splendid beginning for this missionary year. It remains now for the preachers and churches to do their share in the forthcoming September offering. The first six months of this missionary year the board added over $25,000 to the fund, and since last October over $70,000 has been returned in loans and interest to the board and 32 missions have paid their loans in ing concern can show so little charged to profit and loss. A great report will help to make a great convention.

Our speaker at the national convention is E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., a typical southern orator and thoroughly practical in all he says. He draws more men to hear him speak than any church in Louisville. Stopping one night at one of the leading hotels in Louisville, I asked of a group of traveling men, "Who is the leading preacher of Louisville?" They responded almost in a chorus, "Dr. Powell at the First Christian church. You should hear him. More men go to hear him than any man in Louisville." Enough said. Traveling men are wide awake and practical. We will hear a great speech from Brother Powell. G. W. MUCKLEY.

St. Louis Disciples' Banquet.

Members of the Christian church in St. Louis had a very delightful social gathering at the Christian Endeavor hotel on Tuesday evening of last week, when over 300 sat down to the banquet, prepared by the hotel management, of which John L. Brandt is one. After the viands had been paraken of there were speeches and music. The purpose of the gathering was that members of the different churches should become better acquainted with each other, while it was at the same time an occasion for disseminating information regarding the work and plans for the great

"the precaution of writing down a few extemporaneous thoughts," spoke to the toast "The Tie That Binds," in much the same language as our "Easy Chair" of last week.

The Misses Calvin, daughters of Brother Calvin, of Compton Heights, added much to the pleasure of the evening by their violin and piano contributions.

It was very generally felt that social gatherings like this one of the church membership could be made very profitable, as at Chicago, and no doubt other meetings will be held.

Program of the American Christian Missionary Society.

The program of the Home Board for the St. Louis convention will be one of the strongest ever presented to a national convention. It is not yet completed, and the names cannot be announced until all the acceptances have been received; but we can announce the address of President Z. T. Sweeney as one of the greatest addresses of the convention. E. L. Powell will speak for the work of church extension, and other men of national reputation will appear on that program. Further announcements will be made at a later date.

We confidently announce to our brethren that the St. Louis convention will touch the high water mark, not only in the character of the reports, in enthusiasm, but also in the addresses which are being prepared for the people. BENJ. L. SMITH, Cor. Sec'y.

Memory Verses 25-27.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures.—1 Cor. 15:3.

The Hour of Victory.

The hour of deepest humiliation was also the hour of victory. It was true, as Jesus said, that the transactions of this hour were the chief reason why he came into the world. As his mission certainly was not a failure, we are not justified in thinking of the crucifixion as an hour of tragedy and failure. It is true of all great and heroic souls, and was uniquely true of Jesus, that the sacrifice of personal pleasure and profit, even of life itself, is accepted willingly as a reasonable price to pay for the advancement of greater causes and wider interests. The tragedy of life is not the disappointment of personal ambition; it is not the loss of friends, pleasures or reputation; it is not even death. But the real tragedy of life is failure to serve the interests most worthy of service, ineffectiveness in relation to spiritual enterprises, the forfeiture of that which is permanent and universal for the sake of what is merely temporal and personal. No individual success or joy can be other than tragic if it be purchased by the betrayal of the common cause. No individual loss or apparent failure can be other than a triumph if it is a free gift for the welfare of men and the advancement of the kingdom of God. So the death of Jesus was his hour of victory.

"He Saved Others."

There was truth in the words of those who mocked, saying, "He saved others; himself he cannot save." Certainly he could not. It was because the saving of others required personal sacrifice that it was necessary for him to come into the world and suffer. He might have summoned twelve legions of angels to release him and yield him homage in the sight of those who had reviled and maltreated him; but that would not have been revealing the Father's love. It would have been revealing the Father's power, and his own power, and it would have stunned the scribes and priests with surprise and overwhelmed them with shame. But no one was ever saved by being overwhelmed by a show of power. If that could have sufficed, it would have been easy to give men salvation. But a revelation of love was necessary, and to make such a revelation it was required that He who saved others should relinquish all thought and anxiety about saving himself.

This was not only true of Jesus, but is a general principle of all human experience. Those who serve others cannot serve themselves. John the Baptist said of Jesus: "He must increase, but I must decrease." The paradox of the spiritual life is that such decrease as this is, after all, the surest road to increase; that he who is willing to lose his life, finds it.

Forsaken by God.

Though Jesus was more than man, his experiences were in most respects human experiences, in principle if not in content. On the mount of transfiguration he enjoyed an hour of spiritual exaltation to which may be compared the uplift that comes to us at certain seasons or under certain circumstances. On the cross there was not only the physical pain, but also the spiritual depression and anguish which seemed like the very withdrawal of the presence of God. Jesus was human enough to be weary, to need to pray, to rejoice, to mourn, to have his seasons of special uplift and exceptional depression. If he had not had these truly human experiences, all his divinity would not have qualified him to be the Savior of men. This cry of anguish from the cross is our guarantee that even in the hour when his divinity shone out most superbly, he was still human enough to feel the throb of human hearts and to be within reach of the men who need his help.

Christian University Commencement.

Last Monday a week ago, after several unexpected delays, Christian university moved into the new building erected to replace the one destroyed by fire on March 23, 1903. The building is one of the finest and most complete ever erected by our brotherhood. A short description has already appeared in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

This new building will be dedicated on commencement day, June 16, at two o'clock P. M., and we earnestly invite all friends of Christian education who read this to come and rejoice with us on that day. We will furnish free entertainment for all those who notify the president of the university of their intention to come, no later than June 8. Judge C. J. Scofield of the class of '71 will deliver the baccalaureate address on June 12, on which day fourteen young men will be ordained to the ministry. Seventeen students will receive diplomas on commencement day. Forty-three young men are now studying for the ministry, and we expect a much larger number next year.

Christian university is now better prepared than ever before to educate young men and women for usefulness in the church, as well as in every vocation in life, and the future looks very bright indeed.

WHAT MUST I DO TO BECOME CHRIST'S DISCIPLE?—Matt. 16:24-26; John 13:33-35.

For the Leader.

To become a disciple means to become a learner, a pupil. In the olden times the teacher had his pupils who not only learned of him, but were much more closely associated with him than pupil with teacher to-day. The disciples of Jesus traveled with him, shared the same fare, were sheltered under the same roof. He was to them indeed a master. They drank in all he said. He not only taught them the truth, but was himself the means to them of attaining that truth. The influence he had over them was complete. You can see how this form of discipleship called for a separation from all other masters and interests, from even relatives and dear ones at home. They must literally leave all to follow him. Having left all, they would now submit to his direction in all things. This is what it meant to be one of the disciples of Jesus during his personal ministry in the land of the Jews. Let us see what it means to be a disciple of Jesus during his world-wide spiritual reign.

For the Members.

1. To become a disciple of Jesus to-day means, first, to forsake the world. That is, to forsake the way of life that has not made Jesus Lord of the soul. Everything in my life that is against Jesus I must give up. My thoughts and my acts, and, more than these, my intentions, my plan of life underlying my thoughts and my acts, must change masters. It must be so, for it is impossible for me to follow Jesus in heart and in life until this change of masters is made.

2. I can see how friends may oppose me in this effort to become a disciple of Jesus. Can you? Then, can we not see, with equal clearness, that we must here part company with them? Not separate from them in the sense of cutting acquaintance, nor to the extent of enmity, but must cease to let them have any further influence over us in this matter. May not a parent, a father, or, what is worse, a mother, sometimes stand in the way of the coming of a son or a daughter to the Lord? In such case you must forsake them in the sense of the term just stated.

3. To become a disciple of Jesus means, secondly, that we must put him on. We have turned away from the world; we must now turn to Jesus. These two things are not so far separated as one might think. In fact, it is hard to distinguish between the act of turning away from the world and turning to the Lord. We, in a measure, do both at the same time: having in mind, of course, the work that goes on in the heart of the sinner. For it is not hard to see the difference between the outward breaking off from the worldly life and the formal steps of putting on Jesus. In turning to Jesus we drink in his gospel; we rejoice over its glad messages to us; our hearts leap for joy over the newly found pleasure in meditation upon the works of the Master; the soul rests, for it has found its normal place and work; it has slipped into the niche cut for it; it is no longer upon a strain.

4. As we have followed the direction of the gospel in the inward turning to Jesus, and in finding out what we must do, so let us follow the word in finding out what outward steps one is to take in becoming a disciple. We find that a public confession of faith in Jesus, a public declaration of the change, an announcement before the world of the joys and hopes and faith of the heart, is not only very desirable, but will be made if we follow the scriptures. (Matt. 16:16; Rom. 10:9-10; Matt. 10:32, 33; 1 Jno. 4:15; Acts 8:35-37; 1 Tim. 6:12.) Then follows baptism, that beautiful and significant symbolism in which the candidate is buried and raised in the act of baptism. The burial and resurrection of Jesus are set forth in this act of submission to the Lord. It means life. It means also that there has been a death of the old life of sin—hence buried—and a birth to a new life of righteousness—hence raised up. (Mark 16:16; Acts 2:38; 8:12; 18:8; Matt. 3:16; Acts 8:38, 39; Rom. 6:4; Col. 2:12.)

RELIGION IN THE HOME.

"When our sons shall be as plants grown up in their youth:

And our daughters as corner stones hewn after the fashion of the palaces" (Psalm 144:12).

The two figures employed by the Psalmist in the above passage are alike in this, that each one implies painstaking care for the young in our homes. The plant in our gardens is differentiated from all wild weeds, and is tenderly nurtured and cared for, that it may grow in strength and beauty, and fulfill the purpose for which it was planted. This, says the Psalmist, is what we should do with our sons. They should grow up under the nurturing care of parents and teachers, and so taught and guarded from evil things as to give promise for the largest future usefulness. As the corner stones of our houses are hewn and polished with care, especially in our palatial homes, so the Psalmist says our daughters should be cultivated, polished, and fitted for their high functions in the home and in society.

Importance of Culture. Happily it is now almost universally agreed that religion is the chief formative influence of the youthful character. Without the knowledge of God and of His will, and the love of God in the child-heart, and the habit of doing those things which are pleasing to Him, and avoiding those things which are displeasing, there can be no true, permanent culture of the mind and heart. Of course this knowledge of God leads on to all useful knowledge until the mind is disciplined and enlightened, and the heart purified and ennobled with high ideals and holy purposes.

The Duty of Parents. "Train up a child in the way he should go," said the wise man, "and even when he is old he will not depart from it" (Proverbs 22:6). This training up of the child in the way he should go is of course the duty of parents. This is a responsibility which they cannot evade, but which many, alas, do not realize. It is often said that this statement has so many exceptions as to destroy its force, and instances are pointed out where children who have been trained up in the way they should go have departed from it. No doubt there are exceptions to all general statements of this kind, but it may be said also that there is perhaps more implied in the phrase, "train up," than we often put into it. It means more than the mere verbal teaching of the child. There must be the acceptance on the part of the child of this right teaching, and the practice of such teaching during the early life. It must not be all theory. Parents must live what they teach, and illustrate their precepts by their daily conduct. Children are more likely to follow an example than to obey a command. What our homes need for the development of the character of the young is a religious atmosphere. This is more important than catechisms and severe parental ex-

A NEW WEEKLY FOR GIRLS AND BOYS

***

EDITORS { W. W. DOWLING, Editor Our Young Folks.
METTA A. DOWLING, Editor The Young Evangelist.

This New Paper is issued weekly and consists of eight pages of three columns each, printed on fine book paper, brand new type, in the best style of the art, and as far as appearance is concerned, will not suffer in comparison with any similar paper in the land.

For Whom Intended. THE ROUND TABLE is a paper for wide-awake, bright-eyed Boys and Girls in their "early teens," who are a little too old for The Young Evangelist and not quite far enough along in years and in their tastes and acquisitions to be greatly interested in the material which goes into the columns of Our Young Folks, which is intended for young men and women who are engaged in Bible Study and Christian Work, especially along Sunday-school and Endeavor lines.

Its Contents. THE ROUND TABLE is quite distinctly a "Story Paper," five of its eight pages will usually be occupied with Serial and Shorter Stories, always pure in tone and instructive in character, with fine illustrations. The remaining pages will be filled with Table Talks on a great variety of themes; Odds and Ends of useful information; Outlines of the Sunday-school Lessons and Endeavor Topics; A Puzzle Drawer full of Riddles, Charades and Problems, to exercise the wits of young readers, and in each issue a sufficient amount of Pepper and Spice to keep its readers awake and smooth out any wrinkles that may have a tendency to gather in their faces.

Subscription Price. One copy, one year, 50 cents; in clubs of five, to one address, 40 cents each; in clubs of ten or more to one address, 36 cents each. Quarterly subscriptions at proportional rates.

actions. Such passages as Eph. 6:4; Col. 3:21; 2 Tim. 3:14-17 further point out the duties of parents in training their children and the importance of doing it. [Call on different members to read and comment on these passages.]

Duties of Children. There must be reciprocity in the home as everywhere else in our relations with others. If it is the duty of parents to train up children in the way they should go, and to set them a godly example, it is the duty of children to honor their parents (Eph. 6:1-3), and to hearken to their instruction (Prov. 23:22). Well-instructed and trained children are not likely to neglect either to honor their parents or to respect their teaching. Indeed there is no surer mark of well-instructed and well-trained children than the reverence which they show to their parents and to their seniors. These are most likely to be found walking in harmony with the teaching they have received.

Heaven on Earth. When these reciprocal duties are recognized and performed by parents and children, the home on earth becomes the best type of heaven, and the influence which it exercises is the most potent and far-reaching of all those influences which work for the world's betterment.

Prayer: O, God, who art the Father of us all, unto whom we are indebted for the home, with all its sweet and holy influences, we beseech thee to turn once more the hearts of the parents to their children, and of children to their parents, and to give to those to whom thou hast given the care of children, a deeper sense of their responsibility in training them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, to the end that our homes may be filled with the sanctifying influence of religion, and become centers of influence which shall work for the redemption of the race. Amen.

Our Budget

—This is our first convention number.
—We shall do it more elaborately later on, when the returns are all in; meanwhile we think it well to sound a few preliminary notes.
—It is not too early for the brethren everywhere to begin to plan to take in our national convention. It so happens that the month in which our convention is held is the very best month of all the year in which to visit St. Louis and see the World's Fair. October brings us ideal weather in this latitude, and the World's Fair will be at its height of interest at that time.

—We are glad to furnish our readers this week a picture of our World's Fair pavilion, which will give them some idea at least of what it looks like. It takes a full view of it, however, to do it justice. You have only to glance at the faces of the two young women whose pictures adorn the opposite page to know that you will receive a cordial welcome when you visit the building. In another place we hope to publish the statement of the total cost of the building and the remaining indebtedness to be provided for.

—The customary variety and amount of our regular matter will be found as usual, as we add four extra pages to provide for the extra space for the convention. Among these will be found articles of great interest. Our subscription list keeps right on growing, regardless of summer, and we are sparing no pains to give our readers the very best we can prepare for them. Judging from the letters we are receiving and the number of new subscribers coming in, the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was never more highly appreciated than at the present time.

—I. J. Cahill is seeking health at Wartburg, Tenn.

—L. H. Zendt closed his work at Canton, Ill., June 1.

—L. L. Carpenter will dedicate at Oneida, Kansas, June 12.

—Levi Marshall has entered upon his ninth year at Marshall, Mo.

—Vernon Stauffer, of Cincinnati, begins his work at Angola, Ind., June 5.

—James N. Crutcher preached at the Metropolitan church, Chicago, on Lord's day.

—Kipton, O., is without a preacher, W. B. Slater having been called to Lancaster.

—A. B. Cunningham, of Flora, Ill., will represent the Benevolent association in that state.

—The report of the Scoville meeting at Moberly, Mo., gives 39 additions during the first ten days.

—Brother Ferrall, of Buffalo, reports a young Methodist Episcopal minister joining his church.

Bro. V. E. Rambo and family, of our mission forces in India, have reached Croydon, N. H., on furlough.

—W. H. Trainum, before leaving Jennings, La., for Aloa, Okla., surprised his friends by "taking unto himself a wife."

—W. F. Richardson is the toastmaster at the sixth annual luncheon of the Christian ministers in Kansas City, June 3.

—G. A. Miller, of Covington, Ky., who accompanied Prof. Willett to Palestine, is expected home by the middle of June.

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and Official Guide of the World's Fair for seventy-five cents. See advertisement in another column.

—G. A. Hess will close his work at Nora Springs, Iowa, about September in order to get nearer his parents in Kankakee county, Illinois.

—Next Sunday is children's day. It is one of the brightest and most joyous anniversaries of the whole calendar for the Sunday-school hosts.

—The resignation of J. Elza Holley, pastor of the First Christian church, Falls City, Neb., will take effect the first of June. After that his address will be Everest, Kansas.

—The address to the high school students by A. R. Adams, of Fairfield, Iowa, was published in full by the Tribune of that city. He also delivered the memorial address May 30.

—Now is the time for our friends to work up a large list of trial subscribers for the rest of the year 1904. Only seventy-five cents, and a World's Fair Guide free. See another column.

—C. E. F. Smith, of Douglas, Kan., does not know whether to be jealous or to feel honored because his "better half" was chosen to preach the memorial sermon to the G. A. R. last Lord's day.

—Austin Hunter, of Indianapolis, Ind., delivered the commencement address at Crawfordsville, Ind., on the night of May 24. This was the tenth commencement address he has delivered this spring.

—The Louisiana Christian missionary convention will be held at Alexandria, June 14-16. Besides some of the societies' secretaries, G. L. Wharton, of India, and President Zollars, of Texas, are on the program.

—The Hamilton, Ohio, Sun, May 23, contains a sermon from A. M. Growden on "Scenes on Mission Fields." Brother Growden has been invited by the editor to furnish sermons for the Monday edition of that paper.

—The Foreign society is in great need of a capable medical missionary for India to heal the sick, and to preach the gospel. The society will be pleased to hear from young men who are qualified for this important service.

—Another new work has been begun by the Chicago brethren in a hall at 1255 California avenue. Under Claire L. Waite, of the Douglas park church, it takes over the Sunday-school and other work of the Maplewood mission.

—If the army of Sunday-school workers will not forget to raise $60,000 next Sunday, they will make children's day, 1904, memorable. There are many assurances that more schools will observe the day this year than ever before in our history.

—Richard William Wallace, in sending us some names for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, contributes this aphorism: "The more CHRISTIAN-EVANGELISTS in the church the better the church." We believe it to be a true saying and worthy of all acceptance.

—Last Sunday Pres. Albert Buxton, of Dexter, Mo., Christian college, was unanimously elected permanent pastor of the Christian church of that city, which he has been serving on an engagement for a year. He will continue also in the college presidency.

—From a note just received from J. P. Lichtenberger, New York city, we learn of the death of Mrs. M. D. Hinchman, a sister of Professor Charles Louis Loos, which occurred in that city on May 23. Brother Lichtenberger will furnish an obituary notice soon.

—Geo. L. Snively, general secretary of our National Benevolent association, will dedicate the beautiful new church building at Loveland, Col., the first Lord's day in June. From thence he goes south to attend the Texas and Louisiana state conventions of the Christian churches.

—Ellis Purlee has just been called to remain with the church at Coffeyville, Kansas, for another year, and began his fourth year's work there the first of June. The action of the church board was ratified by the congregation with a unanimous vote at the congregational meeting.

—The church at Liberty, Mo., where Robert S. Frank is pastor, has bought one of the most desirable vacant lots in the town and will begin at once the erection of a handsome parsonage. This is but the prelude to the new church which Liberty will have within the next year.

—There will be conferences of the young people's missionary movement at the following places: Lake Winona, Ind., June 17-26; Lookout Mountain, Tenn., July 1-10; Silver Bay on Lake George, N. Y., July 22-31. Some of the most noted speakers of the country will be present to lead.

—Paul McReynolds, a student of Berkeley seminary, Cal., passed through St. Louis this week on his way to England, where he hopes to take special work under Professor Fairbairn, at Oxford. Brother McReynolds may —St. Louis will be the center of many matters of great interest during the rest of the year 1904—the World's Fair, the great convention and many other attractions. Please read offer of CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the rest of the year and the World's Fair Guide free, and write us at once.

—The commencement exercises of Dexter Christian college occurred last week, the baccalaureate sermon being preached by J. T. Craig, pastor of the church at Poplar Bluff. Pres. Buxton reports a good outlook for next session. The enrollment this year has been about 150, with a faculty of ten.

—The article on "The Coming of Christian Union," by Bro. N. J. Aylsworth, is certain to be read with interest, both because of the writer and the subject. His pen always sheds light upon the subject he treats. Christian union is coming, and blessed is the man that is able to recognize it and rejoice in it, no matter in what way it comes.

—G. W. Muckley called at the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on his way from the southern Kentucky and Ohio conventions, which he says were well attended and enthusiastic. There were over 700 delegates at the Ohio convention. Brother Muckley will visit in June the state conventions of Texas, Iowa, South Dakota and New York.

—The Louisville Christian Bible-school, which was projected and established by what is now the American Christian missionary society, and is now under the C. W. B. M., will hold its twelfth anniversary June 2. Our colored brethren studying for the ministry offer what promises to be an interesting program. There were 23 students this year.

—In a recent paragraph in this department we referred to the contribution of $300 each for the World's Fair pavilion of the Christian church from the three missionary societies—the American Christian missionary society, the Foreign Christian missionary society, and the Christian woman's board of missions. We did not know at the time that the Board of Church Extension was represented, independently, by a contribution of the same amount, which was paid early in the beginning of the enterprise. Of course we might have known that Brother Muckley would not only be in the band wagon, but beating the band! Church extension is never second in any worthy enterprise. That board will have one of the most interesting exhibits in our building.

—Paul Morton, son of the late J. Sterling Morton, who has recently changed his party allegiance, says: "I like the republican party because it is the party that stands for the material interests of the country." But which is the party that stands for the moral interests of the country? It seems to us these ought to be the more prominent issues without, of course, sacrificing the material interests. Have we such a party?

—R. E. McKnight has changed his address from Cisco, Texas, to 76 Ocean View avenue, Santa Cruz, Cal., and will preach for the present at Galt and Clay. He writes: "I regretted to leave the hospitable and warm-hearted people of Texas, but I could not stand the climate, and have come to California to spend the remainder of my days." Brethren in California will find Brother McKnight a faithful and efficient minister of the word.

—Claude L. Jones is holding a meeting at Baton Rouge, La. They are making a great effort there to dedicate their building before the legislature adjourns, that they may secure a large attendance of its members. "It is a time," writes Brother Jones, "when jewelry and other worldly goods should be parted with that the Lord's work should not suffer." The members of the church have made their sacrifices and look to brethren outside for aid.

—The children's day offering should be sent promptly Monday morning, June 6, to F. M. Rains, corresponding secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio. Send by bank draft, post office order, express order, or registered letter. Do not fail to give the local name of the Sunday-school as well as the post office. Be careful also to send the name of all who gave one dollar or more, that they may be enrolled in the one dollar league, and receive the beautiful souvenir, "Missionary Scenes in Japan."

—Let us have a strong rally of our members and friends at the dedication of the pavilion in the Fair grounds next Saturday afternoon. If the day be pleasant, we will meet on the east side of the building in the shade of the trees and of the building. If it should be raining, we can meet on the inside. People from all over the state will come here to dedicate the Missouri state building. Why should not many come in from Illinois and Missouri especially to the dedication of our building?

—G. W. Muckley, corresponding secretary of the board of church extension, is to fill the pulpit of the First Christian church, Kansas City, through June, July and August, while W. F. Richardson, pastor of the First church, visits the Washington, Oregon, northern and southern California conventions. Brother Richardson, who greatly needs a change, will also visit many of the churches on the Pacific coast, holding church extension institutes and rallies. Brother Muckley is compelled to spend most of these months in the office, and the plan arranged will be pleasant for both.

—The Missouri state convention, it will be remembered by all Missouri Disciples, is to be held at Carrollton, June 17-22, and is to include the C. W. B. M., Christian Endeavor, Sunday-school and state missionary interests. A great meeting is planned for and is needed by the interests of our cause in the state. Let us plan to be present in large numbers. It will be delightful to have hundreds of the leading men and women of our churches in the state sit together at the Lord's table on the Lord's day included in the program.

—Wm. J. Lockhart has resigned the work at Fort Collins, Col., on account of increased nervousness growing out of the work in that high altitude. He will locate for the present at 1508 Twenty-third street, Des Moines. A local paper expresses the deep regret felt on both sides at the enforced departure of the pastor from his flock. The paper says: "When he arrived the church had but 98 members and was $1,200 in debt. He leaves it free of debt, and with a present membership of 303 resident and 39 non-resident members." He feels quite able to undertake work in lower altitudes.

—J. H. Hardin, who has been engaged in work in the New England field under the employ of our missionary organizations for some time, but who is now doing special service for the American Christian missionary society, has been secured by the church at Richmond, Mo., to supply their pastorate for the summer and fall, beginning July 1. Richmond is one of our large, growing churches, with a new and beautiful church building and a handsome parsonage recently completed. Bro. Hardin, who has honored this office recently with calls in passing to and fro on his business, is looking well and vigorous. New England has evidently agreed with him, if not with his wife.

—F. O. Fannon reports the meeting at Waxahachie, Texas, in which he has been assisting the efficient pastor, Charles McPherson, as closed with good results. He commenced a meeting with W. P. Jennings, the pastor at Taylor, Texas, May 22. Brother Fannon has been doing evangelistic work in Missouri, Colorado, Texas and New York for the past thirty-one weeks, speaking from one to four times each day, and he reports feeling better than in the beginning of the work. He has every available date taken for meetings for the coming year, and among these engagements he is to hold meetings again in Fort Worth and Hillsboro, Texas, and Syracuse and North Tonawanda, N. Y. At the close of the Taylor meeting he goes to his country home at Dix, Ill., to spend a vacation with his wife and two sons.

—H. H. Van Meter, superintendent of evangelistic work for the Christian Endeavor union of Chicago, makes an interesting report of Endeavor evangelism in that city for the Christian Endeavor world. The method seems to be to hold open air meetings in various parts of the city and in the suburbs, in which singing forms an important part, followed by short, earnest testimonies by Christian Endeavor workers. We notice that a prominent part is being taken in this work by the Endeavor society of the First Christian church of that city. Why should not a great work of this kind be done in St. Louis during the World's Fair period by the Christian Endeavor union of this city? We hope the leaders of our Endeavor union will take this matter under consideration and plan a vigorous campaign for the coming summer and autumn.

—An anonymous "publicist" is writing some articles for the Independent on "The Democrats and the Presidency." In dealing with Senator Cockrell of Missouri the writer says: "Fortunately he comes from a state where profound scholastic research has no popular vogue." This remark is so characteristic of a certain eastern provincialism that it readily locates the unknown writer. Of what state could he say, truthfully, that "profound scholastic research" has a "popular vogue"? None, of course, but here was an opportunity, seldom left unimproved by that class of writers, to express his idea of the general ignorance and semi-barbarism which prevail west of the Mississippi. We trust many of this class who have never been able to see west of the Alleghenies will come to the World's Fair and take a little look at our western civilization.

—Prof. E. E. Snoddy, of Hiram college, has been supplying the pulpit of the Euclid avenue church, Cleveland, during the absence of its pastor, J. H. Goldner, on a trip to Palestine. Brother Snoddy says that "the appreciative spirit so marked in this church and its kindly courtesy to preachers have made the task a very pleasant one indeed. The church is united and enthusiastic in support of Brother Goldner, under whose efficient leadership every phase of its life and work is in excellent condition. A very enjoyable feature of the work was the splendid fellowship of quite a large number of preachers who are members of the congregation. Among them are J. Z. Tyler, Moffett, Streator, Knight, Griffith, Besaw and Spindler. Brother Tyler, though feeble in body, is clear in mind and in spirit as tender as a child. His well known interest in the Master's cause is still unabated. Brother Goldner is delighted with his trip and comes back to his people full of strength and enthusiasm for his future work."

—The membership of the Religious education association, whose executive office is located at 153 La Salle St., Chicago, is steadily growing, and the general secretary, Dr. Ira Landrith, confidently expects to report an increase of 100 per cent by the opening of the next convention, February, 1905. Both individuals and institutions are joining. Colleges, universities, libraries, churches, Sunday-schools and other institutions are uniting as institutional members, while the individual memberships represent the faculty of almost every leading educational institution in the land, besides pretty nearly every strong church, reform movement and interdenominational religious organization. The Canadian membership has nearly doubled since the March convention, and the association already has members in several foreign countries. The cost of membership is $3 for the first year, $2 annually thereafter. Full information will be furnished upon application to the general secretary.

—A small religious paper bearing the unctuous name of "The Soul Winner," which is no doubt accustomed to weigh all questions and doctrines from a denominational point of view, contains a review of our "Helps to Faith," which begins with this amusing, not to say amazing, statement:

"The author's method is to conceal his own doctrinal standpoint and lead the reader onward step by step until he finds himself in the familiar camp of the author's own denomination. The book is really a skillful piece of special pleading for the doctrinal position of Alexander Campbell, whom the author considers the greatest reformer since Luther, and the church he founded 'the great reformation of the 19th century.'"

Really, if it is such a magic book as that it ought to be circulated in editions of ten thousand by those who agree with the "doctrinal standpoint" of the author. It was written, however, with the sole view of strengthening faith—the common faith. If, in doing that, it necessarily strengthens its author's doctrinal position, so much the better for that position.

Children's Day.

Children's day for heathen missions is now at hand, and it should claim our time, our attention and our best efforts. Reports from the field indicate a large increase over last year in the number of schools preparing for this great day among our children.

Let us catch the deep, full meaning of children's day. We are just beginning to appreciate this the greatest of all enterprises: the developing of our children in the actual work of giving the gospel to the whole world. Mr. John R. Mott truthfully says, "The Sunday-school is, in some respects, the largest undeveloped missionary resource of the church." Let us consider the limitless possibilities wrapped up in our children and duly appreciate the truth that they are our wealth and the jewels of the church.

Last year the Sunday-schools gave nearly $52,000 for foreign missions; this year they will give $60,000. What they have done is but a prophecy of what they may do with proper attention. It is but reasonable to expect the entire church to be enlisted in children's day. They should give their sympathy and lend a helping hand to make the first Lord's day in June a great day.

The special children's day exercise, "The Conquering Christ," furnished free by the Foreign missionary society, will prove a helpful agent in the observance of this day. What a theme have we here for kindling enthusiasm! The exercise may be supplemented by any means desirable upon the part of the schools; but let the quickening thought—the conquering Christ—dominate everything else upon this day.

The Christian Standard and a New Book.

"This is a good, wholesome and faith-producing book. It is unmistakably the best work of the author, both from the intellectual and the literary point of view. It is the ripest thought and maturest conviction of a veteran whose ministry as a preacher and writer has been conspicuous among the churches of Christ. It bears the unmistakable marks of wide reading, earnest thinking and catholic sympathies. It is thoroughly modern in spirit and form, and at the same time perfectly loyal to the truth that has come down to us through the centuries. The author's definition of evolution would raise no protest among intelligent believers, and is not in conflict with the most implicit confidence in the Bible as a divine revelation. The view that man is to inhabit other worlds is but an incident in this instructive and encouraging message. The theme is really man; his creation, his fall, his redemption in Christ, and his glorification in the life beyond. The treatment of the subject is at once philosophical and reverent. The old doctrines appear in modern forms of thought and speech. Without going out of his way, the author shows his devotion to the plea for the restoration of the Christianity of the New Testament. The great Christian doctrine centering in and emanating from the Christ, and preparing man for both this life and the world to come, is set forth with much attractiveness of statement and aptness of illustration, but with no concession to the rationalistic spirit of the present age. The whole influence of the volume is in behalf of an intelligent and implicit faith in Christ as the Son of God and the Savior of man. The book is distinctly quotable, as such expressions as the following show:

"I prefer liberty with all of its evil, to despotism with all of its good."

"I offer as the remedy for this world's unrest our Lord Jesus Christ, with all that he has spoken and all that he has done."

"Denominationalism is bad at its best, while sectarianism is contrary to the whole spirit and purpose of the Christian religion."

"This volume has a distinctly homiletic value. Extensive citations of the best poetry enrich the pages; illustrations of vital significance abound; luminous interpretations of the holy scripture enforce the argument; science is made a handmaid of religion; and the imagination is appealed to in a sober but stimulating way. The table of contents and index are full and satisfactory. We shall be glad to learn that this thought-provoking book has an extensive reading among Disciples of Christ and the intelligent reading public generally."

The book reviewed by the Christian Standard in the above terms is "Man Preparing for Other Worlds" by W. T. Moore. (Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo. Price $2.)

Agents Wanted.

We have profitable employment for a number of agents who will work for us during the summer months. Write at once to the Christian Publishing Co., 1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

Railroad Rates to State Convention.

Strenuous efforts have been made to secure the one fare round trip rate to the state convention, but the very best we could do was one and one-third fare for the round trip. You purchase your tickets at your home station to Carrollton and return for one and one-third fare. Be sure to get a round trip ticket; you don't need certificates or anything of that kind. Tickets on sale June 16-20, good to return June 23. T. A. ABBOTT.

Official World's Fair Guide Free.

Of course you want an official guide of the World's Fair. This is a splendid book, giving you an intelligent idea of the World's Fair. This you can have free on the following conditions:

First. If you are not a subscriber to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, send us seventy-five cents for the rest of the year 1904 and we will send you the Guide free.

Second. If you are a subscriber, secure two trial subscribers for us at seventy-five cents each, send us the one dollar and fifty cents, and receive the Official Guide for yourself and for each of the new subscribers free. Do this at once and you will be delighted with the Guide as well as place the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in new homes.

The St. Louis Letter.

About three hundred and twenty-five of the members of the Christian churches of St. Louis sat down to a banquet together at the Christian Endeavor hotel on Tuesday evening, May 24. It was a representative gathering of many of the best workers of our different churches of the city. Mr. Daviess Pittman was toastmaster, and addresses were made by Messrs. McClain, Garrison and Philpott. Mrs. Philpott sang a solo and responded to an encore. Misses Artie and Enola Calvin gave a violin and piano selection and also responded to an encore. The work of the coming great convention was considered, and much enthusiasm engendered. All went away feeling a renewed influence of the blessed tie that binds our hearts in Christian love. We hope that such occasions will become regular features of our St. Louis fellowship.

No doubt many friends at a distance are wondering how the Fair is progressing, and when is the best time to come. The buildings are nearly all completed and the larger part of the exhibits in, but the Fair is not completed. Many features of it are complete and one can find fifty cents' worth of sight-seeing any day he may desire to go. Indeed, it is so great that one can find more than he can take in for several days. We on the ground would say, come at any time when you get ready, or when you can get off from home, but if you can arrange to come during the month of October, we are confident you will be better pleased with what you see than at any other time. Then everything will be completed. The climate here is perfect at that time, and best of all, that is the month for the greatest convention ever held by our people, or any other people.

Many are interested in knowing something of the Jerusalem exhibit. We would say, make your plans to see it; it is certainly worth while. The exhibit covers about eleven acres of ground. One can easily imagine himself in a foreign city. As soon as you enter you will be attracted by the booths or oriental stores along the streets. The camel and donkey drivers are there galore, and your ear is greeted with the gibberish of the genuine Jew, always on the alert to drive a bargain. From this exhibit one can get a fair idea of how modern Jerusalem really looks. The streets are named as in the real city, and the buildings are arranged so as to give a fair idea of the originals. When the buildings are all completed we may have something more to tell our readers of this miniature oriental city.

The writer of the St. Louis letters is the chairman of the convention publicity committee, and Bro. Paul Moore, of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, is press representative. We want to ask for the co-operation of our ministers all over this country, and especially do we ask the corresponding secretaries of the various states to help us in bringing the coming convention favorably before all of the churches and state conventions. The experience of being in the next convention will be worth more to help the minister in his regular work with his people than a month's preaching. Get your people to come, and you will never regret it. We ask the secretaries to talk the convention in the state gatherings. Appoint someone to give a special talk on the great convention. Urge the people to come. Literature giving information with regard to the special preparation will be sent out as fast as possible. Our committees are hard at work, and they are determined to leave nothing undone that will help to make this the greatest religious convention the world has ever seen. We want our people everywhere to feel that this is their convention, and its success is their success.

Just think of it as an opportunity to attend the greatest international convention ever held by the Christian churches, and at the same time the greatest international exposition ever held in the world, with special transportation rates from everywhere. You cannot afford to miss it. Keep in mind Oct. 13-20.

News From Many Fields

Illinois Notes.

Spring has finally come. The promise of God that seedtime and harvest should not fail us, though old, ought always to stir our hearts with gratitude to the ever watchful, loving Father. So far 1904 has been a fruitful year in the Lord's work. Great meetings have been held in many churches, with hundreds of souls born into the kingdom. Special care should now lead these new children of the kingdom into loving service to the Master. Among the more important lessons should be growth in a knowledge of the truth, prayerfulness and communion with God and liberality. Christ freely gave. We cannot be like him and not be givers.

Building of new churches is occupying large attention. By fall the brethren at the Third church, Danville, Edwards street, Decatur, Lincoln, Arrowsmith, Joliet, Forrest, Williamsville, Blue Mound, Jacksonville and perhaps others, all expect to be in new houses of worship. May the worship be as much more inspiring and the consecration to the Lord's work as much more beautiful as does the new house exceed the old.

The church at Minier was an offshoot of the Little Mackinaw congregation in 1874. Near it was the farm and long the home of our departed veteran, George W. Minier. The church numbers about 130, with a good Sunday-school of 75 and an active Christian Endeavor society. Bro. J. C. Lappin is the much loved and efficient pastor.

Paris has one of the strongest churches in the state. It is probably not conscious of its strength, but it will come to itself some of these times and find itself a "living link" to the great enterprises of the church. It has already begun in the larger life. It probably has the best house of worship that we have in the state. Its various departments are unusually strong and active. This is the home of Leroy Wiley and A. J. Baber, who greatly aided Eureka college in its early life and have been lifelong friends. With such men as these and the Augustuses, Shepherds, Arthurs, Millers, Likins and others, there ought to be a great future before it. D. N. Wetzel, a graduate of Eureka college, recent state secretary of Wisconsin, now preaching for one of the Baltimore, Md., churches, was raised here. Finis Idleman, of the class of 1900, since our minister at Dixon, is engaged to begin work at Paris July 1. This seems to me to be a very happy and promising combination. Brother Idleman is one of our most talented young men. H. M. Brooks, one of our most useful men in the state, lives at Paris and preaches regularly at Kansas and elsewhere. He is a kind of bishop of all the churches round about.

The church at Marshall was organized in the forties. Here J. W. Kilburn, our able minister of Keokuk, Iowa, was raised. Prof. M. N. Beeman preaches for the church and teaches in the high school. About 125 members constitute the church, which has a Sunday-school of 125, C. W. B. M. of 50, C. E. of 60 and Jr. C. E. of 40. An orphan is supported in Damoh, India. What a work a church can do if it will! There are 500 churches in Illinois apparently as well situated as Marshall. Why should not the church have as many as its own number in the Sunday-school, half its number in the C. E., and nearly half in the C. W. B. M.? This or better ought to be the normal condition of the church.

The little church at Maple Grove, near Chrisman, is ministered to by S. Sines, of Bethany, part of the time. The church is nearly twenty years old, has 50 members, a Sunday-school of 50 and a C. E. of 40. It has sent out perhaps about 50 of its number in past years to be helpers in other localities. Bro. A. Little is the patriarch of the church, and a noble man.

At Hume J. F. Hollingsworth ministers to a good, thriving church half time and at Brocton the other half. He is a young man of promise and the churches prosper under his care.

Chicago entertained the second district convention May 16. The district includes ten counties in the northeast part of the state. There are eight churches outside of Cook county none of which, I believe, were represented in the convention, and about thirty churches in Cook county most of which were represented in the convention some time during the day. The addresses were good, worthy to be heard by a much larger audience. There is no district in the state that has so great a problem or so promising a field before it as the second district. To an outsider the responsibilities and interests of such a field, and the efforts a district convention should make under such circumstances, merit a larger interest in the future of those in the district who love our Lord. But we remember that this is the second convention of the district, and doubtless much larger things await coming years. Chicago needs the sympathy, prayers and help of the whole state, and the time comes when we will be a great people in Chicago. It would be a pleasure to speak of the work on the north side under Bro. Bruce Brown's management, and of Austin under G. A. Campbell's ministry, but I had but little opportunity to learn the particulars of their life. A little time was kindly given at each place to speak concerning Christian education, and the message was received with manifest pleasure. Everything seems problematic in Chicago, and our people are going to solve them. So far as the education of the young people of the city is concerned, I see no wiser course if they want plenty of fresh air and healthful surroundings, strong character-making influences, thorough acquaintance with and development in the church of Christ, than to come early to Eureka college. Trained here and fitted for life's work, they would return to the city strong to battle with its influences, in which battle so many go down. May the Lord bless both young and old in the great conflict.

Northern California.

Mrs. Clara H. Hazelrigg has just closed a most successful meeting at Saratoga, with 33 accessions, and is now in a meeting at Pacific Grove. This is the last meeting that we have been able to hold her for, she having to return east. Every meeting has been a success, and the state board is justly proud of her work as state evangelist.

We are sailing along splendidly on our fourth thousand dollars for state missions, and hope to round it out by state meeting. Our missionaries are now well started on their 700 accessions on this year, and we look for that to be rounded out also.

The West Side in San Francisco are making great preparations for their dedication, May 29.

Still new preachers keep coming to the state, and we keep setting them at work, but I cannot promise work to any who are not already booked to be here by our state meeting. Only a few weak churches are not now provided for.

Our state convention is to be July 18-31, at Santa Cruz, and we look for fully 1,500 people in attendance, which will be 50 per cent greater than last year, and 100 to 300 per cent greater than two to five years ago.

The fruit season is beginning in earnest. The crop promises heavy in many localities, but light in others, owing to February and March rains de-pollenizing the trees while in bloom.

I have individually secured control of one of the best 800 acre orchards in the state for our Christian colony site. This will be cut up into 10 acre lots in June, and be ready by July 1 for our brethren to select their homes. Watch for advertisement in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST by the first or second issue in June. I have nothing to sell, but have secured control of this tract by agreeing to become personally responsible for a certain amount of advertising. More about this later.

Our state convention will be unique, in that one-fourth of our ministers are new men in the state. R. E. McKnight, lately from Cisco, Texas, is supplying at Galt until state meeting. W. W. Pew is supplying at Concord until state meeting, and we hope a mutual attachment will spring up to hold them there. E. T. Nesbit will spend his three months' vacation from school work with the Brentwood church. Wish others might do in like manner. It is quite probable that before this is in print, B. B. Burton will have been called to Healdsburg. J. P. DARGITZ, Cor. Sec.

Healdsburg.

New England.

A. L. Ward, of Arcadia, Ind., has accepted the pastorate of the Boston church. He began work May 22. Preparations are in progress for his "recognition," which will take place some time in June. Brother Ward was educated at Butler university. He graduated from that institution in 1898. He then spent several years at the University of Chicago, doing post graduate work. While there he was pastor of our church at Remington, Ind. He afterwards went to Lawrence, Kansas, and recently substituted for Brother Luther E. Sellers at Terre Haute, Ind., while Brother Sellers was in Palestine. Brother Ward is a young man of excellent ability. He is an able preacher and a good pastor. We are glad to welcome him to New England. He will be a valuable addition to our ministerial forces.

Miss Ella Lewis, of Pittsboro, Ind., a graduate of the school of pastoral helpers, has begun work in the First church, Worcester, Mass., of which Dr. J. M. Van Horn is pastor. One of the leading members of the church in writing of her says: "She is a young woman of pleasing address, good education and evident sincerity, and her welcome among us has been hearty and pronounced."

Hall L. Calhoun will leave Haverhill, Mass., June 1. C. W. Cauble will leave Masstown, R. I., at the same time. Wm. Pearn left S. Lubec and E. Machias, Me., on May 23. Thus it is. Preachers come and go. It can be truly said that the New England brethren listen to a procession of preachers. This is not for the best good of our churches, but under the circumstances it is the best we can do. We hope the day is not far distant when we can get sufficient aid to keep good men with our weak churches until they are self supporting.

G. A. REINL, Cor. Sec. of New England.

A NOTRE DAME LADY'S APPEAL

To all knowing sufferers of rheumatism, whether muscular or of the joints, sciatica, lumbagos, backache, pains in the kidneys or neuralgia pains, to write to her for a home treatment which has repeatedly cured all of these tortures. She feels it her duty to send it to all sufferers FREE. You cure yourself at home as thousands will testify—no change of climate being necessary. This simple discovery banishes uric acid from the blood, loosens the stiffened joints, purifies the blood, and brightens the eyes, giving elasticity and tone to the whole system. If the above interests you, for proof address Mrs. M. Summers, Box 183, Notre Dame, Ind.

Now is the Time to Visit Hot Springs, Arkansas, via the Iron Mountain Route.

The season at the great National Health and Pleasure Resort is in full blast. Climate unsurpassed. Hot Springs Special leaves St. Louis daily at 8:20 p. m., making the run in less than twelve hours. Three other fast trains daily. Handsome descriptive literature can be obtained free by calling on, or addressing our City Ticket Agent, S. E. Cor. 6th & Olive Sts., St. Louis.

The Ohio Convention.

Ohio Disciples have just closed the 29th annual convention of the C. W. B. M. and the 52nd anniversary of the O. C. M. S. In point of things done, this was a fine convention. As usual the women had the first part, from Monday afternoon to Tuesday night. Their program was an extra good one, with such speakers as Mrs. Louise Kelley, of Emporia, Kan., Miss Mattie Burgess and Henry J. Derthick. Mrs. Princess Long was in charge of the music and her solos held the people with marked power. The usual Monday afternoon reception was given, which the Cleveland ladies did in great style. The report of the women was summarized as follows:

Auxiliaries organized and reorganized...	25
Membership of new auxiliaries.....	421
Number of auxiliaries reported in state..	220
Membership of same.....	5161
Number of Missionary Tidings taken by members.....	1865
Money sent to national treasury.....	$14,122 31
Money sent to state treasury.....	2,384 62
Total raised in the state for C. W. B. M. work.....	16,506 93
Received for sale of leaflet C. W. B. M. day exercises.....	60 57
Number of auxiliaries observing C. W. B. M. day.....	123
Number of auxiliaries on Honor Roll.....	93
Amount of money raised on C. W. B. M. days reported.....	$1,005 09

There were ninety-three auxiliaries on the honor roll. This was the best by far of any year. Certificates were given in recognition for this. A delightful reception was given to the state and district officers by Mrs. A. R. Teachout at her home on Prospect street Tuesday evening. The Ohio women are growing in grace and numbers all the time. The official roster was changed somewhat. The new officers are: President, Mrs. M. J. Grable, Cleveland; vice-president, Mrs. L. T. Wheeler, Akron; corresponding secretary, Miss Mary A. Lyons, Hiram; treasurer, Mrs. Lizzie Robbins, Cleveland; superintendent young people's work, Miss Kate Teachout, Cleveland.

The sessions of the O. C. M. S. began on Tuesday night. The first thing was the report of the board, submitted by Secretary Bartlett. The report was a good one and showed a fine year's work. The summaries were as follows:

SUMMARY OF LABOR.

Number of men employed.....	50
Number of days of service.....	11,476
Number of sermons.....	3,869
Number of conversions.....	668
Number of other additions.....	563
Number of churches assisted.....	69
Number of churches organized.....	6
Number of conventions held.....	23

We wish to call special attention to the above summary of labor, as we consider it above the average. Last year we had 244 baptisms; this year 668, a gain over last year of 424. Last year we had 321 other additions; this year 563, a gain of 242. Our total additions last year were 565; this year 1,231. Dividing the number of days of labor by 366, the number of days in this year, we find that we have employed labor amounting to the time of one man for 31 1/3 years, with an average of 40 additions a year. This, we think, is considerably above the work of the average pastor and gives a splendid showing of the effectiveness of our missionary forces.

FINANCIAL EXHIBIT.

Collections from churches and individuals for general work.....	$10,505 07
Interest on trust funds.....	1,617 66
District building funds.....	1,545 00

Total collections.....	$13,799 10
Borrowed money.....	2,100 00
Total receipts.....	$15,899 10
DISBURSEMENTS.
Paid to A. Teachout, treasurer.....	$14,060 18
Held in trust fund treasury, Burnet fund account.....	293 92
Paid district building funds.....	1,545 00
	$15,899 10

OHIO'S CONTRIBUTION TO ALL MISSION WORK.

So far as we are able to gather the statistics, Ohio disciples made the following contributions to mission work during the past year:

Foreign for year ending Sept. 30, 1903.....	$32,301 57
Home missions for the year ending Sept. 30, 1903.....	17,371 13
Ministerial relief for the year ending Sept. 30, 1903.....	657 53
C. W. B. M. national fund for year ending Sept. 30, 1903.....	12,282 69
Church extension for year ending Sept. 30, 1903.....	4,976 44

Total for mission work beyond our borders.....	$67,589 36
C. W. B. M. for state work.....	2,384 62
O. C. M. S. for state work.....	13,799 10

Grand total for all mission work.....$83,773 08

It will be seen from this summary that Ohio Disciples offered last year for missions about $1 per head. We claim 83,000 noses, and it will be observed that we offered a little over $83,000. That does well comparatively, but yet how small it is!

M. L. Bates, the president, was unable to be present, and in his stead the first vice-president, J. A. Lord, presided and made the president's address on "A Multiplied Ministry."

Wednesday morning was given to Ohio missions and was first looked at from the standpoint of the city by J. O. Shelburne, evangelist of Hamilton county. His was a good address and won for him a warm place in the Ohio fellowship. C. A. Freer led a conference on notable offerings for Ohio missions. This was participated in by Crites, Moninger, Allison, Reynolds, Welsheimer, Sala and Darsie. T. L. Lowe, of Athens, gave an address on "The County Seats." He said, "The real danger of a 'disappearing brotherhood' lies in the Disciples who are constantly disappearing in the towns and unreached county seats." B. S. Denny came down from Iowa and gave us a fine address on state missions. His story of the man who forgot his wife not only brought down the house, but enforced the point of his speech. We shall be glad to hear him again.

Alcinous Baker talked intelligently of "The Country Church." A part of his message was this: "Nine-tenths of all our ministers and the greater part of the officers of the city churches are country born. We must save the country if we save the city. Combine or die is the alternative of our country churches."

W. S. Priest, of Columbus, was forcible and eloquent on "Our Objective Point" on Wednesday night. A very unique address was given by Judge Webber, of Elyria, on "Conscience and Christian Living." He made the young preachers feel like 30 cents, and paid a glowing tribute to the old guard. Attorney Folk, of St. Louis, furnished the judge his text. By the grace of the voters Judge Webber expects to be in the next congress as a Republican representative, but he said if the Democrats had to have a president he was in favor of Folk.

Jabez Hall came from Indianapolis to plead for the welfare of the old preachers, and right well did he do it. This subject always touches a tender place in our hearts. The address of Sumner T. Martin on "Proportionate Giving" was fine and ordered printed in the Ohio Work and put in tract form for general use. To say that W. P. Bentley, Geo. W. Muckley and G. W. Ranshaw pleaded for foreign missions, church extension and home missions respectively is to tell what they said.

Prof. Wakefield in his inimitable style brought a message on "Young Men for the Ministry." No man says wiser things or is heard more carefully than our greatly beloved Wakefield.

The speechmaking was all of a high order and well received. The nominating committee brought in the following report: President, A. M. Harvuot; first vice-president, P. H. Welsheimer; second vice-president, A. Baker; recording secretaries, Scott Cook and F. D. Draper; corresponding secretary, S. H. Bartlett; treasurer, A. Teachout; superintendent of Christian Endeavor, J. H. Dodd; superintendent of education, John Munro. The clans will gather a year hence at Newark. This is an ideal location. It is central and easily reached and has abundant facilities for taking care of the convention.

THINGS DROPPED AND PICKED UP.

The Netz sisters sang, and sang, and the more they sang the more the people wanted them to sing. They are surely richly endowed.

The enrollment reached 550. This was not up to the year before by about 50, but it was fine.

W. H. Alford, of Ladoga, Ind., has taken the church at Marietta. We shall welcome him and wish for him a great work in that, the oldest city of Buckeyedom.

Southern Ohio gains another preacher in the person of H. A. Blake, who comes from Philadelphia to Rutland. He began last Sunday.

There was a pervading spirit of greater things. Raise the apportionment, was the cry everywhere. So let it be.

Prof. Thomas, of Hiram, got everybody to sing. The Hackleman Music Co. furnished the convention with "Sing His Praise."

Ohio gets a new Darsie June 1. This one comes from Pueblo, Col. He is Clyde Darsie and will edify the church at Bowling Green.

J. Z. Tyler was in the midst of his brethren, the happiest man of the convention if not the sprightliest.

M. B. Ryan and William Kraft will help advise on the advisory committee for pastorless churches and churchless pastors this year.

Kleeberger will Sunday-school again this year. He fits in this place exactly.

F. M. Green mourns the loss of his excellent wife who died on the 67th anniversary of her birth. She died May 19. She leaves a father 94 years old and a mother 87 who have been married 69 years. Brother Green has the profoundest sympathy of the brethren everywhere.

The convention was saddened while in session to hear of the death of Harrison Jones at his home in Alliance. Brother Jones was the last charter member of the O. C. M. S. Just a year ago his wife died. He has been a unique character, and withal a very useful man. He made friends of everybody, and by his incessant wit kept everybody in a good humor. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.

Among the new men in the state were W. S. Priest, J. H. Dodd, Clark Braden, Edgar D. Jones and E. C. Harris.

The Hiram people had a delightful banquet on Wednesday evening at which about 125 spent a delightful time.

Wilbur F. Crafts, superintendent of the national bureau of reform, brought a helpful and inspiring message. He is a genius in his line of work.

Fraternal greetings were sent to the national Baptist convention that was meeting in Cleveland at the same time.

The closing address was by S. L. Darsie, of Jackson avenue church, Chicago. Brother Darsie was pastor for ten years in Cleveland, and was therefore at home. "The Conquest of the City" was presented in a masterly way.

W. F. Rothenberger reports 53 additions at Ashtabula since Jan. 1. They are now remodeling the house of worship, which will double the capacity.

There is no finer fellowship on earth than among the Ohio Disciples. They really love each other. They have made a great history in Ohio, but the things to be done and the things that will be done will make more glorious history than even that which we have made. May God help us to see and improve our opportunity. C. A. FREER.

Christian College Commencement. Columbia, Mo.

The most prosperous year in the history of this splendid institution has just closed. Sunday evening I preached the baccalaureate sermon, and Wednesday evening Prof. W. D. McClintock, of Chicago, delivered the commencement address.

There were 140 in attendance in the different courses and fifty-two graduates. These young ladies came from England and nearly every state.

The past year the college was entirely under the control of the president, Mrs. W. T. Moore. Her management of all the great interests of the college and her discipline is most remarkable. Everything moves along as smoothly as if it were one large family. We did not see or hear the least discord. We were constantly asking ourselves, "How does she do so many things, do them all with perfect ease and composure, and without friction?"

We should not overlook, as one factor in the remarkable discipline of the school, the loyal support and hearty co-operation of her splendid faculty, between whom there is perfect accord.

Many times we heard affectionate mention made of Mrs. St. Clair, who has been so long connected with Christian college, but who has been loaned to Hamilton college, at Lexington, Ky., for awhile, at which place she is doing a great work for the higher education of young women.

There are some facts connected with the management of this honored and historic institution, during the eight years that Mrs. Moore and Mrs. St. Clair have been in control, that should be known to the brotherhood, in justice to them and the college.

Eight years ago there was a large debt against Christian college, and the outlook for its payment was rather discouraging. Under this condition, the trustees thought best to place the school in the hands of Mrs. Moore and Mrs. St. Clair, provided they would assume the debt and put $15,000 worth of improvements on the buildings. This they did. They worked by faith. Without going into details, you ought to know that they went ahead and put in improvements to the amount of $75,000. The greater part has already been paid, and much of it out of the personal property of these noble women, and the entire property they deeded to the brotherhood, with only two conditions: that it should never be used for any other purposes than that for which it is now used, and should never be mortgaged. That is a great work. Thus the brotherhood is placed in possession of one of the best equipped colleges for the Christian education of young women west of the Alleghenies.

The new buildings are models. The chapel is a beautiful structure, seated with chairs, accommodating 1,200 people. The rooms in the main buildings are arranged in suites, to accommodate two pupils, one room being for the bed room, the other a study and sitting room. Then there are the library and the art gallery, gymnasium, parlors, reception rooms, and on the roof of the chapel is a roof garden, furnished with mats. All this is located in the midst of a sixteen acre plot of ground, shaded with grand old forest trees and ornamented with shrubbery. No wonder the young ladies are happy amidst such surroundings, with superior teachers in all the various arts and sciences that go to make up the training of an accomplished lady.

Dr. Moore's perpetual good humor sheds sunshine through the entire institution, so that the girls all often seek a word from him.

It was a surprise and a great pleasure to meet there W. S. Dickinson, of Cincinnati, who has long been one of the liberal spirits of the Christian church, helping in every good work, a fast friend to the preacher. And it was equally pleasing to meet Frank Coop and wife, leaders in our work in England, who had come to this country to visit friends and see their daughter, Miss Ellen, graduate with honors at Christian college.

We met many old friends and some new ones, whose acquaintance is highly prized.

The few days spent at Christian college commencement, go now to make one of the pleasant memories of life.

State Mission Notes.

This is almost the last chance I shall have to reach our people before the state convention. Everything is promising for a great attendance. A great aid for this would be for the churches to say to their preachers, "Go to the state convention." If they will accompany this mandate with the money needed to pay expenses and the assurance that his time will go on just the same, he will be sure to go. And why not? It is to the interest of the cause of Christ in Missouri that we have a great convention. Our congregations ought to be, and usually are, large visioned and unselfish enough to make sacrifices for the good of the cause in the state. Be sure that your preacher comes and that some of the church comes with him to see that he sits up in front.

Have you sent your name to E. H. Kellar, at Carrollton, telling him you are coming to the convention? If not, be sure you do it now. This is but a courtesy that you owe to the church at Carrollton. Did you read carefully the instructions in regard to railroad rates? If not, now is the time to do it. Ask your agent if he has instructions. The rate is one and one-third fare for the round trip. Are you undecided about going to the convention? Read the program again; you may find something that will help you to decide. If you come it will not only do you good, but it will help others. If you have never attended a state convention try it this year, then you will go again.

One preacher writes: "Yes, I am coming to the state convention and shall bring others with me. Has my congregation sent its offering?" That letter is a good text. It has a good natural division. 1. He is coming himself. Something every preacher should do.

How can he persuade others if he comes not himself? 2. He will bring others. Why not? If it is good for him, helps him, it will be good for others, help them. The faithful preacher will desire and work for that which is best for his people. 3. He is interested in the state at large. "Has my congregation sent its offering?" He is not indifferent in this matter. He wants his congregation enlisted; he is not satisfied till he is assured that his congregation has done its duty. How many preachers need to ask this question? Many do not because they know their congregations have done their duty by this great work; these are the men for whom the secretary thanks God every day, strong, faithful, true men of God; the strength, the stay, the hope of the cause of Christ in Missouri.

Others there are, too, just as faithful, just as dependable, who have not yet been able to reach the offering, but will before the convention meets. So many interests press upon the church at this time of the year, all calling for immediate attention, and will have attention, but it takes time. Then there has not for a good while been a season with as many bad weather Sundays. Churches have time and again set the time for the offering and the rains have come and made it impossible. These will yet come; they are not neglectful or indifferent; they will come to the front.

Let me drop this word, that the time is short, the necessity pressing, the demand great, and instant, liberal, generous action is imperative. We ought to hear from 300 churches in the next 20 days.

Echoes From the May Offering.

As an illustration of the way the people in some of our mission churches give, one of our missionaries writes as follows: "There is a young man here, the one I baptized the night you preached, who froze his feet last winter and was about two months in the hospital. When he came away he was unable yet to go to work. As he had no home or friends to whom he could go we took him in for about two months. Last week he went to work and earned between $3 and $4; after paying his board he paid 28 cts. into the church and $1 into the home offering."

I enclose $45 from the First Christian church, Charleston, Ill., for home missions; $44 from the church and $1 from the Christian Endeavor society. WM. F. SHAW.

The offering of this church last year was $25—we note the splendid gain in the offering this year.

Enclosed find check for $50, which credit to the church at this place.

Pendleton, Ore. W. H. HAWLEY, Treas.

The above is cause for rejoicing from the fact that the Pendleton church was a mission point of the American Christian missionary society and just recently became self supporting. This certainly answers in the affirmative the question, "Do home missions pay?"

Cleburne, Texas, sends $17.50, an increase of $10 over last year.

Selma, Cal., sends $11.50.

Third church, Memphis, Tenn., sends $15, an increase of $10 over last year.

Washington, N. C., makes a gift of $36.50.

We rejoice that so many have fellowship in this blessed work.

Sacramento, Cal., makes an offering of $41.85, more than twice as much as last year.

North River chapel, Augusta, W. Va., sends an offering of $6.50. This is a total gain over last year. We are glad to see these churches coming into line for home missions.

One pastor reports an offering from 33 out of 200 members—what a magnificent gift they would have had to offer if the remaining 167 members had responded to the call. And what a blessing these 167 missed in neglecting to respond with their gift to help win America for our King.

Salina, Kansas, $50, full apportionment.

DAVID H. SHIELDS, pastor.

Hubbard, Ohio, $26.20. C. W. HAMMOND, missionary manager.

Haskell, Texas, $16.40. C. N. WILLIAMS, pastor.

Daisy May chapel, Ellenton, S. C., $16.80, more than three times as much as last year.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Are you going to Carrollton? Going to take the workers? Going as a body?

Former delegates to such gatherings at Carrollton need no assurance as to the hospitality to be extended or the entertainment to be given.

John Jones is the first county superintendent to report, it being early, but his report is the first ever had from Benton, and is fine in every respect, and if we could have similar co-operation from the other superintendents the work could be much easier prosecuted.

One of those pledging to our work at Joplin was a little lad eleven years old. Shortly after the convention he went to Colorado Springs, but now sends us his pledge in full with words of good cheer. Master Guy Head is one of our young friends of whom we are proud.

After opening up the good work just right at Sullivan, T. J. Head went to Rolla, and at last report the outlook was most favorable for the results so much needed for putting that congregation on its feet as a working force.

Lincoln Bible-school is in fine condition at the close of their campaign, with an increase of more than two-thirds the former membership, and all the school heartily enlisted in the efforts now for a great time on children's day, as every school in the state should be. Mrs. Olivia Hunt continues as superintendent, for the school appreciates her efficiency.

R. B. Havener has closed at Smithfield with 12 additions and another Bible-school, making two missions for Smithfield which, with the main school, are prospering.

W. A. Moore is making a canvass of Holt county, and good reports are coming to this office of the influence of his efforts, while the schools are making manifest their appreciation of his ability by the offerings going toward his support. This was so in Harrison and Worth also.

The Carrollton convention is a united one and no delegate if possible ought to fail to be at all the sessions of all the societies. Do this for your good and the good of your influence on others and the benefit to the session itself.

The Weaubleau Bible-school is larger than the congregation, which indicates what S. E. Hendrickson and others are doing in behalf of the youth of the community, as only about 12 schools in the state are in such standing.

Another church house, the work of this co-operation, will be dedicated more than likely this coming Sunday, at Bland, on the Kansas City extension of the Rock Island, making three new houses built by R. B. Havener's labors along this line of road. Brethren, are you surprised or worried at our urging you so constantly to help us keep such men in the field? It seems strange to us that you would not gladly help such men and such work, and the reports will show that many of the schools have and are doing so, but not nearly so many as should, especially of the schools that are able, but seem to do much for their own comfort and but little for "their neighbors." At least one hundred schools ought to remit an offering to us this week.

Cloverdale has Harry Reid for superintendent, with a membership of forty and, as in the past, they are going to help this work. J. Jones is their minister. H. F. DAVIS.

McMechen, West Virginia.

PASTOR'S REPORT.

A great many items of news concerning the very successful meetings recently held in McMechen have already been printed; I wish to add a few lines. This meeting began under adverse circumstances. The floods came, stopping the street cars, and preventing the people from attending; the weather was very bad and many were sick. After a few nights, the interest became very strong and the house packed, then the evangelist was taken sick with catarrhal pneumonia. He remained in bed during the day under the care of two or three physicians; in the evening he would be found at his post in the pulpit, proclaiming the "sweet old story." Every night many were made to see the error of their ways and came into the light. Interest increased and crowds were turned away from the church. Brother Mitchell is a true gospel preacher. He does not work on the feelings of the people by deathbed scenes and other such stories; but by God's word, teaches them to come to Christ, from a standpoint of principle.

I've been personally acquainted with him for several years and know him to be a consecrated man; one who knows how to organize his helpers and plan for the work, and who is willing to help a weak church to become strong. Let us try to keep him in West Virginia. He is at present at Manning-ton, W. Va., where a great work is being done. A permanent organization has been effected, a $3,750 lot purchased, and a handsome church will be built this summer.

J. W. UNDERWOOD.

EVANGELIST'S REPORT.

The meeting at McMechen closed with 216 additions. I saw on my arrival that the pastor, Bro. J. W. Underwood, had been doing some "resurrecting" work, and I followed that line for a few evenings. It counted, for the whole membership in a few evenings went to work in dead earnest in soul-saving. Brother Underwood is a fine yoke fellow, and an evangelist is sure to have success with his help. He is a strong preacher, loved by the entire community, and when he leaves Bethany college in June and moves to McMechen, we prophesy that he and his faithful wife do great things in the Lord's work there.

Our adversities revealed to us the bond of sweet fellowship existing among the neighboring churches. Brother Martin, of Bellaire, Brothers Ziegler and Scholes, of Wheeling, and Brothers Smith and Linkletter, of Moundsville, contributed their presence and help in a way that will always be appreciated by the evangelist, pastor and congregation at McMechen. CLARENCE DUMONT MITCHELL.

Children, the Gift of God.

By W. J. Russell.

Marriage is a sacred relationship, and it is a sacred hour when a child is born and laid in the arms of a young father and mother. It is the final seal upon their wedded love. It is the closing benediction of the marriage ceremony. It is the living link that holds husband and wife in the sweetest union. It is a crown and glory of all that marriage means.

"A dreary place would be this earth
Were there no little people in it,
The song of life would lose its mirth
Were there no children to begin it."

Children are the gift of God. Oh, how much happiness they bring into the world! A home without a child is like a garden without a flower. Among the beautiful definitions of babyhood I find the following: "A bursting bud on the tree of life." "The unconscious mediator between father and mother, and the focus of their hearts." "A quaint little craft called Innocence, laden with simplicity and love." "A tiny feather from the wing of love dropped into the sacred lap of motherhood." Byron says:

"A lovely being, scarcely formed or moulded,
A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded."

And our sweet singer of Michigan, Hattie A. Cooley, says:

"A strange white flower, its folded bloom
Enwrapped in such sweet human guise;
The double gift of God and love,
From some fair field beyond the skies."

Among the poems of George Mac Donald are the following pretty and playful lines called simply "The Baby"—

"Where did you come from, baby dear?
Out of the everywhere into here.

"Where did you get your eyes so blue?
Out of the skies as I came through.

"What makes your forehead smooth and high?
A soft hand stroked it as I went by.

"What makes your cheek like a warm white rose?
I saw something better than anyone knows.

"Whence that three-cornered smile of bliss?
Three angels gave me at once a kiss.

"Where did you get that coral ear?
God spoke, and it came out to hear.

"Where did you get those arms and hands?
Love made itself into bonds and bands.

"Whence came your feet, dear little things?
From the same box as the cherubs' wings.

"How did they all first come to be you?
God thought about me, and so I grew.

"But how did you come to us, you dear?
God thought about you, and so I am here."

Yes, God is thinking about our highest interests when he sends children to us. They are blessed little ministers. Their buoyant and rosy health, their artlessness and glee, win for them a place in our hearts which would be void without them. They are the sweetest episode of life's history. Would that none of human discords might mar them; then would their life song be one of angel sweetness. Years ago a little poem entitled "Angels in the House," floated about in the newspapers. It is a gem both in thought and versification, and is given here in full:

"Three pairs of dimpled arms, as white as snow,
Held me in soft embrace:

Three little cheeks, like velvet peaches soft,
Were placed against my face.

"Three tiny pairs of eyes, so clear, so deep,
Looking up in mine this even;

Three pairs of lips kissed me a sweet 'good-night,'
Three little forms from heaven.

"Ah, it is well that 'little ones' should love us;
It lights our faith when dim

To know that once our blessed Savior bade them
Bring 'little ones' to him!

"And said he not, 'Of such is heaven,' and blessed them,
And held them to his breast?

Is it not sweet to know that when they leave us,
'Tis there they go to rest?

"And yet, ye tiny angels of my house,
Three hearts incased in mine,

How 'twould be shattered, if the Lord should say,
'Those angels are not thine!'"

ing up to the importance of going into the great cities. It was not so a few years ago. We followed the line of least resistance, which sent us into the country places and smaller cities, but we soon saw that we were going to be left in the race unless we went into the cities. Here are the people and the institutions which shape the destiny of the nation, and unless we are strong in these centers we are going to be left in the race. In the four cities which I have mentioned there are strong unions of the Disciples of Christ, and these unions are looking to the matter of planting new churches and the enlarging and strengthening of the old ones, so there is to-day among our people a very strong movement toward the great cities. I believe it is in our hearts to do our part in taking these great centers of population for Christ and the church.

I need not tell you, dear friends, how glad we are to-night to be here and to look into your faces. It is good to get to work again. For fifteen months, you know, I have been resting and recuperating, and it has seemed a long time to keep quiet. I think the time will come when I shall realize that these months were the most important of my life. I have had time in quiet to pray over some of the problems of our people and think them through, and it seems to me to-night that the things that are worth while—the essential things—were never so clear to my mind as now. I cannot tell you with what eagerness I again take up the work and what an unspeakable privilege it seems to me now to be a minister and a witness for Jesus Christ. If it is to be our lot to labor with you here in this great city, I am very sure that we can count upon your prayers that our labors among you may redound to the good of the people and to the glory of God.

The Coming of Christian Union.

Methodists or drunkards? The choice is quickly made, and carries with it no implication that we do not deplore denominationalism. A choice between two evils is not an approval of either. Who of our membership would hesitate in a choice involving such great odds? Then why not act upon it?

Another source of misapprehension with some has been the name federation. To argue from the application of the word to governments that church federation must contain something authoritative is not legitimate. Here was a new form of co-operation that needed a name. As with new things generally there was no name in existence that exactly fitted it. The word "federation" fitted pretty well on its co-operative side, but carried a suggestion of something binding or authoritative; and yet it probably came nearer fitting than any other word. It was, therefore, chosen with the distinct qualification that the element of authority was not included. So defined, federation becomes simply a form of co-operation, and it is our duty so to recognize it till it belies that profession. It calls for the surrender of no right and subjection to no authority. Mr. Sanford distinctly says: "Whatever counsel may be given by a local federation, final decisions must be made by the parties interested," and that such a course will not affect the standing of those so doing; also, that co-operation in this movement would not be regarded as any endorsement of denominationalism on our part, or any compromise of our plea for unity. The way is open for us to enter into this work without according any recognition not long ago accorded, without sacrificing any principle and with great benefit to our cause as a people.

The religious peoples about us are not going to disband to-day nor to-morrow. Christian union is to come by a growing together and final coalescence. Co-operation in service is the most effective means of promoting such growth. Federation is a stage in this growth, springing from the same Christ-spirit that has inspired all previous forms of co-operation. God forbid that we should arrest this onward course of divine fulfillment. To do so would involve the loss of many souls and be a blow to our cause as a people.

The hope of Israel was the coming of the kingdom of God, but because it did not come in the way the Jews had expected they rejected it and slew the King. We have been preaching and praying for Christian union for a century. Let us not make the Jews' mistake, and because it does not come in our own little way slay it in its coming.

M. L. BUCKLEY.

Harrison, O., May 25.

ARKANSAS.

Bentonville.—Our tabernacle meeting starts off encouragingly. A. W. Shaffer, of Kansas, is a fine leader of song. Brother Famuliner is a helpful and useful young minister. A fine interest is growing. We confidently expect a great ingathering.—D. D. BOYLE, evangelist.

Bentonville, May 29.—A week or two ago it was reported in some of our religious papers that D. D. Boyle and A. W. Shaffer, singing evangelist, were in a meeting at Springdale, Neb. This was a mistake. They are here in a meeting ten days old; interest is increasing and the power of the simple gospel is beginning to tell. The time was when the work did not look hopeful here, but now everything is brighter and much interest is manifested. This no doubt will become a very strong church soon; there have been four confessions so far; two of these are among our leading business men, and a number more are on the verge of joining. We have built a tabernacle which has a seating capacity of 700 or 800 people; hundreds of interested hearers are coming each evening who have never heard our plea before.—J. W. FAMULINER.

CALIFORNIA.

Berkeley, May 24.—Baptized two at Alexander Valley last Sunday night—three since last report. Work is in good condition there. Prospects for many more to be added. We have just closed a two weeks' meeting at Hopland, Cal., where I preach twice a month. Bro. Otha Wilkison, of Ukiah, did the preaching during the meeting. There were six splendid accessions—all by confession and baptism.—J. E. HOOD.

Whittier.—Our meeting closed with 25 accessions and 18 confessions. Very much good was done. R. H. Bateman, pastor, is a fine man.—R. L. McHATTON, Santa Rosa.

COLORADO.

Cripple Creek.—S. M. Bernard, of Boulder, assisted in a fourteen days' meeting, resulting in fourteen additions, a general awakening of the church, an increase in the minister's salary, a general good feeling except in the camp of Satan, which received a shaking up at the hand of the evangelist.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Washington, May 23.—Six additions reported at the ministers' meeting Monday, five by baptism, one from the Baptists. The writer has just closed a short meeting in Alexandria, Va., resulting in organizing a church with 14 charter members. This is our first organization in this historic city. We hope soon to have a strong church there. The writer preached a special sermon and raised enough money Lord's day afternoon to put the 34th street Christian church of this city out of debt. On Lord's day, July 12, the writer will dedicate the new house of worship at Gilmore, Va.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR.

INDIANA.

Marion, May 19.—Work at the Tabernacle church is moving nicely. Four baptisms since last report. We are planning for a great children's day. J. M. Stewart is our live superintendent, and is putting the Sunday-school in fine working order. We had Mrs. Princess Long, May 13. All who heard her requested her to return. Mrs. Long was ably assisted by her husband, who is improving in health.—W. S. BUCHANAN.

Elwood, May 24.—Last Sunday was a regular evangelistic day with us. Six came forward in the morning service, five were confessions, two sets of young lady sisters. All splendid people. Large attendance now and good interest. I deliver the memorial address to the G. A. R. next Sunday, and in the afternoon deliver another memorial address at Point Isabel, seven miles north of city. Am kept very busy spring days.—L. C. HOWE, minister.

Muncie, May 28.—Chas. E. Shultz and Le Roy St. John closed a very successful meeting at the Central church, resulting in fifteen additions and a general awakening. Bro. C. E. Shultz is a young preacher whose work is highly commendable. His sermons throughout the meeting were very pleading and winning. He is an earnest worker and a consecrated man; he is also a good organizer and knows how to direct his forces and keep them busy.—LE ROY ST. JOHN, singing evangelist, Terre Haute, Ind.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Tishomingo, May 23.—There were two additions by letter at Roff yesterday and one here the third Lord's day.—E. S. ALLHANDS.

IOWA.

Delta, May 24.—Since the first Lord's day in April, there have been seven additions to the church at this place, one by confession and baptism and six by letter.—H. A. PALISTER.

Coggon, May 24.—Two more added by statement at regular service Sunday.—BERT W. SALMON, minister.

Davenport, May 28.—My family is now with me and we are getting well into the work. There have been 33 additions in all since I came, we raised our apportionment for foreign and home missions and are making active preparations for children's day.—A. MARTIN.

KANSAS.

Oswego, May 23.—All well; largest school since September; natural growth; a fine young man has come to us from the Baptists. Blind Boon, a thorough Disciple, spoke to us last night on faith, hope, charity, much to the uplift of all. Everything is prosperous in Kansas.—R. H. TANKSLEY, pastor.

Douglass, May 23.—Two additions by letter yesterday at the morning service; more are expected soon.—C. E. F. SMITH.

Kanopolis, May 28.—Held meetings at Junction City and organized a New Testament reading circle. Preached one night at Carneiro and organized a New Testament reading circle. Held a few more services at Sutphen, confirming more fully the young converts. Preached several times at Grinnell and organized a New Testament reading circle and am now preaching at this place. If any of the readers would like to organize a New Testament reading circle in your town or community write me, sending stamps for soliciting cards, etc., and you can do a good work.—THOS J. EASTERWOOD.

KENTUCKY.

Bowling Green, May 25.—We closed a most successful meeting of 12 days at the Tenth street church. The interest was splendid from the very first to the last service. Immediate results were 49 added. R. H. Crossfield, of Owenboro, did the preaching. He preached the old apostolic faith and doctrine simply, clearly and attractively. Brother Crossfield was with this congregation about four years ago in a series of meetings, during which there were 40 added. All agree that his last was the best. He will always be held in grateful remembrance by this church.—WM. T. WELLS, pastor.

Frankfort, May 27.—We recently closed a ten days' meeting in which Pres. Burris A. Jenkins, of Lexington, did the preaching, with 41 additions in all, 33 by baptism. The preaching was strong, winning and evangelical, and our entire community was greatly delighted with it and edified by it. The church is much refreshed and encouraged in all its work.—GEORGE DARSIE.

LOUISIANA.

Alexandria, May 23.—The tent meeting is booming; last night the tent was crowded to its utmost capacity and many were standing on the outside. Brother Haddock is giving them the plain old gospel. We have an orchestra of ten pieces and the music is good.—TALMAGE STANLEY.

MISSOURI.

Willow Springs, May 24.—The revival meeting which has been running for the past four weeks closed Sunday night with a crowded house and one baptism. In all 31 were added to the church, 26 by confession and baptism. The meeting had been running about 10 days with 10 additions, when we called Bro. E. W. Yocum, of Mountain Grove, to assist us. Brother Yocum is an earnest, fearless preacher of the gospel of Christ. The church is moving forward along all lines. A Junior society of 36 members has been organized and is doing splendid work under the leadership of Mrs. W. E. Gray.—W. E. GRAY, pastor.

Springfield, May 20.—Brother Burr, of Kansas City, with his most estimable family, has located at West Plains, where he has accepted the work, which is starting off splendidly. Brother Gray, recently of Nebraska, is in a meeting at Willow Springs, assisted by E. W. Yocum, of Mountain Grove. Brother Yocum is a good evangelist. Twenty have been buried in baptism. Brother Gray is the pastor, and is loved by all. Brother Horton is the pastor at Seymour; the work is in fine condition at that place. The writer is visiting the churches in the interest of state work. Remember, the books close the middle of June.—JOSEPH GAYLOR.

Hannibal, May 25.—Prof. C. M. Sharpe preached the baccalaureate sermon in the Christian church to the high school last Sunday. The auditorium and Sunday-school room were filled and standing room was used. It was pronounced a very able discourse and most appropriate to the occasion. He preached a fine sermon in the evening, and on Monday night gave his lecture on the "Everlasting Jew" to a large and appreciative audience. Brother Sharpe has made a number of responsive friends for the Bible college. The pastor has just begun his ninth year of service for this church. Next Sunday he will preach the baccalaureate sermon for Pritchett college at Glasgow, Mo. The church enjoys a steady growth.—LEVI MARSHALL.

Liberty, May 24.—There was one confession here Sunday night by a young man who is a student at William Jewell college.—ROBT. G. FRANK.

Maryville, May 28.—I am here conducting a Sunday-school song revival, which will continue over children's day. This is something that is needed in many of our Sunday-schools. W. D. Alkire, the wide-awake superintendent, is always doing something to better his school, consequently it is excelled by none.—L. D. SPRAGUE, gospel singer.

California, May 27.—Baptized two young ladies at our meeting last Friday evening. Evangelists Clarke and Burnett, of Indianapolis, will begin a series of meetings Lord's day morning, May 29, in the Christian church here, from which we hope for great results.—S. J. VANCE, pastor.

Cameron, May 25.—Since my last report there have been eleven additions to the Cameron church—seven by confession and baptism, one reclaimed and three by letter.—RICHARD WALLACE.

NEBRASKA.

Geneva, May 23.—Closed Sunday night with 56 additions, 12 from M. E.'s, and over 40 baptisms. Commence at Ashland, June 9. Permanent address, Bethany Heights, Lincoln, Neb.—AUSTIN and McVEY.

Benkelman, May 28.—I shall assist Bro. I. H. Fuller in a meeting at Lenox, Ia., in September. Would be pleased to make engagements for other Iowa meetings. Address me at Benkelman.—CHARLES E. McVAY, singing evangelist.

NEW YORK.

Buffalo, May 25.—Last Lord's day a young M. E. preacher was received into the Jefferson street church of Christ. He took this step after a prayerful and careful consideration of our position as a religious people, spending several hours in my study with an open Bible on his knee. He is a good cornetist and can sing quite well. Lives with his mother, who will accompany him wherever he locates. Any church or churches desiring to locate a pastor, write me at 175 Laurel St.—B. S. FERRALL.

OHIO.

Greenwich, May 23.—Two additions by letter at our service yesterday morning. Large Sunday-school attendance, and fine audiences both morning and evening. An appreciative audience heard the lecture on "Christian Science" in the evening. This was the second of my Sunday night series on "Modern Religions." The next will be "Mormonism."—T. E. WINTER, pastor.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Shawnee.—I report four additions to the church here.—GRANVILLE SNELL.

OREGON.

Honolulu, May 5.—Our short meeting at Brownsville, Oregon, closed with 31 additions. We are now en route to New Zealand and Australia. Hold one meeting in the former and two in the latter country. Expect to return in time for the national convention. All churches wanting to arrange for campaigns for Christ for the fall and winter address us at once at Auckland, New Zealand, or correspond with A. M. Haggard, dean of Bible college, Drake university, Des Moines, Iowa.—O. E. HAMILTON, general evangelist, FRANK A. WILKINSON, singing evangelist.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Erie, May 24.—We have had four additions: three by baptism and one by letter. Will double our gift to home missions.—F. A. WRIGHT.

Perryopolis, May 23.—Our meeting began here yesterday with the reopening of the house of worship after the expenditure of over $1,600 in improvements. Bro. J. M. Bell, the son of the editor of the Leader, is the minister and to him credit is largely due for the success of the work. Brother Bell is a mere boy, but gives promise of becoming one of our greatest preachers. Two by confession yesterday.—R. A. OMER.

TEXAS.

Garland, May 23.—We had one addition by reinstatement last night.—CHAS. CHASHEN.

Abilene, May 23.—With Theo. Fitz as singer I have just closed a little meeting here in which there were 17 additions and $600 raised to liquidate the indebtedness. This church will now employ a minister. I return to Greenville to-day to prepare for the convention which meets there June 6-10.—J. W. HOLAPPLE.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Parkersburg, May 23.—Two confessions yesterday. Work prospers.—J. D. HULL.

Membership in an Epworth League.

DEAR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—Your communication and advice to those who, like myself, do not have church privileges with the church of Christ, was very interesting to me. It reminded me of how I came at one time to join an Epworth League.

When I first came out to this western country I found myself where there was no Christian church, but a handful of Methodists had an organization and a church, and I thought I would co-operate with them as far as I could conscientiously do so in their work.

After a while an evangelist from Denver came and held a revival meeting and enthused us all to renewed efforts for the Master. The Methodist minister in charge was a young man, and after the meeting was over he proposed that we organize an Epworth League, for the benefit of the young people especially. I do not know much about such an organization, but he told us that it was strictly undenominational and that all parties, whether they were members of any or of no church, would constitute this league, and that thus, all working together, we would do untold good.

At last I consented, and everybody (both saint and sinner) became members and went to work with a will to make it a success. And we did have rousing meetings and fine interest. But after a while the presiding elder came, and before he left took occasion to speak some good words to the league. He expressed himself as very well pleased that this league had been established. "But," said he, "you must not lose sight of what an Epworth League is, for it is to make Methodists of those who are not, and to make better Methodists of those who are such."

Poor Epworth League! It never had another meeting. The elder had killed it outright.

Afterwards, when the M. E. church had grown so as to have a league, they had one, but I never joined; neither do I go to its meetings.

Unfortunately I have never had the good fortune to be near a church of my own choice, and if it had not been for the dear old CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST I think I should long ago have given up. I am never more happy than when on Sunday morning I have an hour or two with its bright, clean pages all to myself. Many a time the tears come to my eyes and my heart swells with gratitude at the glorious work of the brotherhood, even though I never get nearer to it than in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is doing a grand, a glorious work. May it continue forever is the prayer of

Your brother in Christ,
C. A. YERSIN.

An Eastern View of Western Civilization.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—I want to call the attention of my brethren of the ministry to a little book I have recently read. I am always thankful for help of this kind, and I am sure any thoughtful man who has not read this book, and is led to do so by my suggestion, will thank me for it. The title page of the book bears this inscription: "Letters from a Chinese Official, Being an Eastern View of Western Civilization." New York. McClure, Phillips & Co.

The writer declares his purpose in the following sentence: "It is my object to promote a juster estimate of my countrymen and their policy by explaining, as far as I am able, the way in which we regard western civilization, and the reasons we have for desiring to exclude its influences."

Very truly yours, L. E. MURRAY.

[The little book is well worth reading, but the reader must remember that the author gives the best side of oriental life, and does not uncover its pagan abominations.—EDITOR.]

In an Isle of the Sea.

It is now some time since the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST had anything to say to its readers about Jamaica. At the time of our cyclonic disaster last August it was good enough to represent our case and to plead our cause. Partly as a result some generous help was given, for which those who received it are grateful. Doubtless that event, calamitous though it was, caused the island to be better known than it was before; and, doubtless, some kindly interest was awakened in our condition and welfare. We cannot expect that a small place and a poor people should engage much attention or thought in the great world. There are, however, some who are interested in Jamaica on account of the Christian work that has been carried on here so long, in connection with which so much good has been accomplished and which still needs nurture and prayer. The hurricane of last year gave us a serious set-back in all interests. Of course the finances of the island have suffered seriously. Business has been greatly hampered; the exports have fallen off fully one-third; ordinary food stuffs have been so scarce that famine has stared many of our people in the face, and the death rate has materially increased. Of course all this has had a depressing effect on all interests, and, not least, on the religious life of the people. Scarcity of food, shortness of clothing and destitution of money do not tend to promote church giving, and seriously retard church work. And then a very large number of church buildings and school houses were destroyed, which have, as yet, been only partially restored, and a large number of the people are still in houses and huts that afford them very insufficient and partial protection. However, things are looking decidedly brighter and more hope inspiring.

During the first two months of the present year the various church synods, unions and conventions were summing up the work of the past year and looking over their position. In some respects all had similar facts to report and lamentations to make; yet the spiritual aspects of the work appeared to be better than might have been expected. For ourselves, in our little mission, though we "be least among the thousands of Israel," while our receipts fell off in our twenty-two churches by about $155, our membership increased by about 100 persons. The Baptists with their over 30,000 members had an increase of more than 200. The Episcopalians, with about 200 churches and over 70 clergymen, while able to point to some very marked evidences of advance, were bemoaning the fact that, as regards the number of "communicant members," they occupy much the same place that they did more than thirty years ago, when the church was disestablished in this island. It is well known that the number of "confirmations" performed by their very zealous archbishop and assistant are very large, so that there must be great failure or leakage somewhere.

The Wesleyan Methodists, with over 21,000 members and 42 ministers, while vigorously prosecuting their work, have had to take a step backward. They had assumed a degree of independence and self-support, but have found themselves unable to meet their financial responsibilities. They have, this year, gone back to the British conference with a debt of $300,000 which the conference has kindly assumed and taken over control of the mission. No doubt our friends here breathe more freely, though obliged to confess their financial weakness.

The Presbyterians have 112 churches in charge of 30 ministers, 10 of whom are natives, the rest hailing from Scotland. Last year a very serious question arose, almost threatening a rupture in the mission. This was owing to a proposal made, the result of which would have been to give the native ministers an inferior position in the church courts and to deprive them of certain powers.

Against this a vigorous protest was made, the result of which was the adjustment of difficulties and a satisfactory arrangement between the two sides of the house. Whilst, of course, the salaries of the native brethren are not the same as those of the men from Scotland, there was every desire to conciliate and work in harmony.

Others have met for their conferences and have returned to their work. If all were "one" how many more in the world would believe!
